

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Dedication

To the heroic ministers of the gospel who, in the early decades of the nineteenth century, despite disparagement, persecution and poverty, under the leadership of John Winebrenner, of whom none but himself could be his parallel, set up their banner in the name of the Lord, in defense of one common faith once for all delivered unto the saints, and for the building of the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth, the following pages are appreciatively inscribed.

INTRODUCTION.

HOW far wrong Napoleon was in his definition of history, when he said it is "but a fiction agreed upon," the following pages, with the bibliography of even French history, will abundantly testify. In one particular Faust is more nearly right, when to an enthusiastic student he said: "My friend, the times which are gone are a book of seven seals; and what you call the spirit of past ages is but the spirit of this or that worthy gentleman in whose mind these ages are reflected." The biographies of a dozen ministers, thoroughly written, would be the history of the churches of God. Hence, the pages following necessarily give pre-eminence to a few men out of the two thousand and more which have been ordained to the Christian ministry in the churches of God. Yet this characterization does not describe the History of the Churches of God as now written. Nor yet do these pages conform to the thought of Bishop Butler, who says, that "the best book which could be written would be a book consisting of premises, from which the readers should draw their own conclusions for themselves." And so the reader of these pages is apprised in advance, that they contain few, if any, direct conclusions drawn by the Author. In an elaborate outline of a proposed "History of the Church of God in North America," published in 1872, the suggestion was made, that the work should have nine Divisions, the writer concluding, that "doubtless upon mature reflection many other important and useful things will suggest themselves which are not here mentioned at all." Histories are written on a variety of methods, or plans, the best of which are an imitation of "God's plans, which like lilies pure and white unfold."

The first recorded suggestion of "History of the Church of God" came from the pen of A. Snyder, who in a two-column article in The Advocate of March 6, 1872, strongly urged the General Eldership in May, 1872, to make provision for the writing and publishing of a "History of the Church of God in North America." There were no public funds which said body could use for such a purpose, and it was too expensive a project for private capital to undertake, and so it fell through. But later, when funds were available, on at least three occasions the General Eldership took definite action to have such a work written and published. In 1899, the Committee on Resolutions reported the following, written by S. G. Yahn, which was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, there is among us an unquestioned need for a brief, but comprehensive, work covering the history and doctrines of the churches of God; and

Whereas, we believe that such a work would be of great value to the brotherhood in general, and especially to the ministers; therefore,

Resolved, That we request Rev. C. H. Forney, D. D., to write, and the Board of Publication to publish, such a volume, provided that a sufficient number of advance subscribers can be secured before January 1, 1900, to justify the undertaking."

Nothing resulted from this action because the suggested writer of the work was already burdened with other labors and duties. In 1902 the Committee on Resolutions reported, and the General Eldership adopted, a resolution, "recommending and urging C. H. Forney to edit and publish a concise, plain and practical treatise, setting forth the history, doctrines and polity of the churches of God as held by this body in the United States." But for a like reason this action bore no fruit. In 1909 C. I. Brown submitted for action by the General Eldership the following, which was "adopted by a rising vote."

"Whereas, there is a continued and deepened conviction among the members of the churches of God, that the history of the Church, together with the doctrine and polity of the same, should be carefully written and published so as to be available for the class-room of our educational institutions, our Eldership Courses of Study, and for introduction into the homes of the Church; and,

Whereas, the conviction deepens from year to year, that Rev. Dr. C. H. Forney is the one man pre-eminently qualified to write such a historical and doctrinal treatise; therefore,

Resolved, That the General Eldership hereby most earnestly requests Rev. Dr. C. H. Forney to write, and the Board of Directors of the Publishing House and Book Rooms to publish, a work in one or more volumes on the History, Doctrines and Polity of the churches of God."

Having retired from the editorship of The Advocate in 1909, the suggested writer of the work indicated would have the time to write the volume or volumes; but it was early realized that this undertaking would require a vast amount of exhausting and laborious work, extending through several years, at least, and so was undertaken with unconcealed reluctance. But in July, 1909, work was begun. It was entered upon without a definite plan, excepting the guiding principle of all true history, that it be a faithful record of facts. The thought of forming a plan in advance, and gathering the facts to suit the plan, did not commend itself sufficiently to be accepted. The outline given by A. Snyder, in 1872, was suggestive, to wit:

1. "That the material would be gathered from living men and women, witnesses of the facts. That this should be done by a paid Agent, or by committees of Annual Elderships."

2. "That the contents should consist, first, of chronological reports of the origin and progress of the Church, containing names of all the first preachers, with short sketches of their lives and labors; first churches organized, location and names, and the names of members and of their officers."

3. "Reports of the first regular circuit, where it was formed, its limits, and what it was called, and who traveled it. When and where the second, third and other circuits were formed, and what they were called, and the name or names of the preacher or preachers who first traveled on them."

4. "When and where the first Eldership was held, the names of all the members that constituted it; the order in which it was held, its name, etc."

5. "When and where the first protracted meetings and camp-meetings were held; when and where the first, second, third, etc., meeting-houses were built."

6. "When and where the first General Eldership was held, the names of the members that constituted it, its order of business."

7. "Report of the extension of the Church in the several States of the Union; the name or names of preacher or preachers who were first sent into this or that State, and where and when the first churches and circuits were formed."

8. "Of the special awakenings in the different counties, towns and neighborhoods; why they occurred; what preachers labored there, and also of the special opposition and persecution of the wicked, and all other remarkable occurrences."

9. "Of the missionary operation of the Church, where the first missionaries were employed by the Church; the name or names of the mission or missions, and the names of the preachers employed as missionaries; also of the formation of missionary societies, when and where first formed, and the second, third, etc., and the names of the officers."

10. "History of the printing press, and when it was started; the name or names of its editors; the difficulties it encountered; its success." He admitted that this was not an exhaustive plan; but it was suggestive.

For sources of information The Advocate was found the best and most reliable. Next to this, the Journals of the Annual Elderships, and of the General Eldership. Recourse was also had to the prominent workers in the mission enterprises, in missionary societies and in the Christian Endeavor work. The formative idea of the work as it is now given to the public was first to get all the available historical facts, classify them and then organize the work. In large measure this has resulted in a History embodying all that, and much more than, was contemplated by Snyder. It required an amount of labor which experience alone can appreciate. Nearly seventy-seven volumes of The Advocate had to be searched, page by page, and a score of books of historic value, besides hundreds of documents in pamphlets and manuscripts. Notes or data thus taken filled nearly 800 pages of manuscript, which would cover nearly 400 pages of the work as printed. First to gather all this material, and then to rewrite the Notes under classified Divisions, occupied the Author's time from July 1, 1909, to July 19, 1911. The work of writing the History was entered upon July 17, 1911, and was finished September 11, 1913. The amount of material gathered was so enormous that it required constant efforts at condensation and abridgement. And with all the strenuous endeavor to keep the work within 800 pages, it was found impossible. It was to be a "history of the churches," and, hence, they occupy more than customary space. With the countless details and dates found in the work, it is conceded that there may be many inaccuracies and errors. Explanations for these are easy to find. How true the words of ex-President Roosevelt are was realized, and, too, how difficult the task he lays down for the historian, when he says in a historical address delivered at Boston, in 1912: "The great historian of the future would be the man who had the genius to reconstruct for his readers the immense panorama of the past. He must possess knowledge and wisdom. He must use his material with such potent wizardry that we shall see the life that was, and not the death that is. If the facts permit him, he will put before us the men and women as they actually lived, so that we shall recognize them for what they were, living beings." This has not always been possible, for a vast amount of the material is impersonal and official.

One of the most critical features of the work was that which relates to character sketches. The material was mainly of an incidental nature. The danger of underestimation or exaggeration was an ever present one. It was not thought necessary in order to be true to facts to give any prominence to foibles and natural human weaknesses. The critical judgment would use these to modify the coloring of the picture, knowing that this faculty rarely works in unison with the creative faculty so as to secure harmony and unity. It is a dangerous thing to label a personality, and possibly the more so where there is personal knowledge. The reader may have a different angle of vision, or he may belong to the class spoken of by the Roman poet Horace, when he says: "The luster of a lofty character and an excelling genius is galling to inferior men; but when the man of genius dies, envy is changed into love." The supreme aim in all that is written along this line has been to see character vindicated and truth and justice come to their own.

When the question was tentatively decided that the insistent request of the General Eldership should be heeded, at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on October 7, 1909, the question of one, or of two volumes was taken up. The decision reached was that there should be two. One was to be "The History of the Churches of God;" the other, "Doctrine and Polity of the Churches of God." This was also to be historical, and not a System of Theology. It was also decided that the History should be illustrated, which added to both its size and cost.

The work has been done with special care. Not only is this true so far as the gathering, arranging and classifying of the materials are concerned, and the composition, or preparing, of the manuscript; but the manuscript before going into the hands of the printer was critically read by a very competent committee. Another committee read the proof with special care. The inaccuracies, mistakes and errors which doubtless will be found, despite special care to be accurate, are such as no vigilance could reasonably have avoided, and which charity will cover. The weary hours, running into months and years, while the execution of this great task has been in progress, have also been hours of unusual pleasure. The historian walked and communed with the fathers of the Church over their old fields of labor and toil for the Master, and through scenes which are now unknown. A vast majority of these he had personally known, and so in prosecuting the work he was associated with those whose labors and merits were an open book, and for whom, whether living or dead, he cherishes the sentiments of true Christian affection and regard. If the readers of these pages should become equally absorbed in their contents they will become better acquainted with the past labors and triumphs of the Church; will cultivate a higher regard for the noble and heroic, the altruistic and self-sacrificing spirit, and the true greatness of the early and later leaders in the Church, and will have their zeal for future enlargement greatly quickened. That these may be results of the publication of this work, leading to the praise of the Great Head of the church, is the cherished hope of him who commits it to the considerate judgment and the good will of all its readers.

GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY in general, in a work on "The Study of Biology," is defined by Thomas Hobbes to be, "The register of knowledge of fact." But as Church History especially has two sides, a divine and a human, it must include more than a recital of bare facts. On the part of God it is his revelation in the economy of grace and in the order of time of his plan of infinite wisdom, justice, mercy and love, looking to his glory and the eternal well-being of mankind. On the part of man it is largely the biography of prominent actors, and of the moral and spiritual development of those who have come under their influence, or through their agencies under the saving power of the gospel. And in the establishment of a religious body of people its history is largely the history of one man. Hence, the story of its founding, like that of the great Reformation, is best told by a biography of the man under God whose work assumed the largest proportions. Every movement, political and religious, also has its indirect, previous and often hidden causes, which may extend into a more or less remote past. It is not against a divine providence, nor yet against an intelligent human purpose, that this fact is recognized. The environment, physical, moral, political and economic, has a determining force in the history of even our highest activities. This important feature of written history requires some investigation into these mediate causes and their portrayal in a clear light. That the picture itself may be clearly and correctly painted it is a prerequisite that there be first a true historical background. More than a century has passed since the man was born who, in the divine providence, laid, humanly speaking, the ecclesiastical foundations of the churches of God. It is, therefore, the more necessary, in order that the history of the churches of God may be as nearly complete as practicable that the reader have a correct perspective; that the antecedent facts be given their relative importance. True history requires that, so far as may be, the view be taken from the standpoint of an actual observer. Neglect of this important principle gives a distorted view of the distant past. Or, on the contrary, as Hazlett so justly remarks: "Seen in the distance, in the long perspective of waning years, the meanest incidents, enlarged and enriched by countless recollections, become interesting."

The proper measurement of the present is by the past. And only as we know the past in its entirety can we correctly estimate it. We live in a new world. Marvelous changes in every department of human life have taken place. Not only in State and Nation is this true, but in all ecclesiastical affairs. A century ago the wildest romancer could not have pictured the present age. Nor can the living generation, in the absence of historical data, conceive conditions at the close of the eighteenth century.

"With smoking axle, hot with speed, with steeds of fire and steam, Wide-waked to-day leaves yesterday behind him like a dream;
Still from the hurrying train of life, fly backward far and fast
The milestones of the fathers, the land-marks of the past."

The growth and development of our common country have had no parallel in the world's history. The meager millions of '76 have become almost one hundred millions to-day. The first census of the population of the United States was taken in 1790. The total population as then computed was 3,929,214. In 1900 it was 75,303,387. Three years after the birth of Winebrenner it was 5,308,483. This population was scattered principally along the Atlantic sea-coast, extending a few hundred miles inland. Of the sixty-seven counties in Pennsylvania only twenty-five were organized prior to 1800. The population of the State of Pennsylvania in 1790 was less than one-third of the present population of Philadelphia. This relative proportion is everywhere evident. The total Continental troops in the entire period of the Revolution was but 130,917. Great things then would seem insignificant now.

There are many land-marks of historical and biographical importance which the thoughtful reader will recall with profit in this connection, so as to secure a proper setting for the story of the founding of the churches of God in the United States. They will transport the reader into the environment of the last decade of the eighteenth century. Thus, the birth of the great American Republic occurred twenty-one years before the birth of Winebrenner. Seven years before the latter event the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the last one of the original thirteen States, while a year earlier Washington was inaugurated the first President of the new Republic. The corner-stone of the Capitol at Washington was laid but four years prior to the birth of Winebrenner, and it was not until three years after his birth that the archives of the Government were removed from Philadelphia to Washington, preparatory to the convening the ensuing November of the first Congress in the new metropolis. Two years after the birth of Winebrenner Columbia's most honored, venerated and renowned son, George Washington, ended his illustrious career. His Farewell Address was published in September, 1796. In his case, as in many in less exalted station, the ordinance of divine wisdom was verified, that the great boon of earthly immortality shall be attained only through the portals of the grave, to which decree the illustrious and the humble are alike subject.

While every youth in America remembers that John Adams, the second President, was inaugurated in 1797, and Thomas Jefferson, Vice President, it is not so generally remembered that among the distinguished men born in that year are Dr. Charles Hodge, a powerful ecclesiastical leader and a fine example of the modern expositor of the dogmas of Calvinism; John Hughes, Catholic Archbishop of America; Samuel Joseph May, American clergyman and abolitionist; Franz Schubert, "the immortal melodist"; Thurlow Weed, one of the oldest American journalists, and that Abraham Lincoln was born but twelve years later. John Wesley, founder of Methodism, died six years before the birth of Winebrenner, and Charles, his brother, the celebrated Hymn-writer, nine years earlier.

At the close of the eighteenth century the economic conditions of the country, with its largely preponderating rural population, were of the most primitive and antiquated character. Slavery was not yet abolished in Pennsylvania, as in 1780 there were 11,000 slaves in the Colony, which probably marked the highest figures in its history. Maryland in 1800 had 105,635 slaves. There were no public service utilities; no transportation lines except the stage coach and the Conestoga wagon. In 1790 there were only twenty-five post-offices in the whole country, and up to 1837 the rates of postage were twenty-five cents for a letter sent over four hundred miles. There were no canals, no railroads, no telegraph or telephone lines, no gas or electric lights. The most sententious contrasts can be drawn between 1801 and 1901 in economic, civic, political, scientific and religious conditions. In area alone the figures for 1801 are 827,844 square miles, and for 1901, 3,631,000 square miles. Then they had the quill pen, now we have the fountain pen and the typewriter. Then the springless stage coach, now the locomotive, the dining-car, the bicycle and the automobile. Then the tallow-dip, the flint and steel to strike fire; now the sulphur match, the Roentgen rays and the electric light. Then the needle; now the sewing-machine and the knitting-machine. Then the sickle, the scythe and the flail, the farmer's harvesting tools; now the reaper that cuts and binds and the header and steam thresher. Then hand type-setting and the slow printing press; now the almost human linotype machine, and the octuple steam press, turning out one thousand papers a minute, pasted, folded and counted. Such wonderful achievements as these and scores of others make the grandest epochs in the history of the world. They are also the exponent of the mental development of the race.

In newspaper enterprise the same remarkable progress has been made. Its beginning dates back to 1690, when "Publick Occurrences" appeared in Boston. Progress was slow the greater part of the century which followed. By the commencement of the struggle for independence the Colonial press numbered but thirty publications, all weekly. But with the opening of the nineteenth century the periodical press grew rapidly in number, circulation and influence. And at the close of the century the number of the newspapers and periodicals of the United States easily leads the world. The annual expenditure of a single metropolitan daily operated on a large scale is computed at not less than $3,000,000. The religious press has had an equally rapid development. The first distinctively religious newspaper the world had ever seen appeared at Portsmouth, N. H., in September, 1808. To-day the number of religious publications of a periodical character exceeds the wildest anticipations of a century ago.

The churches of God in modern times having had their origin in Eastern Pennsylvania and the border counties of Maryland, it is quite important that something should be said of the early immigrants to these sections, their culture, language, customs and religious peculiarities. In the study of the history of any people, as Pierson says of all great forward movements, "it is always important to begin at the beginning." For "history is a constant ethical lesson to the studious and candid observer." The first general settlement of Pennsylvania by Penn with a colony of English Quakers was in 1682. This was followed by the first cargo of German immigrants in October, 1683. A few years later this immigration assumed large proportions, aggregating over thirty thousand names of Germans, Swedes and Hollanders by the close of the year 1776. They were all of the poorer class of people, and lived at first in small log cabins in the primeval forests. In many sections extending as far westward as the Cumberland Valley, in Pennsylvania; the northern counties of Maryland, and the Shenandoah Valley, in Virginia, they formed fully nine-tenths of the population, while throughout the Province they constituted more than one-half of the population. The Netherlands, the Palatinate, Scotland, Ireland, Bavaria and other countries contributed their proportion to the mixed population of Pennsylvania at the close of the eighteenth century.

Religiously these people who fled from the terrible persecutions of the Old World represented quite a variety of religious organizations. English and French infidelity was also represented, especially during and following the War of Independence. The principal denominations thus early established in Pennsylvania and the border counties of Maryland were the Dunkards, the Mennonites, the Moravians, the German Reformed, the Lutherans, the Presbyterians, the Quakers and the Methodists. There were also organizations of some less widely known bodies, such as the River Brethren, Schwenkfelders, Swedenborgians and Shakers. The United Brethren Church originated in Lancaster county, Pa., with the revival preaching of Philip Otterbein, of the German Reformed Church, and Martin Boehm, a Mennonite minister, about 1789. Simultaneously the "outward organization" of the Evangelical Association, then more generally known as the German Methodist Church, was effected. In the formation of both these religious bodies the pressure of external circumstances, the passion in a few devout souls for a deeper spiritual experience and the burning desire and zeal for the salvation of their fellow men, under the divine providence, were the predominant factors.

The religious life of the church has been a succession of ebbs and flows, of high tides and low tides. It is human to degenerate. And so after the high tides of spiritual revivals in the past two centuries there followed a season of depression and dearth. Ritualism, sacramentalism, secularism, rationalism and infidelity proved fatal to genuine piety and spirituality. The Mennonites, Dunkards and those of other faiths fled from the intolerance and oppressions of the Old World to enjoy liberty of conscience, and a free worship in the New World, but to become enslaved in forms and ceremonies. When they reached the New World their piety was unaffected, their morality of a high order, and the spirituality of their religion genuine and sincere. But before the middle of the eighteenth century there was a general eclipse of vital godliness. In most sections of the country religious experience had ceased to be a test of church membership and disappeared from the pulpits as a theme of discourse, and even the ministry was filled with unregenerate men. Laxity of belief and morals prevailed, and candidates for the ministry often refused to answer inquiries in regard to both faith and experience. Then came "The Great Awakening" under Edwards and Whitefield. It did not, however, deeply effect the spiritual life of Churches in the Middle States, and was soon followed by the inevitable reaction. General moral degeneration, skepticism and infidelity prevailed to an alarming extent. This condition was somewhat relieved by the introduction of Methodism, which dates its organic existence back to 1766. A more general revival followed all over the country, which has been characterized as a counter reaction against the skepticism and immorality which had distinguished that period of the century. These earlier Methodists were originally from the German Palatinate, and were to some extent scattered among the German settlements in eastern Pennsylvania. Their first house of worship was erected on Fourth street below Vine, Philadelphia, in 1769. They were self-sacrificing, zealous and persevering in their efforts to disseminate experimental religion in the Colonies. Their converts multiplied with unprecedented rapidity. The first Conference was held in 1773, in Philadelphia, with ten preachers and eleven hundred and sixty members. But when the General Conference convened in New York City in 1812 there were reported six hundred and eighty-eight preachers and one hundred and ninety-five thousand, three hundred and fifty-seven members. But the Methodist ministers followed in the main the English population. They discouraged German preaching, believing that the German language would die out at an early day.

The Revolutionary War had a disastrous effect upon the Churches. Moral deterioration is a concomitant and a consequence of war. The twenty years following the Revolution was a time of the lowest general morality up to that date in American history. In the churches there was general lukewarmness and grievous apostasies. There was a lamentable decay of vital piety, and gross immoralities increased to a signal degree. French infidelity came into the country during the continuance of the war. It spread with unusual rapidity, and swept over the country like a devouring fire. Colleges and universities were filled with youthful skeptics. At Yale, in 1795, there were but four or five who were willing to admit that they were members of churches. Similar conditions existed at Harvard, Princeton, the University of Virginia and others of the then large institutions of learning. They were as thoroughly hotbeds of skepticism as they were nurseries of higher learning.

The dawn proverbially follows the darkest hour of the night. It was hastened by the labors of such men as Otterbein, Boehm, Albright, Dwight, Asbury, Griffen and a host of local co-laborers. British Christianity had been powerfully quickened, and new beneficent agencies were starting into being. There were indications of an immense advance all along the lines of Christ's militant host. The churches of the new world happily were destined to share in this onward and upward movement. The Great Awakening under Edwards had been arrested in Pennsylvania by the German language. The German churches were now themselves to be the agents in this new awakening. And so the pen of history has recorded on its annals the equally great, but more widespread, revival of the closing years of the eighteenth and the opening years of the nineteenth centuries. The influence of this revival extended into almost all portions of the country, quickening and multiplying churches, turning back the dark and desolating floods of infidelity and immorality, and giving birth to numerous powerful religious and reformatory agencies. Perhaps the Churches least affected by this great revival were the Dunkard, the Mennonite, the German Reformed and the Lutheran, whose members and adherents constituted the largest part of the population of eastern Pennsylvania and the northern counties of Maryland. In these Churches the spirit which prevailed to so unhappy an extent was arrayed against men who preached experimental religion, and procured the expulsion of most of them from the communities in which they stood.

It was at the inception of the great revival of 1800-1803 that John Winebrenner was born. Two different dates have been published, one in Histories of Dauphin county, Pa., respectively by Dr. William Egle, and by Luther Reilly Kelker. The other is given in the "Biography of Elder John Winebrenner," by Dr. George Ross. The former give the date of March 24, 1797; the latter gives it as Saturday, March 25, 1797. The publications of the churches of God, however, uniformly quote the date given by Dr. Ross. The correctness of this date is verified by Winebrenner himself in the article which he furnished over his signature for "The Testimony of a Hundred Witnesses." He says: "I was born in Frederick county, Maryland, on the 25th day of March, 1797." He was the third son of Philip and Eve C. Winebrenner, whose maiden name was Barrick. The place of his nativity is Glade Valley, Woodsborough District, Frederick Co., Md., near the present town of Walkersville. This section of the county is known as the Glades, the most fertile and wealthy part of the county, having within its limits five farms, with beautiful and picturesque scenery, affording the delightful variety of mountain and valley and woodland. His parents were of German descent, but German was not spoken by them in their family. His father was born near Hanover, York Co., Pa., Dec. 4, 1759, and when a young man moved on the farm in Maryland, where he died Dec. 11, 1841. His mother was born June 1, 1757, and died Sep. 14, 1831. His father had a limited education, but possessed a strong mind, a remarkably retentive memory and unusual decision of character. His mother was a woman of gentle and pious disposition, with a good mind and scripturally adorned character. The father pursued the occupation of a farmer with a good measure of success. The farm which he owned, and on which his eminent son was born and raised, is a valuable homestead of about two hundred acres, with a spacious stone mansion, built in 1810, to take the place of the old log house in which John was born. Both his parents were members of the German Reformed Church. Their bodies rest in the Glades Reformed church grave-yard, a country church about one mile from the old homestead. Young Winebrenner received his rudimentary education in the Glades school, a log school-house, standing by the roadside within a stone's throw of the church, and about a mile from his home. It still stands, and is occupied as a dwelling house.

Glades School-House.

Thence he went to an academic institution in Frederick City, eight miles south-east of his home. Later he went to Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., at that time and until 1833 under the control of the Presbyterian Church. Here he pursued his classical course, being a non-graduate of the class of 1818. From Dickinson College he went to Philadelphia, where he studied Theology for about three years under the instructions of Rev. Dr. Samuel Helfenstein.

Winebrenner's religious training began in infancy. He was baptized according to the ritual of the German Reformed Church when two months old, May 28, 1797, by Rev. John William Runkel, pastor of the Glades Reformed church from 1784 to 1801. At this church he attended services while at home, Rev. Daniel Wagner becoming his pastor in 1801. In Philadelphia he attended the ministry of Dr. Jonathan Helfenstein, pastor of the First Reformed church, Race street, between Third and Fourth. These ministers are characterized in "The Fathers of the Reformed Church" as "eminently good, active in the ministry, and aiming as much as possible at immediate effects."

But Winebrenner contemplated the ministry and was pursuing his studies with that end in view, when he was as yet destitute of the saving knowledge of God. It was in Philadelphia, in his twenty-first year, when his theological studies had been already commenced, that he became scripturally converted. The graphic narrative of his conversion is thus recorded with his own pen, dated at Harrisburg, Pa., July 22, 1858: "As my mother trained me from my youth up in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and instructed me in the great principles and duties of religion, I was graciously brought to feel my obligations to God at an early age, and my mind was deeply exercised on the subject of my soul's salvation. These convictions, however, would sometimes wear off, and then be renewed again. Hence I continued sinning and repenting for a number of years, till in the Winter of 1817 [But in a Note in The Gospel Publisher of Feb. 18, 1842, he says: "I was converted, or born again, in the Spring of 1817"], when deep and pungent convictions laid hold of my guilty soul. Then, like Job, 'I abhorred myself'; like Ephraim, 'I bemoaned myself'; with the prodigal, I said, 'I will arise and go to my Father,' and with the publican, I cried, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner.' And after 'chattering like a swallow,' and 'mourning as a dove' for three or four months my poor woe-fraught soul found redemption in Immanuel's blood, even the forgiveness of sins. It was on Easter Sabbath, in the city of Philadelphia, in the presence of a large congregation of worshippers, that Jesus, the 'Sun of Righteousness' arose and shone upon my soul 'with healing in his wings.' Truly that was the happiest day of my life! My darkness was turned into day, and my sorrow into joy. Jesus became the joy of my heart and the center of my affections. His people became lovely and precious in my sight. His word was my delight. In it I beheld new beauties and beatitudes. Sin, that dreadful monster, became more odious and hateful to my soul. Zion's welfare lay near my heart. My bowels yearned for the salvation of sinners. I was in travail for my friends and kindred. I felt constrained to join with 'the Spirit and the bride' and say to all, 'Come, O, come to Jesus.'" Winebrenner's conversion is in many respects almost parallel to that of Albright, the founder of the Evangelical Association. He was instructed in the catechism and confirmed by a Lutheran minister, baptized and entered as a member of that Church, but knew nothing of true conversion. He had similar experiences before conversion, and finally his conviction became clear and deep, and he emerged into the light with unspeakable joy. And still a more complete parallel is the religious experience of Otterbein, founder of the United Brethren Church. He was brought up in the German Reformed Church and became a minister and pastor in it before his conversion. During his pastorate in Lancaster, Pa., the great crisis in his religious experience "brought about a most marked change in his spiritual consciousness."

Winebrenner's inclination toward the ministry of the German Reformed Church developed early in life, so that when a lad he often essayed to preach to his school comrades, and at other times he would "preach in a wood near his home," or under a "majestically beautiful oak along his road to school." He was reverent in his demeanor at church, and an ardent lover of the truth as he understood it. Plato's striking definition of man as "the hunter of truth" applies to Winebrenner from boyhood to old age. He exemplified it in making devotion to truth his chief end, and found in searching for it his highest pleasure. He was always ready to make sacrifices in the interest of truth. After his conversion "the work of the ministry became," as he says, "the uppermost desire of my heart. This desire became like a pent-up fire in my bones from youth up. In later years my mind became strongly impressed with the duty of preparing myself for the gospel ministry." He opened his mind to his parents, and requested them to have him educated for the sacred calling. His mother readily consented, but his father opposed it, and sought in every way to divert his mind to mercantile pursuits, to medicine, or to the law. This only seemed to intensify his desire to become a minister of the word. When his father finally yielded he entered upon the necessary course of preparation, which he completed in 1820. The Reformed Church in Harrisburg, Pa., having been without a pastor for several months, on the recommendation of Rev. Jonathan Helfenstein, of Frederick City, Md., invited Winebrenner to preach a Sabbath for them. He accepted the invitation, and delivered his first religious discourses Sunday, Feb. 28, 1819, and revisited them Sunday, May 21st, and Nov. 28th. Very favorable impressions were made by these sermons, so that at a meeting called by the Vestry of the church, held Dec. 16, 1819, the young theological student in Philadelphia was elected pastor of the Harrisburg charge. He received forty-three out of forty-eight votes cast, his competitor, Rev. Lewis Mayer, D. D., receiving five. But the call was made unanimous. In a letter dated Dec. 27, 1819, the unanimous call was communicated to him to become the pastor of the four churches constituting the charge, viz.: Harrisburg, Shoop's, Wenrick's in Dauphin county, and Salem's, near Shiremanstown, in Cumberland county. His salary was fixed at $1,000.00 per annum. This call was accepted in a letter dated

Jan. 28, 1820, with the statement that he could not take charge of the congregations until he had completed his theological course and been ordained by the Synod within whose bounds these churches were located. This being agreeable to the churches, he proceeded to Hagerstown, Md., where the General Synod of the German Reformed Church convened, in Zion's church, where he was ordained to the office of the sacred ministry on Sep. 24, 1820. He then, on Oct. 4th, sent his formal letter of acceptance of the above-named charge. He preached his introductory sermon at Harrisburg, Pa., on Sunday, Oct. 22, 1820.

During these years of preparation for Winebrenner's life-work important events were transpiring whose influence his receptive mind could not escape. In the religious world there was a series of new movements of momentous import. These included the distinct and separate organization of some religious bodies destined to exert a far-reaching, powerful influence on American ecclesiastical life. Otterbein and his followers had previously organized the first Conference of the United Brethren Church. But it was in 1800 that titles of the new organization were dropped, and the present distinctive name assumed. The relation of this new organization and its possible effect upon the German Reformed Church may be inferred from the fact that the analysis given of the original Roll of Conference members shows that of the seven men present five were of Reformed antecedents and two of Mennonite; of those enrolled but absent four were Reformed, two Mennonite and one Moravian. Otterbein indeed never formally severed his relation with the Reformed Church, and he persistently cherished the hope of seeing the revival movement inaugurated under his preaching spread more extensively among the Reformed churches than Pietism had in Germany. While Martin Boehm, his faithful coadjutor, labored earnestly to develop a true spiritual life among his own people, the Mennonites. He, like Otterbein, did not desire to separate himself from the Church of his childhood. They were eminently successful in promoting revivals in the lower tier of counties in Pennsylvania, including Dauphin, and in Maryland and Virginia. Many members of Reformed and Mennonite churches accepted the gospel invitation which they heralded throughout those regions.

At this time the Methodist pioneer Bishop, Francis Asbury, had much fellowship with Boehm and Otterbein. The Methodist Church operated largely in the more eastern counties of Pennsylvania, coming westward into Lehigh, Berks, Northumberland and Dauphin. Their itinerant system was better adapted to country evangelization. But they were disinclined to perpetuate a German ministry. When Jacob Albright, founder of the Evangelical Association, was converted, he joined the Methodist Church. He was born in the Lutheran Church. He was a man of great zeal, and an effective exhorter and later a preacher of unusual power. He was deeply interested in the spiritual welfare of his German fellow citizens. He began his ministerial labors in Montgomery county, Pa., in a community of Schwenkfelders. He felt specially called to lead the neglected Germans to a life of vital piety. This he would do in the Methodist Church. Like Otterbein, he had at that time no intention of organizing a new denomination, a step which would have antagonized the sentiments of the better disposed professors of religion. But "classes" were formed, organized work was planned, "big meetings" were held, Pentecostal meetings were inaugurated and new circuits were formed. They also began holding camp-meetings in 1810, as did the United Brethren in 1815. Thus his work extended into the northern parts of Lancaster county, into Lebanon, Schuylkill, Dauphin, Mifflin and Huntingdon. Like burning and shining lights these heralds of a true spiritual life went through these eastern counties of the State. So thoroughly Methodist was this work that the first Conference adopted as a name "The Newly-formed Methodist Conference." It was a German Methodist organization, with the Methodist Discipline, Confession of Faith and Polity. But this movement toward a higher spiritual life had little effect upon the older religious bodies. It reached scores of individuals in those Churches. But the doors and hearts of these Churches were closed against this new gospel. And by 1810 the lines were so strongly drawn that but few converts were made from these older faiths. Revivals on an extensive scale did not occur between 1810 and 1825. Not only is there a periodicity in revivals, but the religious life of a people is like the surface of the earth as seen in some of the American States. There are the lofty, majestic mountains, the lower foot-hills, the ravines and the deep valleys, with their streams and rivers, their deep soil and their fertile plains. So there are great upheavals of a religious character as seen in the memorable and wide-reaching revivals when a continent was stirred to its very heart. Others like the foot-hills of our mountain ranges. But the quieter seasons yield the largest permanent results.

Besides these movements out of which grew the United Brethren Church and the Evangelical Association, in the year 1803 the "Christians" assumed the form of a united body, composed of Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians. The Reformed Methodist Church was organized in 1814. In 1816 the African Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and in 1820 the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. In 1818 the first General Convention of the Swedenborgian, or New Jerusalem, Church was organized. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church originated in Tennessee in 1810. In other lines there was also a decided increase in religious activities. In 1810 the American Board of Foreign Missions was organized, followed by the American Baptist Missionary Union in 1814, and the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1819. Indeed it was in these two decades of the nineteenth century that the missionary movement which places the present time above any since the apostolic days began to manifest itself. And almost simultaneously came in the spirit of division and sectarianism which divided the Christian forces in America into so many hostile camps.

Other eponymous events during this period are the Second War with England, 1812, which as usual had a demoralizing effect upon the people; the admission into the Union of Ohio in 1802; of Louisiana, in 1812; Mississippi, in 1817; Illinois, in 1818, and Alabama, in 1819. Among the renowned men who occupy so large a part in the history of the United States that were born during this period and were Winebrenner's cotemporaries are Abraham Lincoln, the great War President, whose apotheosis has been proclaimed by an admiring world; William H. Seward, his brilliant Secretary of State; Robert E. Lee, the master spirit of the militant Confederacy; Charles Sumner, the illustrious champion of the anti-Slavery movement; John Lathrop Motley, accomplished author and diplomatist; Frederick Douglass, the ex-slave, whose oratorical fame is world-wide; John B. Gough, of unsurpassed talents as a temperance orator; and abroad such celebrities as Count Bismarck, the iron Chancellor, Premier and Statesman of Germany; William E. Gladstone, England's greatest prime minister, who as a theological, political and economic writer and an orator and debater has ever had few superiors; Lord Beaconsfield, author of "Endymion" and other great works manifesting originality, vivaciousness and wit, and a controlling figure in the government and prosperity of England, and Queen Victoria, the beloved Sovereign of Great Britain, under whose beneficent reign greater and richer advantages in religion, science, art, commerce and literature were enjoyed than under any other modern sovereignty. Among the princes of the American pulpit born during this era may be named Henry Ward Beecher, the most eloquent of pulpit and platform orators; Matthew Simpson, the most celebrated Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in a century; Thomas H. Stockton, who in his time is said not to have had a peer as a pulpit orator in the country; Horace Bushnell, Congregationalist author and divine, and Theodore Parker, Independent minister and representative of Liberal Theology.

CHAPTER II.

1820—1825.

WHEN in October, 1820, Winebrenner "settled in Harrisburg, Pa., as a minister of the German Reformed Church, he took charge of four congregations, one in town and three in the country." The town congregation worshiped in an old log building, on Third street, below Chestnut, the logs having been cut in the woods, or forests, in the immediate vicinity. It was the first church building erected in the town, and was built by public subscriptions, in 1787. It was repaired and weather boarded in 1795, and so has by some been called a frame house.

First Church Building in Harrisburg.

Prior to this the people of all Protestant denominations worshiped together, when a minister came, in a one-story log school-house then standing at the foot of Capitol Hill, on the north-west corner of Third and Walnut streets. When the town was laid out the pioneer settlers took measures for the erection of a church building, and John Harris, its founder, granted a lot on the town plot, at the corner of Third and Chestnut streets, for that purpose. On the lower end of this lot the first church building was erected. The building had a front of thirty-five feet on Third street, and a depth of thirty-five feet on Cherry alley. The subscription list states that the building was to be "a church and school-house," and was "to be used by all denominations." The Lutheran and Reformed churches in 1791 erected a separate school-house on the same lot. After the death of John Harris his heirs released their interest in the church lot to the trustees of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. In April, 1816, the Reformed congregation purchased the interest held by the Lutherans in the old church lot and buildings, and became the sole owners. In anticipation of this severance of the two churches the Lutherans had purchased, in 1814, a lot on Fourth street, between Market and Chestnut streets, on which the same year they erected a handsome brick church, dedicated October 1, 1815.

The history of Harrisburg begins in 1733, when it was known as Harris Ferry. It was platted by John Harris in 1784, and called Harrisburg. In 1786 the name was changed to Louisburg. In 1791, the year that Harris died, it was incorporated as a borough, and called Harrisburg. At this time it had two hundred and twenty houses. In 1811 the seat of government was removed from Lancaster to Harrisburg, and the first Governor inaugurated at the new capital was William Findlay, on December 16, 1817. The corner-stone of the new capitol was laid May 31, 1819, and the building completed in 1821. During the building of the capitol the Legislature met in the Court House. The language spoken by the people was so largely German, that the first English services in the Reformed church were held about 1808. And preaching in German and English continued in the Reformed and Lutheran churches for many years.

The population of Dauphin county in 1820 was German and Scotch-Irish, the former largely preponderating. The latter were Presbyterians, the former principally Reformed and Lutherans, with small organizations of Methodists, United Brethren and Evangelicals. The earliest churches to be established were, by the Presbyterians, in 1730; the Lutherans, in 1753; by the German Reformed, in 1768; by the Episcopalians, in 1766; by the Methodists, in 1801; the United Brethren and Evangelical Association about 1800, and the Catholics, in 1810. Only four of these Churches, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Reformed and Methodist, were represented in organic form in Harrisburg when Winebrenner began his ministerial labors, the Methodists having built a church in 1816 and the Presbyterians, in 1808. The religious condition of nearly all these Churches was low, and destitute of spirituality. It was void of soul and faith, a form without substance. A writer of that period describes this condition as being "mostly formal, the members having a form of ceremonial religion, but without the enjoyments which true spiritual religion affords." "There was a great want of a genuine work of grace." The churches were barren and stagnant, producing a state of religious inactivity. Even the ministers of the Evangelical and United Brethren Churches lamented the barrenness and stagnation among their people. While the consensus of views is that among the other religious bodies, with few exceptions, "ministers and members were unconverted and ignorant of the right ways of the Lord."

Under these conditions Winebrenner began his ministry among the people of his charge. He preached in German and English, as especially the churches at Wenrick's and Shoop's were composed of German farmers. Being a man of fervent piety and an earnest Christian, his preaching was clear, pointed and powerful. He was in favor of revivals of religion, Sunday-schools, prayer-meetings and other evangelistic measures. Soon after his settlement in his charge a work of grace commenced among the people, both in town and in the country. This developed great and bitter opposition, which became more intensified with succeeding years. It continued for five years, and resulted in his separation from the German Reformed Church. He was not unmindful of the material interests of his charge. The congregation in Harrisburg had outgrown the old log church, and on January 15, 1821, at a congregational meeting it was resolved to erect a new church, fronting on Chestnut street, corner of Third street. The corner-stone of the new structure was laid June 11, 1821, and the new church was dedicated August 4, 1822.

Under Winebrenner's leadership a Sunday-school was organized soon after he became pastor of Salem church. He became popular among the more spiritual people of other Churches, and would preach in their pulpits, and would invite ministers not ordained according to the theory of apostolic succession to preach for his congregations and to assist him in evangelistic meetings. These things gave serious offense to some of the members of his charge, and accordingly an appeal was sent up to the Synod of the Reformed Church, which met at Harrisburg, September 29, 1822, requesting an investigation of the causes of dissatisfaction existing in the congregations of the charge. Another document was submitted to Synod containing a series of complaints. Synod only noticed the appeal, upon which it appointed a committee of seven of its members, which met in Harrisburg, October 2, 1822. It took up the whole matter, and after careful deliberation it decided to advise reconciliation by forgiving and forgetting all past differences and living in future in peace and harmony. The following are the items in the complaints sent to Synod:

"Complaints against the Rev. John Winebrenner.

"I. That he proceeds in the affairs of the church at Harrisburg as if there were no Vestry, as he never consults them on any occasion.

"II. In his recommendation to attend strictly divine worship he mentioned the Methodist church particularly as a suitable place for his congregation, and on the same day after such recommendation he preached in the Methodist church. He further stated that if any members could not derive benefit by attending our church they should leave it, and that he himself would never have joined this Church if he had not devoted himself to the ministry. And at the time of the Quarterly Meeting of the Methodists, at Harrisburg, Pa., he attended there and took Love-feast with them, and kept his own congregation waiting till he returned from the Methodist meeting-house.

"III. He held prayer-meetings denominated anxious meetings, where he divided the members into two classes—first, those who say they have experienced a change, and believe themselves to be Christians; and, secondly, the sinners, those who believe themselves to be mourning sinners. And during all prayer-meetings

he encourages groaning, thereby disturbing others who might, if the groaning were omitted, receive some benefit. Allows during prayer certain persons to respond 'Amen! Amen!' thereby drawing the attention of the gazing crowd which usually collect on the outside.

"IV. At a meeting held, which he called a conference meeting, on the last Monday of July, he allowed persons to converse, encouraged the Christians to speak to sinners, when Mr. Winebrenner, Mr. Jacob Helfenstein, Mr. Knouse, Mr. Krause, Mr. Officer, Mrs. Wetherholt and others at one and the same time exhorted, prayed and continued until James Officer commenced singing a lively tune, which produced a state of confusion among them. After that Mr. Winebrenner called out if any person wished to be prayed for they should come forward. That then numbers came forward, and Mr. Knouse prayed for them.

"V. At a meeting held the last Monday in May, which he called an experience and conference meeting, which began at seven o'clock in the evening, he kept together all who would stay till four o'clock in the morning, at the breaking up of which he said, 'This is the way to fan the chaff from the wheat.'

"VI. His denunciation from the pulpit towards members and others has caused members to withdraw themselves from the church. And on one occasion, when he preached a funeral sermon, he said, 'If I were to judge from Scripture, the majority buried in the neighboring graves must be in hell,' from which expression he gave a general dissatisfaction to the by-standers on the burying ground. Afterward he said from the pulpit, he excepted the children from the expression given in the grave-yard, thereby evidencing the general displeasure his expressions have given to the people.

"VII. He is now making, or has already made, arrangements to give up two of the congregations which form a part of our connection, viz.: at Wenrick's and Shoop's churches, thereby imposing a burden upon the two remaining congregations to provide support for himself and his successor, which was ere this done by the four congregations. All this is done without consulting the Vestry, or membership of the adhering congregations.

"VIII. He has given such general dissatisfaction that on several late occasions where there were funerals in families of his members they passed [him] by; would not have him attend their funerals, and obtained ministers of other denominations.

"IX. He has admitted persons (who on account of misconduct in the church they previously belonged to were expelled from membership) to become members of our church without consulting the Vestry.

"X. He is very remiss in visiting members of our congregation, especially at such times when any are sick; and he absents himself from his residence that he can not pay the necessary visits to his members, and he has refused to baptize children of the members when he had been particularly requested."

Winebrenner's defense was based largely on the incorrectness of these allegations. He said: "I am brought to the disagreeable necessity of declaring a great portion of them incorrect, and devoid of truth. There are, however, I admit, some facts contained in the paper, which, when freed from error and misrepresentations, I am not ashamed to confess." He admitted, under the first complaint, that he did not always consult the Consistory, because he knew that no harmonious co-operation could be had; but he did sometimes. Besides, the Consistory did not consult him invariably either.

On the second, he admitted that he did preach for the Methodists, took Love-feast with them, and on a certain occasion when he intended to preach for them he invited his people to come to hear him. And as his congregation was without preaching every other Sabbath he recommended it to go to other churches on the intervening Sabbath. But that he kept his congregation waiting longer than usual at any time he took Love-feast with the Methodists was incorrect. Moreover he was grieved to see so many professors of religion so destitute of charity as scarcely to go into any place of worship than their own.

On the third, he stated that he held anxious meetings, and in order to ascertain who were awakened and who were not, it was mentioned that they should occupy separate rooms, or different parts of the same room; but every one was free to determine where and with whom to sit. That he did not encourage groaning; however, when sinners groan for redemption he delighted to hear it, but when it proceeds from mere habit it was vain and unprofitable.

On the fourth, his words are: "The object contemplated at that meeting was to hold a free conversation with each other on experimental religion." He conceded that what was complained of is true, with the exception of a few mistakes.

On the fifth, he stated that he did keep up the meeting till four o'clock in the morning; "but the last expression was unfounded."

On the sixth, he said: "If men will become my enemies; yea, withdraw themselves from the church, because I tell them the truth, I can not help it. But I know of none save perhaps the few men who have lodged these complaints against me." And in reference to the probable state of the dead, other than unaccountable children, he referred them to Matthew vii. 13, 14, and Luke xiii. 24.

On the seventh, he called attention to the fact that as Middletown and Hummelstown were once part of the Harrisburg charge, and are destitute of preaching, he intended to supply them for awhile, provided the arrangements could be made with the country churches.

On the eighth, he revealed the strong affinity between kindred spirits, by saying: "I do rejoice to say, that, so far as I know, the pious and serious part of the congregation have always been my warm and affectionate friends."

On the ninth, he admitted that he did receive one person who was formerly a member of another Church, and had been excommunicated; but that at the time he was admitted to church fellowship he had professed religion.

On the tenth, he stated, that he was not aware of the fact of a certain person being sick, or he would have visited him. He acknowledged that he had refused to baptize the children of unbelieving parents, and declared his intention to continue to do so.

Conditions at Harrisburg remained unsettled during the Winter of 1822-3. An incident occurred on March 23, 1823, which precipitated the final crisis. On that day Winebrenner preached in German, and having a funeral in the country in the afternoon, he announced that he had engaged a Mr. Brown to preach in his stead. As Brown was not a minister of the German Reformed Synod some of the authorities of the church prohibited the sexton to ring the bell and to unlock the church door. In the evening Winebrenner preached in English, and at the close of the services he said: "I shall not appoint the time for another meeting, as I do not know that I can be the pastor of this congregation any longer, unless that I shall again preach on Friday evening next. And if I do preach then, I will preach on the following Sunday." A conference with the Vestry followed, when Winebrenner was asked why he had made this announcement, to which he replied, that he desired to know whether they approved of the course of one of the Vestry in preventing Mr. Brown from preaching, and also whether they would pay him the same salary they had paid him the first year. To the first question the Vestry answered, "Yes." To the second, one vestryman replied, "No; because through your course many of the paying members stayed away, and consequently we could not do it."

A very critical condition had now been reached. Efforts were made by Winebrenner's friends to bring about harmony. A division of sentiment existed in the congregation, and an effort was made to reconcile the parties, on condition that Winebrenner would quit holding so many prayer-meetings, to which he declined to agree. For some reason he did not preach, as conditionally announced, on Friday evening. This the Vestry regarded as a virtual resignation of the charge. Winebrenner, however, did not so understand it, and continued to manifest a desire to preach for the congregation. On this account, and because fully one-half of the membership were his friends, the Vestry met at his home on a week-day evening, when it was stated that they had come to have a conference with him as to what he intended to do, and also to inform him what arrangements they proposed to make with him for the future. The Vestry stated that they had collected the salary due him, and that if he would conform to their rules they would pay him the money, and continue him as their pastor. They insisted that he must preach for them only, and not for other congregations, and thereafter not invite so-called unordained ministers to preach in his pulpit, and not to hold more than one prayer-meeting a week, nor keep it up later than nine o'clock at night. Winebrenner answered: "I will not consent to these arrangements; for I am a free man, preach a free gospel, and I will go where the Lord calls me to go." The revival spirit by this time was dominant in his heart. February 19, 1822, he had written to his sister, stating: "We have very good and pleasant times here; from three to four prayer-meetings in our congregation each week. And the Lord sometimes comes in sacred nearness to our souls while we are waiting for him."

Sinners are awakened and made to cry for mercy. Oh, that God may be with us still, and delight to bless us." The church had largely increased numerically during his short pastorate.

The Sunday following the conference between the Vestry and Winebrenner he went to the church to preach, but the door was locked, and a large crowd had collected on the pavement and street. Finding that he could not enter the building, he and about one-half the congregation, with many others who were attracted there, proceeded to the bank of the Susquehanna river, two blocks away, near the grave of Harris, where he preached his sermon. The line of division had thus been drawn. Part of the congregation soon after this held a meeting and resolved that it considered itself freed from the relation of pastor and people which had hitherto existed between it and Winebrenner, dating from his announcement from the pulpit on March 23, 1823. This did not accord with the views of the other and larger part of the congregation. Accordingly another meeting of the male members of the congregation was held on Friday, April 18th, for the purpose of deciding whether he should resume the pastorate. After what they called "a full debate and a great discussion," they resolved by a unanimous vote not to retain him as their pastor. But this vote consisted of but twenty-one ballots, as the friends of Winebrenner had withdrawn before the vote was taken. The whole difficulty was brought before the German Reformed Synod at Bedford, Pa., which decided that the Harrisburg charge was not vacant, and that an election must be held to determine whether Winebrenner shall be their pastor. The Synod met in September, 1824, and on October 11th, Winebrenner notified the Vestry of its decision. No attention being paid to this notice, printed notices were served on the congregations by Winebrenner's friends, ordering an election on November 3, 1824, by printed tickets, as follows: "For J. Winebrenner;" "Against J. Winebrenner." But this election did not heal the breach, nor cure the trouble, because Winebrenner's opponents did not attend the election. Of those who did attend a majority of nearly two hundred male members voted for him. His opponents ignored the whole matter, for long before this meeting they had called and elected Alfred Helfenstein, Jr., who became pastor March 24, 1824. A formal separation had thus been effected, and a large number of the friends of Winebrenner withdrew from the congregation. These, with Winebrenner, worshiped in the Court House, in the market-house, on the banks of the river, in private houses and in groves. Winebrenner also preached at other points in Dauphin and Cumberland counties, as it is said: "The work of grace spread far and wide, and calls for preaching came from many places, which were cheerfully and quickly responded to. As the word was preached with great power, both in English and in German, by the now noted revivalist, multitudes flocked to the standard of the cross."

At the other three churches of which Winebrenner was pastor—Shoopes's and Wenrick's, in Dauphin county, and the Stone church, or Salem, in Cumberland county—he received similar treatment to that in Harrisburg. At Shoopes's there is no available record beyond the fact that "the members voted Winebrenner out." At Wenrick's, a member of said church, and afterwards a minister in the church of God, Jacob Myers, who settled in Linglestown as a physician in 1823, briefly narrates events at that church in 1824. He says: "My wife and I were communicant members of Winebrenner's church, and Winebrenner christened our first child. At that time there was considerable opposition to Winebrenner by many here as well as in Harrisburg, where he resided. They said he was too much of a Methodist, and departed from the old landmarks of the German Reformed Church. The reason they said so was because he held prayer-meetings, and preached earnestly, and insisted on the people to repent and embrace heartfelt religion." The doors of this church were also closed against Winebrenner, but not until a few years later. An eye witness of the last services which Winebrenner held at the Stone church says: "I was also present during the time that a meeting was held in the Stone church, near Shiremanstown, Pa., about five miles west of Harrisburg. A great reformation was going on, many were at the altar for prayers, with many weeping and some shouting praises to the Savior on account of salvation from sins forgiven. After this revival meeting had continued for about a week, the door of this church edifice was locked. John Winebrenner stood on the stone steps before the house and, looking up toward heaven, said to a large congregation which had come to hear him: 'The people can lock houses, but they can not lock the door of heaven.' This saying affected and excited the people so much that many wept, and others praised God aloud. Then the audience went to the old school-house close by, and Winebrenner preached there, continuing the meetings for many days, and many were saved from their sins." This building is still standing, but the Reformed church is about extinct. The Lutheran church, which worshiped in the same house, built a fine brick edifice; but once a year, the last Sunday in September, they "hold the chief service in the old Stone Church." This church was built in 1798, the corner-stone having been laid June 12, 1798, and the church dedicated May 19, 1799. The school-house was also the property of the Stone church congregations, and stood on the corner of the grave-yard. It has been replaced by the township with a brick school-house, and is used by the common school of the district.

Thus Winebrenner's relation as pastor was broken with two of the churches of his charge, yet he continued to preach at the other two points, and was still a member and minister of the German Reformed Church, in regular standing in the Synod which ordained him. The proceedings by the two churches of his charge had not been brought before the Synod. But his work in the Reformed Church was evidently nearing its end, although the Synod had not yet dissolved the pastoral relation. There was also more or less unrest among other Churches during this period. Among the Lutherans the revival spirit spread to a limited extent. But the general religious condition in both the Reformed and Lutheran Churches was not improved. Persecution was the weapon taken up against those who were classed as Methodists. The old element seemed to wax worse, and the pulpits were replenished with unrenowned men. It is the testimony of men of this period that "all kinds of sin and vices reigned in all the Churches, or so-called Christian congregations; and when now and then a person was found who saw the corruption to some extent, and ventured to censure it and to disapprove the spurious service of God, he was considered and despised as a fanatic. The few individuals who were better disposed and anxious to save their souls, were suppressed, and had but little influence on their rough fellow-members." Even among the United Brethren and Evangelicals "the work had begun to stagnate, and then to retrograde." But this served only to inflame the zeal of those self-denying ministers who endured the hardships of an itinerant life. Through their prayers and efforts the dawn of a more blessed day began to break with the year 1823. There were "glorious awakenings" in counties within a radius of fifty to seventy-five miles from Harrisburg. The first camp-meetings in this section were held by the Evangelicals "which were richly blessed with God's grace and the conversion of many precious souls."

In 1822 the "True Reformed Dutch Church" was formed. It seceded from the Dutch Reformed Church on account, as they declared, of errors of doctrine and looseness of discipline; but in reality it was the culmination of an old feud. Yet generally more stress was placed on doctrine than on piety and morality. A knowledge of this fact makes it more easily conceivable that matters of doctrine in no wise entered into the original movement which resulted in the organization of the United Brethren Church, the Evangelical Association and the Church of God.

In 1820 the first Methodist church was organized in Harrisburg, in what is now the Jewish Synagogue, on North Second Street. Later a house of worship was built on Locust street. It was with this church that Winebrenner sometimes worshipped, participated in the Love-feast, and for which he occasionally preached. It is now Grace M. E. Church, on State street.

Two events of this period of a political character occurred which became memorable in their subsequent effect on the ecclesiastical and political history of the country. These are the admission into the Union of Maine, in 1820, and of Missouri, in 1821. The former was the first State to adopt a rigorous Prohibitory Act, which became known as the "Maine law," and which figured so largely in the temperance discussions and deliverances of religious bodies for a number of years. The admission of the latter marked a new epoch in the political world, as it began the first geographical division of political parties in the United States, and was intimately connected with the religious controversies and the ecclesiastical schisms of later years.

CHAPTER III.

THE year 1825 marks a new epoch in the life and labors of Winebrenner. He was still the minister of Shoope's and Wenrick's churches, and the Synod of the German Reformed Church had not yet acted on his case. But he soon ceased to be a pastor, and became an aggressive revivalist. He had not changed his theological views, which had always been consistent with evangelistic conceptions and methods. But soul-saving now became the dominant principle of his ministerial life, and he became distinctively and preeminently an evangelist, in which line his labors were crowned with unusual success. He modestly recorded this fact in the "History of All the Religious Denominations in the United States" in these words: "About this time (1825) more extensive and glorious revivals of religion commenced in different towns and neighborhoods, to wit: Harrisburg, Shiremanstown, Lisburn, Mechanicsburg, Churchtown, New Cumberland, Linglestown, Middletown, Millerstown [or Annville], Lebanon, Lancaster, Shippensburg, Elizabethtown, Mount Joy, Marietta and various other places. In these glorious revivals there were hundreds and multitudes happily converted to God. The conversion of these scores and multitudes in different places led to the organization of churches." Under his "searching ministrations" this work of grace began in Reformed churches of which he was pastor, and had already resulted in the closing of the houses of worship at Harrisburg and near Shiremanstown. The latter was later reopened for preaching by Winebrenner, and he preached there until 1827, when he closed his labors and "left it of his own free will, whilst a large majority of the members of that church followed him as he preached in private houses and other meeting-houses as an independent preacher." It was on this independent basis that churches of God were first organized, as Winebrenner stated in 1844—"Subject to no extrinsic or foreign jurisdiction." At Wenrick's church he continued to preach with the consent of the church until the Spring of 1826, when there were two other candidates for the pulpit, and Winebrenner was defeated by one vote, two of his friends being absent. He continued to preach in said church until the following Spring, when the door was locked against him, and he preached an impromptu sermon on the stone steps, from the text: "The door was shut." The congregation at Shoope's church in 1826 also voted him out.

But Winebrenner was still a member of the Synod of the German Reformed Church. In 1825 the troubles between Winebrenner and the churches of his charge came before Synod from the Lebanon Classis, an intermediate judicatory between the churches and the Synod. The action of the Classis was approved, but the character of the action is not on record on the Minutes of the Synod. Winebrenner was present at this meeting of the Synod, the last one he attended. At the meeting of the Synod, held at Frederick, Md., September, 1826, records show the following:

"The Committee on Correspondence reported:

"A letter from the Rev. Henry Hoffmiller, in which he complains, in a moderate way, of the disorderly conduct of the Rev. J. Winebrenner, H. Habliston and D. Werz.

"Resolved, That this Synod can not take up and decide this matter, because the complaints in the letter against the brethren should properly, in the first place, come before the Classis."

In 1827 the Synod met at York, Pa., when the matter came up from the Lebanon Classis through the Committee on Minutes of Classis. The Committee reported from said Minutes:

"Charges against the Rev. John Winebrenner.

"Resolved, That they be referred to a committee, who shall meet in a place to be appointed by themselves, to try these charges against Rev. John Winebrenner, and make report to Synod. The Committee are Rev. F. W. Vandersloot, Lebrecht L. Hirsch and Jacob Beecher."

At the meeting of Synod held in 1828, at Mifflinburg, Pa., the following action was taken:

"The Committee which had been appointed by the Synod at a meeting held at York, Pa., to investigate the case of Revs. Messrs. Winebrenner and Hobliston, and to report at this meeting, reported that Mr. Winebrenner had not obeyed their citation, and he did not appear before them, and that in their opinion he ought not to be any longer considered a member of this body."

"The report and the judgment expressed in it, were approved."

Two different constructions were afterward put on this final action, and hence two different dates are given when Winebrenner's connection with the Reformed Church ceased. The action of the Synod has been interpreted as equivalent to expulsion, and thus the date of Winebrenner's severance from the German Reformed Church would be September, 1828. A letter dated September 30, 1843, by "A Friend to Truth," calls the action of Synod "the expelling act." And a letter dated July 14, 1843, by "A Friend to the German Reformed Church," states that "Synod excommunicated him in 1828." But the former also declares that "Mr. Winebrenner did secede, or cease to meet with Classis and Synod for three years before" 1828. This accords with the Minutes of Synod. Winebrenner nowhere speaks of having been expelled. He says: "However, my reasons for withdrawing from your Church were not merely because I found her thus exceedingly degenerated, and was persecuted by both ministers and people. I withdrew from her communion for various reasons." Hence, biographers of Winebrenner, writing from his point of view, have generally stated that he himself severed his relation with the German Reformed Church in 1825. This is confirmed by his own statement in a letter to Dr. J. W. Nevin, dated "Harrisburg, Pa., Sept. 30th, 1842," in which he says: "I withdrew from the German Reformed Church in the year 1825, and not, as you state, in 1829."

The movement by Winebrenner was not schismatic. It was reformatory. If the German Reformed Church had responded to it a reformation would have resulted in the Church. It did not divide the Church, nor detach a part of it to form a new Church. But the larger portion of the converts under Winebrenner the first few years of his independent labors were members of Reformed and Lutheran churches. The religious conditions in these two denominations were extremely low. The membership was largely composed of unsaved persons. Under the characteristic preaching of Winebrenner large numbers of these unconverted members were brought under conviction and sought the blessing of regeneration. These Churches constituted good ground on which to do evangelistic work. Not only did Winebrenner characterize the Reformed Church of that early day as "exceedingly degenerate," but also possessed of "a diabolical temper—I mean a spirit of pride, bigotry and persecution." Dr. Nevin, one of the great leaders in the Reformed Church, acknowledges that "True serious piety is too often treated with open and marked scorn. In the bosom of the Church itself it is stigmatized as schwaermerei, kopfsaengerel, or miserable, driveling Methodism. Experimental religion in all its forms was eschewed as a new-fangled invention of cunning impostors brought in to turn the heads of the weak and to lead captive silly women. Prayer-meetings were held to be a spiritual abomination. Family worship was a species of saintly affectation barely tolerable in the case of ministers (though many of them gloried rather in having no altar in their houses), but absolutely disgraceful for common Christians. To show an awakened concern on the subject of religion, a disposition to call upon God in daily secret prayer, was to incur certain reproach." The consensus of historical views is that in this third decade of the nineteenth century among these Churches of the Reformed faith scarcely any spiritual life could be discerned; that formalism took the place of religion; that to have been baptized, then confirmed, and afterward to take Communion once a year was considered quite enough to constitute a man a good Christian, and that all kinds of sins and vices were practiced both among professors and non-professors of religion.

Winebrenner did not entertain the purpose of founding a new denomination. These bodies he stigmatized as sects. Professor Nevins called the United Brethren and like bodies "rolling balls," and accused Winebrenner with "putting in motion a similar ball, which continues rolling to this hour [1842], not without abundance of noise." Winebrenner denounced this as gross misrepresentation: "But, sir, I did not retire for the ignoble purpose, as you have intimated, of putting another sectarian ball in motion. No, not at all. I had seen, through mercy, the great evil of these rolling balls, put in motion and kept in motion by the cunning craftiness of men and devils, and how by their repeated and unhappy collusions they hindered and marred the work of God in the earth; and, therefore, I resolved to fall back upon original grounds—to stand aloof from all these sectarian balls, and to do the work of an evangelist and minister of Christ by building up the church of God (the only true church) according to the plan and pattern as shown us in the New Testament. This is the high and firm ground we take. Our ball, therefore, is not like your ball, nor similar to other human balls. Ours is the Lord's ball. It was not cut out of the Romish Church by the hands of Calvin and others as was yours. But it was 'cut out of the mountain without hands.' The ball commenced rolling upwards of eighteen hundred years ago, and it continues rolling to this hour; yea, and it will never cease rolling till every other man-made ball shall be either crushed or rolled up by it, and until the sound of it shall be 'like the sound of many waters, and as the voice of great thunder.'"

Though these views were expressed much later than the date of Winebrenner's first revival campaign, they represent his original purpose. The results of those early labors were the manifestation and exponent of that purpose—"extensive and glorious revivals." These began at Harrisburg, near Shiremanstown, at Lisburn and Linglestown, at which points he labored as a Reformed minister, and where some hundreds—"multitudes"—were converted before a church was organized. During this period his labors extended as far as York, Lancaster, Lebanon and Shippensburg, but principally were limited to a radius of nine miles from Harrisburg. The converts were largely members of Reformed and Lutheran churches. These no longer found a congenial home in these formal churches, and so began to agitate the question of local church organizations. During the revival in Harrisburg, which followed the closing of the doors of Salem church against Winebrenner, there were about one hundred conversions, which with those who came out of the church with him made a company of nearly two hundred souls. They had no permanent place of worship. The use of the old log church which the Reformed congregation vacated on August 4, 1822, was refused to Winebrenner and his followers, and they were obliged to worship in the Court House, the Market House, on the river bank, in private houses and lumber yards. Winebrenner was indisposed to begin the organization of churches. The uniform testimony of his contemporaries is that he "had not at the beginning the remotest idea of organizing a distinct or separate body of people." But driven out of the pulpits of the Reformed Church, ostracised and persecuted, he was led to a closer personal investigation of church polity. He went to the highest source for light. He applied himself with singleness of purpose to the study of the word of God. The result was a material modification of his former views on ecclesiology. As he himself testified later: "As the writer's views had by this time materially changed as to the true nature of a scriptural organization of churches, he adopted the apostolic plan, as taught in the New Testament, and established spiritual, free and independent churches, consisting of believers or Christians only, without any human name, or creed, or ordinances, or laws." The local church was the unit. It possessed perfect autonomy. It was wholly independent of every other unit. Each such unit "possesses in its organized state," as Winebrenner expressed it in 1829, "sufficient power to perform all acts of religious worship, and everything relating to ecclesiastical government and discipline. Every individual church is strictly independent of all others as it respects religious worship and the general government of its own affairs." Fellowship between these "free and independent" units there would be, but no higher organization was then recognized by Winebrenner which could limit the powers of the local church. Each of these local organizations would accept no human name, creed or ordinances; but would adopt the divine name, and creed, and ordinances. Winebrenner had not yet changed his views on doctrine and ordinances. In his broad platform he saw a basis of the union of all Christians and Churches. And so the imperative duty of cultivating union between all believers was strongly urged. These views prepared the way for Winebrenner to fall in with the growing demand for local church organization. For the multitudes of converts had "conceived the idea of, and begun to talk about, organizing themselves into churches founded on Bible doctrines and principles even before Winebrenner had determined in his own mind to do so."

Mulberry Street Union Bethel.

The First House of Worship Built by a Church of God.

There has been a good deal of contention over the question of priority in the organization of churches of God. Claims have been strongly urged in favor of each of three organizations, viz.: Lower Paxton Township, commonly called Miller's church; Linglestown, and Harrisburg. Winebrenner has left nothing on record touching this question. Primacy has to be established by other testimony. The earliest date given is 1825. Judge Pearson gives this date in his Opinion in the Equity suit of John Winebrenner et al. versus James Colder et al. He says: "In the year 1825 a congregation of worshipers was formed in this place [Harrisburg], calling itself 'the church of God at Harrisburg,' and professing to have no other creed than the Bible, with an independent church government. The denomination thus started continued to flourish and spread over the State, forming many congregations, having no connection with each other until the year 1830, when a confederation took place, as the witnesses say, for the mere purpose of co-operation, by which an Eldership was formed." This Opinion was delivered Aug. 3, 1861. Winebrenner was one of the witnesses, as the case was started more than a year before his death. The principal corroborative testimony is found in the "Bill in Equity" in the suit above referred to, in which is this statement: "Your Orators further show that the church of God at Harrisburg was duly organized about the year 1825." That the organization was effected prior to 1827 is the testimony of A. C. Raysor, who received his data from Andrew Miller, in whose house the Lower Paxton church was organized, and who was a member of the first Eldership. Upon this and other evidence he avers that the church in Harrisburg was the first organization of a church of God. In September, 1856, J. F. Weishampel, Sr., who was connected officially with The Gospel Publisher and The Church Advocate when the editorial department was in the basement of the "Mulberry Street Bethel," wrote that said bethel was "built by the first congregation of the church of God." J. Q. Fryer, in March, 1873, gave public testimony that the church in Harrisburg was first organized: "I was present when they went into the first organization at Harrisburg, Pa. That created considerable stir among sectarians, but up to that time some of them had hoped that Winebrenner would unite with them. They raised the cry that he had set up for himself." So that while a later date has been given (1829) by some writers, it seems evident that "the church of God at Harrisburg" was organized prior to 1827, and possibly in 1825.

As to the date when the first house of worship by a church of God was built there can be no dispute. True, there has been rivalry on this point between the advocates of priority for Linglestown and Harrisburg; but the testimony in favor of either is clear and explicit, and is in favor of the latter. Inscriptions in stone are better than the testimony of witnesses. Weishampel calls the bethel in Harrisburg "the old, original bethel." He saw the corner-stone, and states that "the church here has reserved the pulpit for their own use, and the seats for sale; and they also will take out of the wall the corner-stone and its contents." He adds, that the bethel was built in 1827. Winebrenner, at the laying of the corner-stone of the Fourth Street Bethel, in September, 1854, in his Address on the occasion, says: "Twenty-seven years ago we laid the corner-stone of the 'Union Bethel' on Mulberry street." A. C. Raysor, later a member of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, but who was born and raised within two miles of Harrisburg, and whose father was a member of the church organized at the farmhouse of Andrew Miller, wrote in February, 1880: "I remember reading the inscription on the corner-stone of the bethel on Mulberry street many times. I think it reads: 'This Union Bethel, built A. D. 1827.'" According to Weishampel's statement this corner-stone was "reserved" by the church when the Mulberry street property was sold, and for many years it was lying in the cellar of the Fourth Street Bethel. When the Nagle Street Bethel, Harrisburg, was built it was removed, and changed to be the corner-stone of that bethel. But the old inscription remains on the stone. "The Harrisburg Telegraph," in its issue of Nov. 6, 1874, gives an account of the corner-stone laying of the Nagle Street church, in which is this paragraph: "The corner-stone was taken from the old church building on Mulberry street, where the City Hospital now stands. It bears the following inscription: 'The Union Bethel. Built A. D. 1827.'"

Other testimony is to the effect that it was in the early part of the Summer of 1827 that this Union Bethel was built and dedicated. This property was sold when, in 1854, the present house of worship on Fourth street was erected, and which Winebrenner strenuously insisted should be called "The Metropolitan Bethel."

In 1824-5 Winebrenner began preaching at intervals in Linglestown, or St. Thomas as it was originally called, before the doors of Wenrick's Reformed and Lutheran church were closed against him. This church is located about half a mile eastward from the village. Later, in 1827, he preached regularly in the village, in the school-house, in private houses and under the trees. As school-houses were everywhere open for preaching there was less immediate need for the building of a house of worship. Yet the order was reversed, and the bethel was built before the church was organized. A number of Winebrenner's friends, some of whom had been catechized by him and who were afterwards converted under his preaching, withdrew from the church and followed him to the village. They felt that "they could not retain their spiritual life by remaining in those churches to which they had formerly belonged, and which had totally sunk into a dead and spiritless formality." Yet for more than two years they maintained their separate existence without an organization. According to the official Records a meeting of these converts was called for June 29, 1829, when a regular church organization was effected. They drew up a regular "covenant" in these words:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby mutually covenant and agree to form ourselves into a church of God on the New Testament plan.

"We further agree to take the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the only authoritative rule of our Christian faith and practice.

"And, moreover, we promise cheerfully and quietly to submit to the order of Christ's house, and to obey the office-bearers who are, or at any time may be, placed over us in the Lord."

To this covenant were signed the following names: John Moyer, Peter Bonawitz, John Walborn, Frederick Deal, John Forney, John Bretz, Daniel Lingle, Abraham Shope, John Strohm, Conrad Laufermach, John Carmany, David Shafner, Solomon Felty, John Huffnagle, William Cassel, William Crum, Jacob Huffnagle, William Pretz, Christian Forney, George Burgoen, John Geesey, John Duncan, Joseph Gerverich, Thomas Pretz, Benjamin Reeme, Peter Crum, Samuel Hicks, Augustus Stoner, John Hatz, Jacob Burgoyne, Henry Geesey, David Maxwell, David Walborn, John Shope, Elizabeth Gerberich, Elizabeth Crum, Sarah Miller, Catherine Bretz, Elizabeth Shope, Margaret Walborn, Barbara Ulrich, Barbara Lingle, Sarah Smith, May Shartzler, Catherine Unger, Polly Pletz, Catherine Shaffner, Jane Culpin, Amelia Fritchey, Sarah Strohm, Elizabeth Nantel, Mary Stoner, Elizabeth Garverich, Matilda Dorsey, Catherine Wenrich, Elizabeth Reeme, Mary Felty, Maria Baker, Jane Pergey, Anna Burgeon, Elizabeth Shaffner, Dorothy Fritchey, Elizabeth Dumars, Mary Bretz, Mary Reeme, Mary Burlin, Polly Carson, Barbara Forney, Catherine Focht, Susanna Smith, Elizabeth Forney, Catherine Huffnagle, Mary Stuart, Margaret Stuart, Rebecca Feezer, Barbara Bonawitz, Mary Garverich, Margaret Garverich, Sarah Huffnagle and Anna Cassel.

The church thus constituted proceeded to effect an organization by the election of the following:—Elders: John Walborn, Peter Crum, Peter Bonawitz, William Pretz, Christian Forney. Deacons: John Bretz, John Forney and Benjamin Reeme. "These brethren," the Minutes state, "were duly elected by a majority vote of the members."

The date of the building of the first bethel in Linglestown is not quite so definitely known. Benjamin Reeme, one of the deacons elected in 1829, in a letter published in February, 1880, says he worked at the bethel during its erection, and that it was "built in the Summer of 1827, just before harvest." A. Snyder, in a discussion of this subject in the same year concludes that "the old bethel in Linglestown was built in the forepart of the Summer of 1827." But evidently the work was not finished at the time here indicated, for Benjamin Reeme further testifies that the house was "dedicated on Christmas day."

First Bethel, Linglestown.

A "protracted meeting" began with the dedication, which resulted in quite a revival and a number of accessions to the as yet unorganized church. Those were the "seasons of glorious revivals" with which these young churches were blessed. In them many "who were confirmed as members of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, but who afterward found themselves still poor sinners, without religion and without peace to their troubled souls, sought the Lord like weeping Mary, and found him to the joy and comfort of their souls."

After standing twenty-four years, in 1851 a tower and steeple were built at the south gable end of the bethel and a bell placed therein, "which continued to call the multitudes to the service of the sanctuary till the old bethel was replaced by a new building," in the year 1870.

Struck by lightning during funeral services September 15, 1893, it escaped serious damage, and withstood the storms of thirty-five Winters, to be finally torn down and replaced in a new location in the village by a building of modern architecture, in the year 1905.

The work in Lower Paxton Township, Dauphin county, at Andrew Miller's, was peculiar. Andrew Miller's dwelling-house, on his farm, a mile south of Shoope's church, was the "meeting-house." There was stated preaching there every eight weeks by John Neidig and Jacob Roop. The former was a regular minister of the United Brethren Church, a farmer, of German birth, and formerly a member of the Mennonite Church. Roop at this time was not a minister of the United Brethren Church, but had affiliated with them. He taught and practiced immersion and feet-washing, as did Neidig. It is from this source, and not from Winebrenner, that they received these ordinances, and that they were introduced into the United Brethren Church of that day. Boehm, a prominent leader in said Church, was also originally a Mennonite. Abraham Moyer, another minister of the United Brethren Church, baptized Andrew Miller and his wife and one daughter. Many of the members of this little company of believers were converted as long as ten years before a church organization was effected, or even before Winebrenner left the Reformed Church. They were principally German farmers, and worshiped God in the humble simplicity of those early days. It is not in evidence that any of them had been members of the Reformed Church. But whether or not, they stood aloof from all ecclesiastical bodies, and because of their aversion to sectarianism did not organize themselves into a local church for some years. Neidig and Roop urged organization. Winebrenner had no connection with them. They had ministers of the United Brethren Church to preach for them. They held prayer-meetings and observed the three ordinances of immersion, the Lord's Supper and washing of the saints' feet.

When these believers were finally prevailed upon to consider seriously the matter of church organization, a meeting was called for that purpose at the farmhouse of Andrew Miller, four miles east of Harrisburg. The meeting was called by Jacob Snyder and Jacob Roop, Snyder also being an accredited minister of the United Brethren Church. They were both present and participated in the deliberations and the services. Roop joined the organization, but Snyder did not. Roop afterwards went back to the United Brethren Church. The date of this meeting can not be positively fixed. It was on a Tuesday evening, but the day of the month and the year are uncertain. A. C. Raysor states in a communication of February 25, 1880, that it was "in the beginning of the year 1830," but in a general statement in the same communication he says it was between 1828 and 1830. The point was a part of a United Brethren circuit, and Raysor knew that Neldig was preacher in charge of this circuit during the period from 1828 to 1830, "and in that time the church was organized." Samuel Miller, son of Andrew Miller, in his "Recollections of the History and the Origin and First Organization of the Church of God in North America," published in 1905, says the church at his father's house was organized "about the year A. D. 1828." He fixes this date by the date of the first organization at Linglestown, June 29, 1829, which was "soon after the organization of the church at the dwelling-house of Andrew Miller."

Winebrenner's connection with this movement began with this meeting. He was invited to be present, and "to aid them by his counsel." When the company had assembled they concluded that a sermon should be preached, by one of the preachers present, on "The Scriptural Organization and Government of the Church." Winebrenner was selected to preach the sermon. He at first declined, saying, that he "had not come there to take any part at all, but simply to see and to hear." But being strongly urged, he finally consented, and preached the substance of what is since known as "Winebrenner's Brief View of the Formation, Government and Discipline of the Church of God." As this work was first published in 1829, and possibly prior to the organization of the Lower Paxton Township (or Miller's) church, it helps to fix the date of said organization in 1829. After the sermon they proceeded to enroll the names of those who were ready "to enter into a church relationship with each other, and to take nothing but the Bible as their rule of faith and practice." Nineteen names were subscribed, viz.: Andrew Miller, Abraham Bomberger, Christian Hoover, Daniel Raysor, John Raysor, Jacob Roop, Daniel Shell, John Lenkert, Barnard Shope, Thomas Whitmyer, Henry Herr, Anna Miller, Fanny Hoover, Esther Hoover, Barbara Raysor, Susannah Raysor, Elizabeth Shope, Nancy Swartz, Catharine Lenkert. The officers elected were:—Elders: Andrew Miller, Abraham Bomberger and Daniel Raysor. Deacons: John Lenkert and Barnard Shope.

At the close of these services the ordinances of the Lord's house were administered, and Winebrenner was "invited to participate with them in the ordinance of washing of the saints' feet religiously." He replied: "Brethren, I can not go any faster than I have light." Miller states that "soon after that meeting he received light, and observed the ordinance of the washing of the saints' feet religiously, and advocated its observance." Up to this time he had changed his views only on the organization, name, government and discipline of the church. This Lower Paxton church, though it became largely disintegrated by removals and withdrawals, is the parent of the Progress church of God, and the grand-parents of the Penbrook church of God.

One of the most notable meetings held by Winebrenner in his early years was what was called "the great revival at Lisburn," in Cumberland county, near the York county line, south of Shiremanstown. He paid his first visit to this little village in 1824. "The people of Lisburn hired him to preach for them in the year 1825." A number were converted during that year, among them were Samuel Sherick, Benjamin Mohler, Isaac Millard and "the father of Thomas Hickernell," subsequently the great revivalist of the West. But "the great revival" followed, in 1826, when the Hickernell brothers were converted. Thomas Hickernell states that "the meetings were held in a large room in a tavern-stand owned by Mr. McCann. He himself was converted on the last Friday in February, 1826. In graphic language he recites one of the most impressive scenes of the great meeting: "On the evening of the above-named day, when the congregation was assembled, Winebrenner came from an adjoining room with a child in his arms, and held it up before the people, and said, 'Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye can not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' A certain Presbyterian lady cried out most bitterly for mercy. In less than five minutes her soul was set at liberty, and she called on her husband, and after they embraced each other, weeping over each other's necks, they took their seats. Winebrenner still stood erect, with his eyes closed and his arms stretched out, crying out with a loud voice, 'My God! and hast thou sent me here to preach to-day?' He then stood up on a bench and preached a short but plain discourse. When he was through quite a number got down where they were sitting to be prayed for." Others came forward to a bench near where Winebrenner stood while he preached. An unusually large number of persons professed conversion at this meeting.

Many of these converts associated themselves together and held prayer-meetings and other religious services. John Hickernell not long after his conversion "occasionally exercised in exhortation," and later entered the regular ministry. Thomas Hickernell "commenced opening religious meetings at the age of sixteen," and when twenty years of age he entered the ministry. For about two years these converts were thus held together, when in 1828 the first organization was effected. Thomas Hickernell, March 31, 1880, recorded this fact in these words: "The church at Lisburn was organized in 1828, two years after I was converted." But there was considerable native talent in this church, by the use of which, and the deep personal piety of the members, its life was preserved and its growth continued uninterruptedly during this chaotic period. Five of these converts, including the two Hickernells, became preachers of that same gospel which so gloriously saved them.

Andersontown, York county, within a short distance of Lisburn, has by some been given priority over all the other organizations of churches of God. The pastor of the circuit which includes Lisburn and Andersontown, in 1880, stated that his field embraced "some of the points where the Church was first organized and known as the Church of God a little over fifty years ago." He then claims that "the church at Andersontown was first formally organized about the year 1826, with the following named persons: John Hutton, William Tate, Jacob May, John Ayres, Samuel Arter, Henry Beck and a few others whose names are not mentioned." Among others "who were gradually added were John Wiley, George Wiley and wife, Jacob Traver and wife and a few others." Jacob Traver died at Marysville, Pa., in October, 1880, and was survived by John Wiley, who, according to his pastor's statement, was "the only one of the original organization which survived him." He stated at that time that "the church at Andersontown was organized in the year 1836."

"The History of Dauphin County, Pa., by Luther Reilly Kelker," 1907, states that "the first members of this congregation [the Middletown church of God], in 1827, were Susanna Smuller, ——— Bare, Elizabeth King, Jacob Rife, Joshua Heppich, Jacob Benner, John Benner, Henry Siple, Joseph Ross, George Smuller, George Etter, Conrad Seabauch, George Baker, John McFarland, Eliza Longhead and Eva Crist. The first elders (1827) were Joshua Heppich and John McFarland." The corroborative item in this narrative is, that this occurred about the time of the organization of the church at Linglestown. This evidently refers to the building of the Bethel at Linglestown, and not the organization of the church. This date also corresponds with other facts and evidence which are accessible.

As early as 1822 Winebrenner contemplated preaching at Middletown. One of the complaints heard by the trial Committee on October 2, 1822, was that Winebrenner "has already made arrangements to give up two of the congregations which form a part of our connection." Winebrenner's answer to this was, "That as Middletown and Hummelstown were once part of the Harrisburg charge, and are destitute of preaching, he intended to supply them for awhile, provided arrangements could be made with the country churches." How long he preached at Middletown can not be determined, but he had made quite a number of friends, some of whom were recognized as "members of his congregation," and who secured his services at the funeral of Mrs. Black prior to the Winter of 1825. He also had pronounced enemies, who at this funeral "refused to have anything to do with him, on the ground that he was not a minister in good standing in any Church." The funeral sermon was preached in the old Lutheran stone house of worship, and so favorable was the impression made upon the minds of many in the congregation that he was invited to return and preach. This he did in the Winter of 1825. At this time there were only two houses of worship in the town. The doors of the Lutheran house were soon closed against him, the interest being so intense that the house at times could not contain half the people that gathered from town and country to listen to the eloquent and impressive sermons which fell from the lips of Winebrenner." But Mrs. Flanagan, who had charge of the Ebenezer Methodist meeting-house, opened that building to him, and under his ministrations a great revival commenced. He continued preaching alternately in this house with the Methodist circuit preacher for some time. Jacob Benner was one of the converts of this meeting, the first revival services Winebrenner held at Middletown. But no church organization was formed at this time.

In January, 1827, "Winebrenner, in connection with some other ministers," again conducted a revival meeting in Middletown. One of the converts of this meeting was Jacob J. Miller, later a minister in the Iowa Eldership, who died July 5, 1874. He gave the date of his conversion as "Sabbath evening, January 27, 1827," and states that this was "before there were any churches of God organized." But as at the time he was living in Conawago township, York county, he might not have been informed of what had been done in other localities in Dauphin county. In his account of the laying of the corner-stone of the second bethel at Middletown, July 8, 1874, the pastor, George Sigler, read a brief history of the church of God at Middletown. He states that "the little group of Christians which was formed in 1827 continued to spread its influence until this whole community has felt its power for good." If this statement is equivalent to the organization of the church, then the year is positively fixed.

Winebrenner's first visit to Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, Pa., was in the Summer of 1826. Dr. George Ross, a native of the place, and later one of the most prominent and influential laymen of the Church, in 1880 gave an interesting account of Winebrenner's preaching there at that time. The news of his separation from the Reformed Church caused "the wildest opposition and the most intense religious excitement." The multitude are impulsive; move quickly, and lack the self-restraint of the few. They were anxious to hear the new leader of religious thought, and he received many invitations to visit the town and proclaim the gospel. His fame had preceded him, and wherever he went large numbers flocked to hear him, traveling often long distances for that purpose. There were remarkable displays of God's power under his preaching. When he consented to preach a sermon at Elizabethtown no church-house could be secured in the village, and arrangements were made for him to preach at Ober's meeting-house, on the turnpike about two miles west of the town. A great crowd came together, many walking the two miles from Elizabethtown. Winebrenner was no sensationalist. It was only the power of the gospel he preached which created sensations. Many, however, believed that he possessed supernatural powers over his audiences. His text on this occasion was characteristic: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." The report went out from this service that "the preaching was very plain, and wonderful in its power; that he was a superior preacher, and spoke nothing but the truth." This gained him an entrance, through one of the ruling elders, into the pulpit of the Lutheran church in the town. There he held services later in the same Summer. But it made such a disturbance in the church that one of the elders withdrew from the church, and the pastor was obliged to defend himself for permitting Winebrenner to preach in his pulpit. On this occasion his text was, "Our Father, which art in heaven." He insisted that only Christians could say, "Our Father" with truth, and that the wicked and unconverted could with more propriety say, "Our Father, which art in hell."

He next visited Elizabethtown and preached in the Fall of 1826. The services were held in the bar-room of the hotel, kept by Major Michael Breneman, in which benches and chairs had been placed to accommodate the people. While opposition became fiercer, friends increased and gathered around the faithful gospel messenger. The use of an old school-house, standing in an alley, was secured, and here Winebrenner preached occasionally. Many were converted at his meetings, which were nearly always held on week evenings. His plan was to preach in the afternoon, and hold prayer and inquiry meetings in the evening. In some instances violence was threatened; but while opposition was intense, a restraining providence held back the enraged mob. The converts of these meetings, however, were not constituted a church, and duly organized, until about ten years later. Persecuted and despised; practically driven out of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, "they banded together and defended each other against the assaults of their enemies. The scoffings of the people brought about a strong bond of union, and love, and Christian fellowship. They kept together, however, and held prayer-meetings. For a while there was no preaching in Elizabethtown, but in the vicinity of it, chiefly at the house of Michael Cramer, east of town."

While Lebanon county is referred to as territory on which work was done by Winebrenner prior to 1830, no churches were organized in said county until later. He held a protracted meeting in Annville (then Millerstown), near the town of Lebanon, "soon after he had commenced his labors independent of the Reformed Church"; but the church at said place was not then organized, though quite a number of unconverted members of the Reformed Church sought and found the blessing of the new birth, which Winebrenner so faithfully preached." Some of the converts at a camp-meeting held at Middletown in 1827 were from Annville, and carried the good news to that village. Besides, in 1827 a camp-meeting was held in a woods close to the borough of Lebanon, at which Winebrenner preached, and in the meeting-house near by. "There were marvelous displays of God's power. Men fell prostrate on the ground; scores cried for mercy, and pardoning grace was poured into many hearts."

The church of God at Lancaster city, Lancaster county, Pa., is the oldest continuous organization of the Church of God in the United States. It was established about the year 1816, under the ministry of John Elliott, a member of the first Eldership. It was an independent church, of Baptist tendencies, but had Reformed, Methodist and Baptist ministers in addition to Elliott. The date when it first affiliated with the followers of Winebrenner can not be definitely fixed, but probably about 1827. The fact that the first churches of God were all organized "on an independent basis," and that their faith was virtually identical with that of the Lancaster church, also called a church of God, would prepare the way for mutual fellowship. They owned a house of worship known as the "White Bethel," located on East Chestnut street nearly opposite the present Pennsylvania Railroad Station. Elliott was an Englishman, "a great and mighty man." Winebrenner was invited to Lancaster in 1827, and assisted in a revival, characterized as "the first great revival in Lancaster." "He preached with wonderful power. He was so wrought upon that in the middle of his sermon he stopped, and with extended, uplifted arms and trembling hands, stood in the pulpit and wept. The congregation wept aloud. The people fell on their knees all over the house, crying for mercy. About forty were converted that night." It may be assumed that from this date on the Lancaster church was one of the local organizations marshaled under the banner of the Church of God.

The divine will, like the human, works through the instrumentality of means. The Duke of Argyll, in his profound and subtle book, "The Reign of Law," thinks it curious how the language of the grand seers of the Old Testament corresponds with this idea. They ascribe all the operations of nature to the working of divine power. All things, too, are represented as in some way, often very mysterious to us, working out the divine purpose. Even the heat and passion of men, their "wrath," shall be permitted, restrained and controlled to praise God. Thus the passion of wicked men against the servants and people of God is often tributary to his praise. Furious winds, says Spurgeon, often drive vessels the more swiftly into port. So it was in more than one instance in the absence of such purpose in the rapid succession of events in those earlier years of Winebrenner's labors. The origin of the church at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Pa., was of this character. Winebrenner had been in the neighborhood of this then small village as early as 1823, as a minister of the German Reformed Church. He held some revival meetings, which were stigmatized as "new measures," and earnestly taught the necessity of regeneration as a prerequisite to church membership. On this account he was proscribed by many of the Reformed ministers and people. Five years later, or "about the year 1828," occurred the dedication of the Trindle Spring church, near Mechanicsburg. One of the elders of the Reformed church invited Winebrenner to attend the dedicatory services. He did so, but "was slighted by the Reformed ministers present," and not invited to dine with them "because of his zeal in revival measures." One of the elders of that church invited Winebrenner to dine with him; "but Winebrenner preferred praying to eating." This carried conviction to the heart of the elder, and he invited Winebrenner to preach in his carpenter-shop, which he agreed to do. At the appointed time this rustic old building was temporarily converted into a meeting-house, and in it under Winebrenner's affecting preaching of the word "a great revival of religion commenced," which resulted in the conversion of nearly all who were members of the first organization in that vicinity of the church of God. Among them was Daniel Markley, an elder in the Reformed Church whose carpenter-shop was used for church services. Also William Hinney and Jacob Beelman, elders in the same church. Following this revival a church was organized, on the following basis, in the form of a church covenant:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby mutually covenant and agree to form ourselves into a church on the New Testament plan, called the church of God at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Pa.

"We further agree to take the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the only authoritative rule of our Christian faith and practice.

"And, moreover, we promise cheerfully and quietly to submit to the order of Christ's house, and to obey the office-bearers who are, or at any time may be, placed over us in the Lord."

This is an exact copy of the Linglestown covenant, suggesting the inference that it was drafted by Winebrenner, and that the two organizations may have been effected about the same time. The testimony indicates that Winebrenner organized the Mechanicsburg church. The names subscribed to this covenant are: Jacob Coover, Ann Coover, Jonathan Rees, May Rees, John Greeger, Jonathan Ward, Elizabeth Ward, Jacob Beelman, Elizabeth Beelman, David Wise, Daniel Markley, William Hinney, Samuel Beelman, John Zearing, Mrs. John Zearing, Samuel Worst, Mrs. Samuel Worst, Michael Hoover, John Houser, Mrs. John Houser and William Wiley. The church was organized in the dwelling-house of William Wiley, half a mile west of Mechanicsburg. The officers elected were:—Elders: William Hinney and Jacob Coover. Deacons: Jonathan Rees and Michael Hoover. For some years the dwelling-houses of Daniel Markley and William Wiley were used as preaching places, while other meetings were held in other private houses in the surrounding country. The power of the Spirit was realized in these meetings, and there were frequent conversions. The memory of these precious experiences lingered long and kept warm the hearts of those that realized them.

Before the people in the neighborhood of Oak Grove Furnace had even heard of Winebrenner, in 1826 or 1827, a work of grace resulted at that place from the earnest labors of E. West. Scores were converted, among them William Adams, who in 1836 was ordained as a minister in the Ohio Eldership. Also John Reiber and wife, M. Finacle and wife, G. Dentler, A. Bony, T. Such and many others. They had no preaching for some time after West left. At the end of a year or more, during which time they read the Scriptures closely, counseled together, held prayer and experience meetings, they became convinced of the duty of closer relations to each other. They knew little of any movement to organize churches of God. A meeting was called at Reiber's school-house, where those present "entered into an agreement, pledging themselves to live as brethren, take the word of God for their rule of faith and practice, and whatever they found there to be their duty they would do." They adopted no name, but "believed that they were born into the church of God when converted." They learned that "nothing but being buried with Christ in baptism would answer," and so they "refused to be sprinkled." West returning about this time, he immersed thirty-four in Sherman's creek. This became a little later the church of God at Oak Grove Furnace.

The history of the church of God at Shippensburg, Pa., begins earlier than its first association with other churches of God. It elucidates the principle that the living are not to be looked for among the dead. Live Christians under whatever ministry converted can not remain in dead churches. Thus it came to pass that in 1825-6 a number of the members of the Lutheran, the Reformed and Presbyterian churches at Shippensburg were converted. Through their endeavors many others were brought into the fold of God. These associated together for worship and religious work, which aroused strong opposition on the part of the other members of these churches. The Lutherans and Presbyterians jointly occupied what was known as "the Brick church." Because of differences of views in regard to doctrine, experiences and manner of worship, the doors of this church were finally closed against all who favored this new departure. Thus excluded from their church-home, they entered into a separate organization, holding their meetings in private houses until they became able to build a house of worship for their own use. This they did in 1828, when they drew up the following "reasons for the building of this house:"

Second Bethel at Shippensburg.

"The German Lutherans and Presbyterians held the 'Brick Church' together in the borough of Shippensburg;

"And whereas, some differences took place as to the manner of worship, and then to the right of said church, it caused disturbance in the ranks of both congregations;

"And whereas, there were some of both congregations wishing to live in peace, it was thought best to build a house of worship for their use, and a meeting was held at the house of David Kenower, in Shippensburg, on the first day of January, 1828, and subscriptions were drawn up, and some days after the following named persons were appointed a building committee, to wit: John Blymyer, John Mull, David Kenower, David Waggoner and Samuel S. Redat, all of the borough of Shippensburg, and said committee entered upon their duties immediately, and on the 25th of February, 1828, the contracts were given out for the mason and carpenter work. On the 16th of April, 1828, the corner-stone was laid, on which occasion public service was held on the walls of said building by Rev. Brown, in the German language."

Third Bethel at Shippensburg.

This house of worship was dedicated October 27, 1828, by Rev. Rebo, assisted by Revs. McLane, Moody, Wilson and Brown, of Shippensburg. On October 13, 1828, a meeting of those who were associated together in this work was called, when they entered into a new organization, adopted a constitution for their government, and assumed the name of "The Union Christian Church." The officers who signed the constitution were:—Elders: John Hick, Jacob Dewalt and John Blymyer. Deacons: David Waggoner, Michael Ziegler, Henry Keifer and John Taughenbaugh. Trustees: Jacob Knisely and John Carey. One Article in this constitution provided that no minister should be called who was known to be a Free Mason.

Preaching was to be half the time in the English language, and half the time in the German.

The church prospered. Its doctrines and practices gradually became identical with those of the other churches of God organized during those years, so that later it came into fellowship with the Eldership, adopted the name church of God about 1834, and received, or called, ministers of the Church of God. It outgrew the limited accommodations of its first house of worship, and in 1870 a more commodious bethel was erected, during the pastorate of George Sigler.

The third bethel in Shippensburg was built in 1903-4, and dedicated September 25, 1904, under the pastoral labors of C. I. Brown.

Some years ago a letter was written to America from a Spanish port relating to the death of a friend who had perished in the wreck of an ocean liner which had gone ashore on the coast of that country. The writer, in referring to his friend, rightly, from a Christian point of view, laid stress on the fact that her death was the will of God, and was therefore best for her. A scientific writer, looking at the same event, might have viewed it as part of an immense context of phenomena. He would have taken all the proximate causes into consideration to show how these, and the more remote antecedents, would naturally account for the catastrophe. When in later years we watch the career of that masterful leader and great editor of the Church of God, Edward H. Thomas, we wonder what causes were operative one hundred miles away from Harrisburg, where the name of Winebrenner had not yet been heard, to bring this man into the fellowship of the Church of God. Our researches are rewarded by finding, in 1827, that there was a Methodist Protestant church located in West Kensington (now Cohocksink) district, on Cadwallader street, above Columbia avenue, which Thomas joined after his conversion on "the first Sabbath evening in January, 1828." In 1829 about forty of the members of this church, including Thomas, withdrew from this church "on account of difference of views on the subject of human creeds, human church titles and the ordinance of baptism, and organized the church of God in West Kensington, with no other creed or rule of Christian faith and practice but the New Testament." In 1830 they first heard of Winebrenner, and in 1832 or 1833 co-operation with the Eldership was begun. Later the church was disbanded.

While no church was organized in York, York county, Pa., as early as the first quarter of the nineteenth century, Winebrenner preached there at least on one occasion, and a gracious revival of religion followed. This was in the Winter of 1825-6, in the German Reformed church. The pastor was Rev. James R. Reilly, and he invited Winebrenner to assist him at a Communion. "The Lutheran Observer" of August 17, 1877, in a brief history of the Reformed work in York, speaking of this meeting, says: "Mr. Winebrenner was then in his prime, and was a powerful and effective preacher, especially in German. The interest commenced in the Reformed church, but soon spread over the whole community."

The "new measures" introduced under Winebrenner were the mourners' bench, the inquirers' meetings, camp-meetings and woods-meetings. But these measures were not absolutely new with Winebrenner, as the mourners' bench was used as early as 1800, and camp-meetings and woods-meetings were held earlier by the Methodists, United Brethren and the Evangelical Association. But they were relatively new in this section of the State. Besides, Winebrenner was far more concerned about the salvation of souls than any human methods of conducting the services. He early became an ardent advocate of camp-meetings, which developed largely out of the environment of the earlier settlers in Pennsylvania and in other sections of the country. In 1810, when the Evangelical Association did not have a single church edifice, and "private houses were too small to accommodate the masses of the people," the Conference ordered two camp-meetings to be held in the eastern part of Pennsylvania. Under Winebrenner's labors the first camp-meeting was held in a woods near the Dauphin county Poor House, in 1826. It was a union meeting, participated in by Methodists, Presbyterians, United Brethren and others. Winebrenner preached at this meeting with marvelous power. A camp-meeting was held in the same woods five consecutive years by the churches of God. In 1826 one was also held in Andrew Miller's woods, when some of the members of the Lower Paxton church were baptized. It was a union camp-meeting. In 1828 the United Brethren held a camp-meeting in John Raysor's grove, not far from A. Miller's, at which Winebrenner and Maxwell were present and preached. In 1828 the first camp-meeting was held in Cumberland county, in a woods owned by John Bowman. The same year one was held in George Millizen's woods, near Linglestown. In the same grove another one was held in 1829. Also in Andrew Miller's woods: The United Brethren at their camp-meeting immersed believers and observed the Communion and washing of the saints' feet. At this time Winebrenner had not yet accepted feet-washing as an ordinance. Neither did he practice immersion, as in a conversation with J. Myers, later a minister in the Eldership, in 1828, he told him that he had "nothing myself of baptism but what I received in my infancy, and my parents have told me. I sometimes think if we have plenty of spiritual baptism, it is of more importance than all water baptism." Myers had come to the conclusion that as he was sprinkled in infancy he had not been scripturally baptized, and asked Winebrenner for advice. Winebrenner had, however, abandoned infant baptism.

As early as 1827 there was considerable religious interest aroused in Frederick and Carroll counties, Maryland, intensified by the reports of the great revivals in and around Harrisburg, Pa., under Winebrenner, and denunciations against him from German Reformed pulpits. Winebrenner had also preached at several points in these counties prior to 1827, but there was no formative church work done in the State up to 1829.

In 1829 Winebrenner published his "Brief View of the Formation, Government and Discipline of the Church of God." This was an enlargement of the sermon which he preached at the organization of the church at Andrew Miller's, or the sermon an epitome of the book. It is a masterly discussion of ecclesiological subjects. He here assumed the suffix "V. D. M.," which subsequently was used by him for many years, and by other ministers of the Church of God. The only departure from the German Reformed faith indicated in this book relates to church name, and church formation and government. He taught that "church of God" is the only proper name for an organized body of believers, and that it applies to the local church. The local church is absolutely self-governing, having no subjection to any power outside of itself. He had as yet no conception of an Eldership (presbytery) outside of the local church. How co-operation between these local churches was to be carried on, if at all, does not appear. These views in later years, as well as the title of the book, occasioned the churches and ministers much trouble. And while Winebrenner changed his views on some points, he did not publicly recant what he had written in this book.

The churches at once proceeded to put these views into effect. In the "Records of the church at Linglestown, Pa.," is an entry of the first ordination of ministers. It reads: "November 15, 1829, David Maxwell and John Walborn, having applied to the church of God at St. Thomas for ordination, the church accordingly met together at the house of Brother Shaffner, on the evening of said day, when their cases were made known, and the vote of the church was taken on the question, 'Shall our brethren be ordained to the office of teaching elders in the church?' Whereupon it was unanimously agreed that they be solemnly ordained to preach the gospel. They were ordained the same evening." This Record further shows, that on "January 19, 1831, Jacob Myers, having applied to the church of God at St. Thomas for ordination, the church accordingly met at the house of Brother Peter Bonawitz, on the evening of said day, when his case was made known, and the vote of the church was taken on the question, 'Shall our brother be ordained with the laying on of hands to the office of teaching elder in the church?' Whereupon it was unanimously agreed that he be solemnly ordained to preach the gospel. He was ordained the same evening, and got his license." From the churches at Miller's and Linglestown seven preachers entered the field, viz.: Andrew Miller and John Lenkert from the church at Miller's, and John Walborn, Jacob Burgoyne, David Maxwell, C. Forney (local) and J. Myers from the church at Linglestown. There are no available records to show whether other churches thus ordained men to the office of the gospel ministry.

While these events were transpiring in eastern Pennsylvania, what is called "a schism" occurred in the southwestern section of the State. Thomas Campbell, the leader of the movement, was a minister of the "Secession" branch of the Presbyterian Church in the north of Ireland. He emigrated to this country at the beginning of the century, and settled in Washington county, Pa. Having, like Winebrenner, conceived a strong aversion to ecclesiastical creeds and discipline, he drew up and published a "declaration and address," setting forth these views, and inviting all who sympathize with his sentiments to form a union upon that basis. A number responded, and the first congregation was formed at Brush Run, Washington Co., Pa., Sept. 7, 1810. Campbell was polemical, and having rejected sprinkling he soon became known as a champion of immersion, and several public debates were held. In 1823 the Brush Run church became connected with the Redstone Baptist Association, but upon the express stipulation that "no terms of union or communion other than the Holy Scriptures should be required." Friction soon arising between the Association and this local church, a number of its members, with Alexander Campbell, who had become joint pastor with his father, was dismissed to Wellsburg, Va., where they constituted a new church. This church united with the Mahoning Baptist Association, Ohio. As a result of almost constant discussions with such a disputatious leader as A. Campbell, the whole Association adopted his views. In 1828 it rejected all human formularies of religion and relinquished all claim to jurisdiction over its churches, and resolved itself simply into an annual meeting for the purpose of receiving reports of the progress of the churches, for worship and mutual co-operation. Thus originated the Disciples, or Church of Christ.

In the year 1829 another important event transpired in western Pennsylvania. The General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, sometimes called the New Light Covenanting Church, or for brevity, the Covenanters, was organized. The Covenanters hold that public social covenanting is a duty; believe in the leadership of Christ over the nations, and reject hymns of human composition, and use only the Psalms.

The body known as the Hicksite Quakers, or Friends, was organized in 1827, having seceded from the parent organization. The schism grew out of heretical views promulgated by Elias Hicks, "denying or invalidating the miraculous conception, the divinity and atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ, and also the authenticity and divine authority of the Holy Scriptures."

In 1828 the first steps were taken toward the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church. This movement was hastened by the expulsion of some from the Methodist Episcopal Church because of their opposition to the office of Bishop and desire for lay representation in the Conferences of the Church.

Several prominent religious newspapers, which still survive, were started during this period. The first, which for that time soon secured a phenomenal list of subscribers, was the "New York Christian Advocate," which has ever since been the organ of the Methodist General Conference. In 1827 the German Reformed Church began the publication of "The Reformed Church Messenger."

CHAPTER IV.

---

WITH the opening of the third decade of the nineteenth century the United States entered upon an era of unprecedented progress and development in every line of thought and activity. There began a new stage of vital energy. The nation experienced a rebirth, a renaissance more marvelous than that which marked the transition from the period of history which we call the Middle Ages to that which we call Modern. The population had increased from 9,638,453 in 1820, to 12,866,020 in 1830. Immigration from the various countries in the Old World and increasing streams of emigrations westward in the United States kept up a steady flux of the population. The amalgamation of German, English, Scotch and Irish nationalities produced a race of energetic, intelligent, progressive and indomitable people. Their development in the arts and sciences, in philosophy and literature, in mechanical and inventive genius, and in all that made for better conditions was unprecedented. One of the first fruits of this spirit of progress, this political rebirth, was the building of railroads and other improved means of transportation. In 1830 there were but twenty-three miles of railroad in the United States. In that year the first railway steam engine built in America made its first run on the first railway constructed for locomotives. The first omnibus was built and run in New York City. R. M. Hoe made the first cylinder printing press in America. The great Canadian Welland Canal was opened for navigation. It was not until after 1830 that the dreams indulged in from the date of the discovery that electricity could be conducted by wire to a distance were beginning to be realized in the use of chemical electricity to operate a telegraphic apparatus for the transmission of messages.

This development was also manifest in morals and religion. There was growing dissatisfaction with formalism, sacerdotalism, priestly authority and sectarianism. The ministers of the Evangelical Association reported unusual "progress, persecutions and victories." "Great numbers of the people were awakened and professed to have experienced a change of heart and to have found peace with God." Under the preaching of ministers of the United Brethren Church extensive revivals were promoted. Winebrenner with renewed energy, assisted now by several ministers ordained by local churches, became more aggressive, and the territory was much enlarged and the converts greatly multiplied. Church extension now became the paramount object. Among these "able men, who took upon themselves the solemn and responsible office of the gospel ministry," were David Maxwell, John Walborn and Andrew Miller. These supplied the different churches with preaching, and went abroad on missionary tours. But Winebrenner was the leader, and did most of the evangelistic work, besides ministering to the congregation at Harrisburg.

The church at Fredericksburg, Lebanon county, was one of the first churches organized in 1830. Under whose ministry is not known. The town and neighborhood were visited in that year with the outpouring of the Spirit, and many experienced religion. The most of "the converts joined the United Brethren, and others the Evangelical Association, while a small number, believing the Bible, and it alone, to contain the whole will of God to man, and being sufficient in itself to govern the Christian, resolved to form themselves into a church upon the New Testament plan, choosing their elders and deacons to take care of the little flock." It does not appear that any minister of the Church of God was present.

Charles Huff, who in 1851 removed to Grandview, Iowa, had earlier resided in Cumberland Co., Pa., near Oyster's Point, not far from the Stone church, states that "Winebrenner preached at said place in Bro. Warner's house in 1830, and organized the church, consisting of Warner and wife, J. Bowman and wife, J. Sadler and wife, ——— Parens and wife, J. Rupp and wife and myself and wife."

The work in Lancaster city made steady progress, the church attaining a membership of about four hundred souls. Winebrenner preached there in 1830. In June, 1830, he came up from Lancaster to Mt. Joy and held the first meetings in that town. A camp-meeting was held near there at the time, and a few persons were converted. A revival followed in the school-house in town, at which Israel Brady, later a minister in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, was one of the converts. There was at this time no house of worship in the town. During the Winter of 1830-31 a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit was manifested, scores were converted and a remarkable reformation took place under the labors of Winebrenner, Maxwell, Richards and others. Following this revival, on the evening of March 15, 1831, Winebrenner organized the first church of God in Mt. Joy, consisting of thirty-five members, as follows: William McFadden, Israel Brady, George Brady, William Booth, David Booth, Samuel Minichen, Levi Herr, Henry Bender, John Mateer, David Snyder, Jacob Ehrhart, John Barlow, John Lehman, David Brady, Mother Booth, Elizabeth Booth, Nancy McFadden, Catharine Sullivan, Anna Brady, Jane Henry, Esther Myers, Jane Barlow, Jane Raymond, Louiza McFadden, May Flint, Mary Develin, Jane Lehman, Fannie Stohler, Mary Carickner, Catharine Carickner, Mother Hess, Mary Breneman and Margaret Brady.

Israel Brady and William McFadden, also later a minister in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, were appointed the first elders. And the first deacons, elected in 1843, were John C. Booth, later a minister, and David Stoner.

At the Eldership held in December, 1833, James Richards, residing in Columbia, Lancaster county, reported work in Columbia, to which his labors were principally confined "in consequence of their peculiar situation as an infant church."

Considerable work was done in Perry county, Pa., in 1830-1831. A few Church of God families had moved into the county. In 1831 a camp-meeting was held in Shafer's Valley, and some of the converts who were baptized by John Walborn united together in church fellowship. But the year 1833-34 were the seasons of the greatest revivals in that county. Meetings in Landisburg were at first held in the house of Henry Wingert, a local minister of the church, and pioneer emigrant of the Church of God to Perry county. Winebrenner had visited Landisburg and preached in the Reformed church April 10, 1821, while collecting funds to build Salem Reformed church, Harrisburg. Henry Wingert began preaching in Landisburg in 1828, and in 1832 he organized a church in an old log school-house in the village. This was used for religious services by the little church until 1836, when Wingert was instrumental in building a small bethel on a lot which he owned.

One of the remarkable beginnings of church work in those early years occurred at Churchtown, Cumberland Co., Pa., in the Winter of 1832. A "protracted prayer-meeting" was held at the private houses of Samuel Bricker and Rudolph Krisher. A "revival broke out, and was carried on from house to house until the whole neighborhood was filled with the gospel of the Son of God." A. Megrew, who became a minister later, removing to Ohio and thence to Iowa, was a convert of this meeting. Samuel Bricker was another convert of this meeting. Winebrenner preached sometimes during this meeting, as did Maxwell, Machlin and McFadden. An organization was effected on Feb. 19, 1833. Later Bricker leased to the church the ground from the corner of his farm on which the first bethel was built by the church.

In the early history of the Church emigrants from eastern points where churches had been established to more western points proved like seeds scattered by the winds, as in apostolic times. Wherever a Church of God family located a church would spring up. In 1832 John W. Mateer and wife removed from Lancaster county, Pa., to Blair county, the famous Morrison's Cove, and ever after made their home in Martinsburg and vicinity. It was through their fearless advocacy of the primitive faith, and their earnest and self-denying efforts that the Church of God was first established in that country. They had embraced religion under Winebrenner's preaching, at Mt. Joy, Pa. When located in their new home they began holding prayer-meetings, and also called for ministers to visit and preach for them. E. West, Israel Brady and William McFadden were among the earliest ministers to visit the Cove. But it was not until some years later that organizations were formed and systematic work begun.

In 1832 the church at Middletown erected its first bethel, on the east side of Union street, near Center Square. It was a frame structure, lathed and plastered on the outside. It had a basement, in which the Sunday-school was held. In 1852 it was enlarged by extending the front to the house-line, casing the outside with brick and adding a vestibule and gallery. In 1873 it was decided to erect a new house. A lot was bought for this purpose on the northeast corner of Spring and Water streets. Ground was broken June 9, 1874; the corner-stone laid July 8th, and the house dedicated Oct. 22, 1876.

The work at Camp Hill, Cumberland Co., Pa., was closely connected with the movement near the Stone church, at Oyster's Point, as some of the members of the church organized at Warner's house were later members at Camp Hill. The date of the organization of this church, as nearly as can be determined, was in 1833. It worshiped in the Walnut Grove school-house until 1849, when the building was erected which is still used.

brenner and Mackey held revival services there, and a number were converted, baptized and received into fellowship. Mackey had been "called" by the Shippensburg church as its pastor. He submitted the call to the Eldership "to confirm or reject the same." He was then appointed to said church, and took charge on April 1, 1834. About this time the name "Union Christian church" was dropped, and the title "church of God" accepted, and the church came into connection with the Eldership.

The first revival meeting held at what is now Goldsboro, York Co., Pa., was conducted by J. Keller, D. Maxwell, William McFadden and Winebrenner in 1833, in a school-house on the river bank.

At Mechanicsburg Winebrenner held special meetings in the Winters of 1833 and 1834, when the church received quite substantial additions.

When Mackey assumed charge of the Shippensburg church he also entered upon evangelistic work in the villages in the upper end of Cumberland county and adjoining sections of Franklin county. He was the leader in the work in that section, and those of like faith were long known as "Mackeyites." One of the villages in which he did his first work was Newburg, where he "organized a church in the old meeting-house (the only place of worship in the town), in 1834." The following names were enrolled as members: Levi Diehl, Martha Diehl, John Myers, Eliza Myers, Christian Pisle, Catharine Pisle, Margaret Miller, E. Hawk, Jacob Ober, Eliza Ober and Susan Thompson.

The work in Maryland was measurably of local origin, and began at Uniontown, Carroll county. In 1830 there were two churches in that town, the Methodist Protestant and St. Lucas' German Reformed. Winebrenner had preached in St. Lucas' church at different times while yet pastor of the Reformed church in Harrisburg. But the reformation, except as to vital godliness, did not originate with his preaching. As to experimental religion the same conditions existed at St. Lucas' as elsewhere in Reformed churches. "Many of the members of said church became converted, and enjoyed the indwelling of Christ's Spirit, and felt a longing desire to conform more to the will of God in all things. These were not satisfied with anything short of a knowledge of divine truth as taught by Christ and his Apostles." Abraham Appler and a few others began also to entertain doubts about the validity of infant baptism and the different modes by which the ordinance was administered. "In reading the Commission they saw that Christ only authorized the baptism of believers." And they also soon saw that the mode was "the burial or immersion of the body in water." This created a schism in the Reformed church about 1830. And as most of the prominent members were personally acquainted with Winebrenner, and had heard of his great work in Pennsylvania, they invited him to come to Uniontown and hold a series of meetings. As he had other engagements he sent John Walborn and Andrew Miller in his stead. This work continued thus in St. Lucas' Reformed church for about four years. Meanwhile the first four persons to be baptized were Abraham Appler and wife, Mrs. Charity Hollenberry and Mrs. Nancy Senseney. "This event," says a writer in reviewing the record of this church, marks the establishment of the church of God in Uniontown, as it is the first record of a change of faith by any members of the old congregation." But there was no separate organization, and St. Lucas' church continued to be the place for public worship, except when services were held in Appler's house. "The church building was held by Jacob Appler, Sr., father of Abraham Appler, and his co-trustees virtually as their own. In fact the building was sometimes called 'Mr. Appler's church.'" By 1834 the Applers and nearly the whole of the St. Lucas' church went "into the young organization." "The church of God thus became the established successor of the German Reformed church at St. Lucas, first by most of the Reformed members adopting the faith of the Church of God; and second, by the organization of the Board of Trustees as authorized by Act of the Legislature in 1834." They thus became the legal owners of the church property. This was the first church building erected in Uniontown.

St. Lucas' church was beautifully located on a hill at the edge of town. The architecture was of the prevalent German character, a type of the Reformed and Lutheran churches erected a hundred and more years ago. It had galleries on three sides. There were three entrance doors, one at the end opposite the pulpit and one on each side, with the two aisles crossing each other in the center. The aisles were laid with brick. The corner-stone was laid Feb. 22, 1815, and the building was completed and dedicated in 1819.

The present church edifice was erected in 1882, and was dedicated Oct. 29th of that year. Abraham Appler was a delegate to the Eldership in 1833. A field of ministerial labor in Maryland was established at said Eldership, and called the "Maryland Circuit," with E. West as pastor.

Work was also begun about this time in Washington county, Md. Winebrenner preached there, with Mackey and Walborn. The church-houses were closed against them, and the meetings were held in school-houses and private dwellings. Winebrenner was also instrumental in the conversion of his nephew, John P. Winebrenner, in Frederick county, Md., in 1831. He later removed to the West, and was successively an earnest, active and influential member of the church at Wooster, Ohio, and at Decatur and Chicago, Ill.

Cedar Spring, now Milltown, in Cumberland county, Pa., is another of the original churches of God. It is nearly two miles south of Camp Hill. Religious services were held here as early as 1833, in an old distillery, and in that year, or 1834, a church was organized.

Work also began in the neighborhood of Landisville, Lancaster Co., Pa., as early as 1834.

The influence of these revivals and the reports of camp-meetings gradually spread northeastward into Schuylkill county, Pa. In 1832 a "number of brethren and sisters from near Orwigsburg" attended a camp-meeting held in the grove of George Milleizen, in Dauphin county, when some of them were baptized. James Mackey was baptized at this camp-meeting. In the same year Samuel Steigerwalt, after whom the Steigerwalt Bethel is named, near McKeansburg, Schuylkill Co., Pa., was converted, and later was a leader in that church. Hawk was preaching then in that section. In 1833, during the time of "the great meteoric showers," a revival was promoted at Orwigsburg, in said county. John Walborn was the preacher. "The doctrine of the Church of God, a new thing then, stirred up the people greatly. A class leader of the Evangelical Association and nearly his entire class embraced the faith of the Church, and came out and constituted a church of God organization." This was George Kimmel, subsequently so prominently identified with the work of the churches of God in that county. The History of the Evangelical Association calls him "the chief leader of the division at Orwigsburg, an honorable man, but very much inclined to new-fangled notions and fanaticism."

Perhaps the most significant event of this period was the change in the doctrinal views of Winebrenner, and his consequent adoption of immersion and of the washing of the saints' feet as a religious ordinance. His own silence and the absence of any documentary evidence render it impossible to speak with any degree of certainty on these points. But it has already appeared that probably in June, 1829, he had not yet "received light" on these points. But he received it soon after so far as washing the saints' feet is concerned. And while he immersed believers prior to 1827, at the Poor House camp-meetings, he did so as any pedit-Baptist minister would when the candidate demanded it. He had changed his views on the subjects of baptism, but not on the action. The Mulberry Street church was principally a baptized church in 1829, when there were about three hundred members. Winebrenner was slow in changing his doctrinal views. "He did not reach a decision until he had given the subject a most thorough investigation." He first took a decided stand on the formation, government and discipline of the church, in 1829. He had not yet decided the question of baptism. He had rejected infant baptism, but the "mode" was still an open question. When Jacob

Present Bethel, Uniontown, Md.

Erb, of the United Brethren Church, was pastor of a "field including Halifax and Powl's Valley, Dauphin county," in 1830 and before, Winebrenner "baptized Susan Etter by the mode of trine immersion." This inference is admissible from what J. Myers wrote in 1872: "There was not much said on the subject of baptism until the year 1830. I then resided in York county, Pa., when baptism was agitated more than any time since the great revival. Winebrenner and the converts in and about Harrisburg awoke on the subject. Winebrenner wrote and published a sermon on the subject." This is the sermon he preached on the day he was baptized. In 1828, at a camp-meeting near Camp Hill, H. Habliston preached a sermon, declaring most positively that washing of the saints' feet is an ordinance. Winebrenner sat on the pulpit an apparently unconcerned looker-on. J. Erb came to him, clapped him on the knee, and asked him to participate in the ordinance. Winebrenner replied, "Do not bind your brother's conscience. You believe that it is a positive command, and I do not." But during the year he gave the question a thorough examination, and at a camp held at the same place a year later he publicly participated in the celebration of the ordinance. So on the subject of baptism. At the Poor House camp-meeting in 1826 he baptized the converts by several different actions. But by 1830 he had studied this subject by "reading the Bible on his knees," and had reached the conclusion he ever afterwards defended with great clearness and ability. And having decided the question, he at once arranged to practice his new faith. He selected Jacob Erb, a United Brethren minister, to baptize him. Erb was preaching on the Dauphin county circuit, extending as far up the river as Halifax. On the morning of July 4, 1830, he preached at Peter's mountain appointment at 10.30, and thence rode horseback to Harrisburg, a distance of fifteen miles, where a large congregation had assembled at 2 o'clock p. m., in the Mulberry Street Bethel to listen to a sermon on baptism by Winebrenner. Immediately after the preaching, between 3 and 4 o'clock, they proceeded to the Susquehanna river, a hundred yards from the Bethel, where Erb baptized him. This sermon was written and published in a neat pamphlet, and republished in 1873. The United Brethren Church was in advance of Winebrenner on Feet-washing. They also immersed three times forward, as do the Dunkards. Erb was seven years younger than Winebrenner, having been born in 1804. He was converted near Wormleysburg, across the river from Harrisburg, when sixteen years old, and was living at Wormleysburg at the time of Winebrenner's baptism. He was ordained in 1823, and in 1849 he was elected Bishop by the United Brethren General Conference.

The revivals following Winebrenner's separation from the Reformed Church gave occasion for a new hymnody. Few of the old hymns were suited for revival services. This need Winebrenner supplied by the publication of his "Revival Hymn Book," March 25, 1825. Several editions were published, and new and popular hymns were added. He also published "Das Christliche Gasong Buch," a German hymn-book, which became very popular among the German people.

Camp-meetings became quite popular as the revival spirit spread, and were meetings of unusual power. Hundreds were converted at these meetings, and the churches were greatly strengthened. Houses of worship were few, and preaching services were infrequent. Churches everywhere held camp-meetings. Among the most memorable ones held between 1830 and 1835 was one in 1830 on the farm of Jacob Beelman, between Mechanicsburg and Churchtown, where a large number were converted. Another one at the Poor House, Dauphin county, at which time Winebrenner for the first time insisted on immersion one time backward "as the only way in which he would administer the rite." Fifty-nine were thus baptized by him at this time in the river at Harrisburg. Another one was held here in 1831, with most encouraging results. This ground having been refused for 1832, this camp-meeting was held in Millizen's woods, and over one hundred conversions were reported. Other camp-meetings of great power were held at Mt. Joy; one near Shippensburg, in 1832; one in the grove of John Heck, Cumberland county, the same year, and again in 1834; one near Roxbury, Franklin county, in 1832; one between Shiremanstown and Lisburn, in 1833; also the same year in Millizen's grove, in Lower Paxton township, Dauphin county, and one near Middletown. In 1834 one was held in Lebanon county, 3 miles west of Jonestown. The one held on the farm of George Kimmel, near Orwigsburg, Schuylkill county, in 1834, is notable as being the first in that county. One English sermon was preached during this meeting, by J. Myers. G. W. Wilson, later a minister in the Ohio Eldership, who had met Winebrenner the first time in 1832, was at this camp-meeting. At some of these meetings there were marvelous displays of divine power.

In the early Summer of 1830 a movement was begun, looking toward some system of co-operation between the churches which had then been organized. It at once encountered opposition. This grew out of the intense anti-sectarian spirit which characterized the whole revival movement of 1825-30. It was stimulated into renewed vigor by the views Winebrenner advocated in his "Brief Scriptural

View of the Formation, Government and Discipline of the Church of God," in 1829. He insisted that all power is in the local church, and that there is no human authority, or power, or organization, above and over it. But the idea of inaugurating some system under which all could co-work prevailed, and finally "these ministering brethren, able men whom it pleased God to raise up to take the office of the gospel ministry upon themselves, with a few other great and good men with similar views and kindred spirits, agreed to hold a meeting for the purpose of adopting a regular system of co-operation." This was in October, 1830, when what is now the East Pennsylvania Eldership was organized. Winebrenner was elected to preside over the meeting, and after the organization and "spending the morning session in solemn prayer and deliberation, the meeting was adjourned till 2 o'clock p. m., when a sermon was preached by the Speaker, based on Acts v. 38, 39.

John Winebrenner.

The question of Sunday-schools received early attention by Winebrenner. Shortly after the building of the new Reformed church under his pastorate he took up the subject and prepared "A Compendium of the Heidelberg Catechism, or Method of Instruction in the Christian Religion," published in 1822, which, as he says in the Preface, "I have chiefly intended for the use of the Sunday-school." Only about sixteen Sunday-schools were known to have been organized before 1800. They were strongly antagonized and "fierce onslaughts" were made upon them as "subversive of that order, that industry, that peace and tranquillity which constitute the happiness of society." But in the beginning of the nineteenth century the movement took new life, and made rapid progress. In 1824 the "American Sunday-school Union" was organized. State conventions were organized, and finally, in 1832, the first national convention was held in New York. The system of conventions grew out of local organizations. But it required years of persistent effort to overcome the deep-rooted prejudice against the institution which regarded it as "so far from deserving encouragement and applause, it merits contempt, and ought to be exploded as the vain, chimerical institution of a visionary projector." Among the Germans in Pennsylvania this opposition was most persistent, and but few Sunday-schools had been organized among them prior to 1830. Winebrenner became somewhat familiar with Sunday-school work in Philadelphia, and he never lost his interest in it, but steadily threw his influence in its favor.

There is a close connection between the Sunday-school and the day or common schools of the United States. The former was for some years "a school for secular instruction on Sunday," as well as for "instruction in the catechism and the Scriptures." Even the American Sunday-school Union "petitioned the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the establishment of Sunday-schools as free schools." The seed thus sown bore fruit in 1834, when the first public school law was passed by said Legislature.

Other events of importance in the religious world during this period include the organization of the Mormon Church in 1830. The Book of Mormon was first printed in 1830. The same year, April 6th, the first regularly constituted church of the Mormon faith was organized in Manchester, N. Y. It had six members. And in June 1, 1830, the first Conference of the Church was held at Fayette, N. Y. In 1833 the so-called gift of tongues was conferred.

The Plymouth Brethren had their origin about 1830, in England.

The origin of the Adventists may be dated from the time when in 1831-3 William Miller began his preaching and predictions as to the time of the end of the world, in 1843.

The association of the ministers and churches of God with the Free Baptist Church has been closer than with any other denomination. It is the more interesting, therefore, to note that the General Conference of said Church was organized in 1827. Their Book Concern was started in 1831. Their Foreign Missionary Society was organized in 1833. Like the Church of God, the Free Baptists for a number of years practiced the washing of the saints' feet. In a work called the "Faith of the Free Will Baptists," published in 1834, by authority of the General Conference of said denomination, the following is found: "The following ordinances or institutions were appointed by Christ or his Apostles, and are obligatory on the Church: I. Christian Baptism. II. The Lord's Supper. III. Washing the Saints' Feet." "Baptism is immersion." Except as to name, the Free Baptists then were identical with the Church of God. So the United Brethren in their Confession of Faith of 1815 "recommend . . . that baptism and the remembrance of the Lord in the distribution of the bread and wine be observed, also the washing of feet where the same is desired," as "outward signs and ordinances."

In 1834 the United Brethren Publishing House was established, and "The Religious Telescope," a semi-monthly folio, was started. Both were located in the basement of the church at Circleville, Ohio.

The first General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church convened in Georgetown, D. C., May 6, 1834, with sixteen ministerial and fourteen lay delegates. This item derives much of its significance from the fact that lay representation was one of the demands whose refusal resulted in the secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church and the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church.

The history of Oberlin College begins with the location of P. P. Pease on the ground, April 19, 1833. The beginnings of this institution destined to occupy so prominent a place in the great slavery agitation in later years were of the humblest character. Not less than half a dozen ministers of the Church of God later received part of their classical and theological training at this institution.

Prior to 1835 considerable missionary work was done beyond the Allegheny mountains. The tide of emigration to Ohio began to rise about this time. Among the early families locating in the State were the Beerys, Sherricks, Beidlers, Funks, Metzlers and Hartmans. Samuel Sherrick devoted a great deal of his time "to the promotion of the cause of God. He was very plain and pointed in his preaching. He was very successful in doing good." John Beidler labored much in a local capacity. Peter Hartman did much in the way of opening new points, and was a good instructor. Samuel Metzler and John Funk were spiritual and zealous workers, sound in the principles and doctrine of the Church of God. These prepared the way for the regular circuit preachers who traveled in Wayne and adjoining counties and helped to build up the Ohio Eldership. These local ministers helped to prepare the way for the appointment of a minister by the Pennsylvania Eldership to the "Ohio circuit," in 1833, in response to a call in a letter written by J. Greeger, "praying that help might be sent them." They all became members of the first Eldership organized in Ohio, in 1836.

CHAPTER V.

THE second half of the fourth decade of the nineteenth century was rich in results crowning the labors of the ministers of the Church of God. In Pennsylvania and Ohio the number of conversions and of churches organized was relatively very large. There was an active, aggressive campaign over the whole territory as if Church extension had been the inspired motto. The number of active workers steadily increased, and there was co-operation on every hand. So-called "Big meetings," "Protracted meetings" and camp-meetings were held all over the territory, and at quite a number of new points. The term "evangelistic meetings," or "evangelistic efforts," was not then in use. The protracted meeting so commonly meant a "revival," the conversion of sinners, that the term "revival meeting" was quite generally used even in anticipation. The "big meeting" was so called because of the unusually large attendance. Churches co-operated in these meetings, and members would go long distances to attend them. Every church would have its protracted meeting, and it proved a serious disappointment if there were no conversions. A number of churches in Pennsylvania and Ohio originated in revivals held in private houses. The churches were taught to work and pray for revivals, as "the spirit of revival is the genuine spirit of Christianity. No believer in divine revelation who will attentively and prayerfully read the Acts of the Apostles can doubt the truth of this position. A correct answer to the oft-repeated and truly important question, 'Why are revivals of religion so unfrequent?' would be a severe censure on the character and conduct of many a professed follower of Jesus." They defined a revival to be "an unusual quickening and conversion of many sinners." And they believed that "all that is genuine and durable in a time of revival is effected by the special influence of the Holy Spirit." But they as strongly insisted on "the truths of the Bible" as the means used by the Spirit, and "ministers by their preaching; Christians by their devoted lives, and often the providence of God are the agents or instruments in conveying and applying the truth to the minds of sinners." During the Winter of 1838 it was recorded that "revivals of religion are prevailing over the length and breadth of the land, with greater power and depth and permanency than have ever yet been witnessed." This widespread revival followed a year or two of comparative barrenness, so that a "dearth of revivals" had been reported in 1837. "Meetings were thin, preaching without effect, the few scattering additions which are made to the churches but just redeem them from absolute decline in members." These protracted meetings often lasted from four to six and ten weeks, with conversions nightly. That they were sometimes abused is conceded; but incalculable good was accomplished through them. Indeed, these meetings, along with camp-meetings, were the essential means by which the United Brethren Church, the Evangelical Association and the Church of God were originated and built up.

Camp-meetings were unusually numerous in these early years, and were productive of much good. As the results decreased, their number decreased. In order that they might not interfere with each other it was the custom for the Eldership to appoint a camp-meeting committee, which would fix the dates of all the camp-meetings, and sometimes assign the ministers. While the camp-meeting spirit prevailed almost universally, yet the ministers strongly urged upon the churches the importance of such special means of grace. It was "the service of the Lord," and while "it costs time and money, trouble and labor, has any man ever lost anything by putting time, money and labor into the service of the Lord?" "Many a Christian father, mother, brother and sister feels himself or herself amply rewarded for the labors of camp-meetings by the conversion of friends." In 1835 eight camp-meetings were held in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, to wit: Near Linglestown, Dauphin county; in Perry county; in Powl's Valley, Dauphin county; at Beelman's, near Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county; near Orwigsburg, at Kimmel's, Schuylkill county; in Foutz's Valley, Perry county; near Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, and near Uniontown, Carroll county, Md. One was held near Jefferson, Wayne county, Ohio. This was the first camp-meeting held by the churches of God in Ohio. It began on August 21st. Jacob Keller and Thomas Hickernell were in charge as the circuit preachers. Keller preached the first sermon, in German, from Mark xi. 24. More than half the sermons were in German, as several other brethren preached also in German. Other ministers present were John Funk, John Greeger, John River, Samuel Sherrick, Peter Hartman and William Adams. The preachers in charge reported about forty-five "real conversions" at this camp-meeting. Full reports are wanting from all but three of the eastern camp-meetings. At these three the conversions numbered about one hundred. The largest of these camp-meetings was the one held in Beelman's grove, near Mechanicsburg, with between ninety and one hundred tents.

In 1836 nine camp-meetings were held in the Pennsylvania Eldership, viz.: near Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county; Powl's Valley, Dauphin county; near Fredericksburg (then called Stumpstown), Lebanon county; near Middletown, Dauphin county; near Shippensburg, Cumberland county; in York county; near Landisburg, Perry county, and at Kimmel's, Schuylkill county, and one near Uniontown, Carroll county, Md. A camp-meeting was also held this year on "the Wooster circuit," the same ground on which the one of 1835 was held. The reports of these meetings are very incomplete, but exceeding one hundred conversions are reported at five of them, and at one other it is specially noted that there were more conversions than the previous year.

In 1837 the number of camp-meetings held was thirteen, three of them in Ohio, one on the East circuit, in Holmes county; one on the West circuit, Wayne county, and one north-west of Canton, in Stark county. These three camp-meetings reported over eighty conversions. At the camp-meeting near Shippensburg, Pa., fifty conversions were reported. Mackey says concerning this camp-meeting, that "the three last days were days of power in such a degree as I have never witnessed." It was "held on the premises of Bro. Knisley," who years later was treasurer of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. Here M. F. Snavelly was converted, who after preaching the gospel for a number of years met a tragic death in a railway accident. The results at other camp-meetings are not on record.

In 1838 eleven camp-meetings were held in Pennsylvania and Maryland, and four in Ohio, one each in Wayne, Richland, Holmes and Stark counties. Nearly two hundred converts were reported at these meetings, yet there was complaint that the number was "small" at three or four of them.

In 1839 the Ohio camp-meetings were held in Richland, Wayne, Tuscarawas and Stark counties. In the East there were seven, one of which was held in Maryland. In western Pennsylvania the first camp-meeting was held in Venango county, which was part of the Pittsburg mission territory, under John Hickernell. The general results this year were less encouraging than during former years.

Substantial and inspiring progress was made during the second half of this decade. Converts multiplied; churches were organized in many new localities, and the work throughout seemed to be in a very prosperous condition. The cause these devout and energetic men had espoused found favor with God and man. Even the hardships and persecutions they had to endure fanned the fire of their zeal. In a number of places houses of worship were built. One of the churches organized in 1835 was at Good Hope, Cumberland county, Pa., where H. Murray, later of Iowa, and John Briggles, who removed to Ohio, became members of the church. The work in Schuylkill county, Pa., was widening out under the labors of J. Walborn and J. Lenkert, followed in 1835 by Jonathan Hawk. When he went there "things were small, but promising." But they "soon had several power seasons, where the Lord broke in upon sinners, and a goodly number experienced a change of heart." Hawk extended his labors as far toward the south as Hamburg, Berks county, and westward into East and West Hanover, Dauphin county, where a number were converted.

Meanwhile the work was making good progress in Cumberland county. October 11, 1835, "the new house of worship at Markley's, near Shepherdstown," was dedicated. In 1836 the bethel located about one-half mile from Churchtown was built. This house was torn down in 1849, and a new, two-story bethel built, well located, in the village. This was remodeled about forty years later, and made a one-story house. The same year the church at Andersonstown was organized. The work in Newville antedates the year 1837, when the Shullenberger family moved to that village. D. Kyle and L. Records were the first ministers of the Church to preach there. They held services in the "Old School-house," near the Presbyterian church, and in private houses. In 1837 the church was organized by Kyle. They secured ground in the West end of the town and built what was years after known as "The Old Bethel," and was used later by the colored brethren, when in 1860 the new bethel was erected. The first bethel at Shiremanstown was built in the Summer of 1838, and dedicated November 23rd of that year. The work also extended into Franklin county, Fayetteville being the place of quite an extensive revival in 1839. The church, however, was organized prior to this date, as it had twenty-seven members before this revival began. This year also a house of worship was built by the church at Newburg, Cumberland county, under the labors of E. West. There were several small organizations effected in 1837 between Carlisle and Newville at points known as Smoketown and River's Meeting House.

The work in Franklin county, Pa., was closely connected with that in Washington county, Md. William Smedmer was a pioneer preacher in that section, in 1837, and reported overflowing congregations, in a place called Hancock, and many conversions. He went across into Virginia and preached some in that State. A church was organized at Broad Fording about this time. Smedmer two years later held a very successful revival meeting at Westminster, Carroll county, Md.

In Lancaster county this semi-decade also showed good results of faithful work. Revivals were held at Hinkletown, East of Lancaster city, as early as 1837. John Stamm, later a member of the Eldership, father of J. S. Stamm, sent to Centralia, Kas., as Phincipal of Centralia College, in 1867, was one of the first members of the Hinkletown church. George Sandoe, first missionary to Illinois, was born and converted there. "The new meeting-house in Columbia" was dedicated November 8, 1835. At Elizabethtown the church was organized a little over a mile East of the town, at the house of Michael Cramer, by David Maxwell. There were but six members—Abraham Breneman, Michael Cramer and wife, Martha Kapp, Hannah Kapp and Margaret Cramer. Others were in co-operation with them, but had not been baptized, and as Maxwell taught that no one could become a member until immersed, they "stood aloof." The work at Landisville started at the home of John C. Landis, where there was a revival in 1839. This became thereafter a regular appointment on the Lancaster circuit. The church at Mt. Joy was also, from 1833, a part of the Lancaster circuit. It worshiped in a school-house known as "Log Hall" during the first seven years of its existence. But in 1838 a bethel was built, which was dedicated December 23rd of that year. The church at Washington Borough, which was organized in 1837 or 1838, did not build a house of worship until 1844.

Adams and Lebanon counties also were included in the active missionary endeavors between 1835 and 1840. Special meetings were held at points from Gettysburg northward, and revivals followed. At Annville (then called Millers-town), Lebanon county, a church was organized in 1837. One of the original members of this organization was Mrs. Sarah Hepler, a sister of James Lick, later a California millionaire.

In 1838, "in a school-house on the river bank where Goldsboro, York county, now stands," the first members of the Goldsboro church were converted. An organization was effected, but no bethel built at that time.

Revivals were reported during this period at Landisburg, Shaffer's Valley and other points in Perry county. A regular circuit had been established in 1832, with E. West and John Walborn as pastors. Juniata county was added in 1833, with Jacob Myers as pastor.

Fulton, Bedford, Blair and Huntingdon counties were added to the previously occupied territory at the beginning of this period. About 1836 the first missionaries visited the Broad Top mountain region, having come from the neighborhood of Ft. Littleton, Fulton county. These were Snavelly and Hawk, who held a revival meeting at the Mountain House, "in the kitchen," at which "many were converted." This whole territory from Ft. Littleton to Martinsburg, Blair county, was included in one field of labor. Jacob Keller and John Hickernell made a tour through this territory as far as Martinsburg, Blair county, in the Winter of 1838, and thence on to Westmoreland county.

In the evolution of religious bodies in the United States, especially those which originated in the first half of the nineteenth century and prior thereto, the work has followed the line of emigration westward. None of these Churches has been able to make much progress eastward of the point where they began. And the work widened as the stream of emigration flowed westward. The families of a Church are its surest seed. They commend, or they discredit, the faith which they represent. These facts are exemplified in the history of the United Brethren Church, the Evangelical Association, the Free Baptist and the Methodist Protestant Churches, as well as of the Church of God. The earlier emigration of Church of God families was principally to Ohio. It consisted largely of farmers and families seeking homes in the country. This determined the first fields of extra-State mission work westward, as well as the localities where the earlier churches were established. Indeed it has been a determining factor in all the missionary operations of the Church of God.

As early as 1816 "there was a strong emigration from eastern Pennsylvania into Ohio." This tendency westward continued for years, as glowing reports reached the East of the fertility of the soil, the cheapness of farm land and the prosperity of the citizens generally. The families of the Church became early infected with this western fever, and emigrated in considerable numbers to the new "land flowing with milk and honey," a land even "like the Garden of Eden." The earlier emigrants settled in Wayne and adjoining counties, and by 1833 had associated themselves together in different localities for public religious services. Joseph Adams was their first minister. In 1833 D. Maxwell was appointed by the Pennsylvania Eldership to the "Ohio Circuit," but did not go. J. Greeger preached some for the Ohio brethren during this year. In 1834 the Eldership received "several letters from Ohio, giving a favorable account of the state of religion; requesting laborers to be sent there; recommending several persons to the Eldership for license, and testifying to the usefulness and faithfulness of Bro. J. Adams." In response to this request, Thomas Hickernell and Jacob Keller were appointed to the "Ohio Circuit."

Hickernell became the great revivalist of the West. He traveled all over Ohio, Indiana and a great part of Illinois, and was very successful. During the first year of the joint labors of Hickernell and Keller they reported one hundred and forty conversions, and the second year one hundred and fifty. Jacob Keller at the expiration of two years returned to Pennsylvania and spent the residue of his years as a member in the East Pennsylvania Eldership.

Jacob Keller.

His letter containing the report of his labors in Ohio during 1835 conveyed the request of the Ohio brethren for "the privilege of holding a yearly Eldership in Ohio."

William Adams, a native of Perry county, Pa., and son of a Presbyterian, was converted under E. West, and emigrated to Ohio in 1835. He was a co-laborer with Keller the second year of the latter's labors in Ohio, when they traveled the Sugar Creek circuit. When Keller and Hickernell went to Ohio they "took up twelve appointments to commence with." By the end of two years "our appointments had swelled to the number of forty." Wayne county was the principal part of their field of work. In 1836 this territory was divided into two circuits, the Eastern and Western, and two ministers were appointed to each. In 1837 three circuits were formed. In 1839 St. Mary's Mission was formed. As many as two hundred converts were reported some of these years. In 1837 there was a revival in Richland county, under the labors of Hickernell and Logue, at which twenty-five converts were reported. A similar work of grace had been reported by Hickernell at "Crooked Run meeting-house," Tuscarawas county, in the Spring of 1836; also in the Fall of 1836, at "Henry Myers," near Strasburg, in the same county. St. Mary's Mission was in Allen and Mercer counties, in the extreme western part of the State, and Hickernell was the missionary in 1839. He had ten appointments this year, and "my mission," he says, "is about fifty miles long." In 1838 there was a circuit in Stark county, with E. Logue as pastor. But two meeting-houses, or Bethels, had thus far been reported, viz.: Funk's, in Chester township, Wayne county, and Crooked Run.

A few families of the churches East emigrated to Westmoreland county, Pa., to Pittsburg, and to Venango and Butler counties between 1835 and 1840. Among these were the Gray and Yousling families, which located in Pittsburg; John Ross and family, the Ayreses, Becks, Mumphers, Cockleys and others who went to Venango county. These brethren as usual called for ministers of the Church of God to visit them and preach for them. To these calls the Ohio Eldership responded in 1837 by appointing Thomas Hickernell to the Pittsburg Mission; or, as he reports it, "to open a mission in western Pennsylvania." To what extent he labored on the Mission is not clear; but he reported preaching in Westmoreland, Butler and Venango counties, and in his general review of the year he states that "in this year the work of the Lord continued as usual, both on the Pittsburg Mission and in the State of Ohio." In Butler county a successful meeting was held, at "Old Harmony," while a number of conversions were reported in Venango county. In November, 1838, the Pennsylvania Eldership appointed John Hickernell and E. West to the Pittsburg Mission, Hickernell having received license at this Eldership.

While this field was called the "Pittsburg Mission," it included five counties—Allegheny, Westmoreland, Beaver, Butler and Venango. Hickernell reported: "I have to ride two hundred and sixty or seventy miles going and coming my route." It was not until 1839 that he "preached his first sermon in Pittsburg, in the Fire Engine House on Water street." He preached in the city at first every two weeks, but was obliged to change to three weeks on account of the many points on his field. J. Keller was his co-laborer part of the time, and assisted him in a meeting in Westmoreland county. They began the work at Stonerville, now Alverton, in 1839, preaching in the Mennonite meeting-house. An important feature of the early history of church work in this neighborhood is the influence of the Mennonite Church, which was strong over that section of the country. It later persecuted the leaders and members of the churches of God, but thus only made the Church of God people more resolute in their work. Many of their own people were converted to the doctrines of the Church and became pillars therein, as well as transmitted to these churches of God the same type of vital godliness and spiritual loyalty and conservatism. A series of meetings was also held in the C. Landes school-house, about four miles south of Stonerville, where a number were converted and a church organized "composed of ten or twelve members." Thomas Hickernell, missionary from East Pennsylvania Eldership, in 1839 organized a church at the home of Henry Rosenberger, then living where is now the village of Bethany. This church in the year 1841 "built a small, plain house of worship." The church in the Landes neighborhood was finally broken up by the removal of most of the families to Iowa, where they constituted the church at Harmony. Through some defect in the title the property at Bethany was lost to the little church. The membership, having considerably increased at the different points around Stonerville, selected this place as the common meeting point, and worshiped for some years in the "Stoner Grove Meeting House," owned by a number of brethren who called themselves "Brethren in Christ," some of which became members of the church of God. In the Spring of 1863 they "determined to erect a new and more commodious house of worship in a more central location." This house was dedicated on Sabbath, December 27, 1863. E. H. Thomas "did the preaching, and A. X. Shoemaker the financeering." J. M. Domer and Peter Loucks were joint pastors of the circuit of which this was one of the points. It was called "Center Bethel," being located in the center of the communities where these three churches had been formed in earlier years. In the Mennonite meeting-house near by Winebrenner, about 1836, sowed the first seed for the Church of God. He stopped over

Bethel at Alverton, Pa.

Sabbath with one of the families of the Church, and in his sermon he set forth his "views of the church of God." The bethel built in 1863 was enlarged, remodeled and modernized in later years.

A church was also organized at Slippery Rock, one at Old Harmony, and one in Irwin township, Venango county, in the year 1839. Much of the preaching was in German.

At the beginning of this half decade the religious paper called "The Gospel Publisher" was started by Winebrenner, the first number being dated June 5, 1835. In No. 27, Vol. I., he published the outlines of a sermon on Regeneration, one of the earliest published utterances on a doctrinal subject on which he himself preached with so much power. Whether or not there were any apprehensions of schism in the Church of God, or whether it was intended as a rebuke of existing schisms in the general church, Winebrenner published a number of selections against "schism," and strongly urged union among all God's people. He was the harbinger of that charming symphony of union of the twentieth century. But his own utterances on "Church of God" as the only proper name for the church, being "more ancient," "more descriptive," "more scriptural" and "more appropriate," and his opposition to "baptism the door into the church" were distinct and without a shadow of compromise. The voice of the Church of God those years gave no uncertain sound on the question, "Who should be members of the church?" Regeneration the door, and credible profession of godliness the only terms of admission into the fold. Otherwise there is no salvation. Universalism, which had become quite active, was repudiated as "unscriptural and absurd." "Plainness of dress" was taught as a Christian virtue, and the Eldershops adopted resolutions enjoining it. Infant baptism was wholly repudiated, and the immersion of believers as the only scriptural baptism was strongly emphasized. Occasionally baptism as a condition of fellowship was taught. Feeling as a guide to duty, or an evidence of conversion, was not accepted, though it strongly characterized revival meetings, and its evidential value was much abused. The duty of Restitution, of Fasting and other obsolete virtues was not overlooked. As the practice of "ordination by the imposition of hands" was introduced into a few of the original churches, it was natural that a controversy on this subject should manifest itself as early as the Pennsylvania Eldership of 1839, when the question was "laid aside till the next Annual Eldership." The support of ministers, which was exceedingly meager, received considerable attention; but the Eldership in 1839 resolved "that it be deemed expedient according to Scripture to discontinue the practice of preachers going into an article of agreement to hire themselves to preach for wages." Yet the paltry support during and following the great financial panic of 1837-8 made it all the more difficult for ministers to continue in the active work. Discussions on baptism, both action and subjects, occurred on several occasions, but were conducted by correspondence, or through the columns of the religious press. The question of women preaching had not yet arisen in the churches, but the more general topic of "women speaking in public" received more or less attention. Possibly because of too inadequate support, Winebrenner did not devote nearly all his time to preaching. He served churches in and around Harrisburg, before appointments were made by the Eldership, in 1830 and 1831. In 1832 he was appointed to Harrisburg and Middletown. But at the Elderships between 1833 and 1840 he had no charge. He was a "general missionary," but without any provision for his support. In addition to editing and publishing "The Gospel Publisher," he prepared and published his "Reference and Pronouncing New Testament," a work of great value. In liquidation of a debt he came into possession of a drug and book-store, at which he had his editorial office. He became deeply interested in "Morus Multicaulus," or the culture of the silk worm and of silk manufacture, and devoted, according to objections urged, a disproportionate space of the paper to the subject. To aggravate matters, this newly discovered industry, heralded so enthusiastically as promising fabulous returns to investors, proved an utter failure to the loss of those who heeded the fatal syren's song and embarked in the enterprise. By yielding to the necessity of seeking secular avocations, the Church to quite an extent lost Winebrenner's invaluable services, and the cause suffered serious detriment.

There is a variety of synchronological events in this period, social, secular and religious, which should impress every thoughtful mind. Especially the philosophical student of history will not be satisfied to confine himself wholly to one particular line of research. He desires a broader outlook, a limited degree of familiarity with more immediate surroundings. While Winebrenner was outspoken and clear "upon the unjustness of the division of the church into sects," and emphatically taught that "to divide the church of God into various denominations is wrong because it begets and promotes sectarianism"; others, leaders in their Churches, also advocated the "Christian union of all the Churches." On May 9, 1839, "a meeting was called at New York of several gentlemen of various denominations for the purpose of devising and adopting a plan to unite Christians of different denominations in a more intimate and friendly alliance." A Constitution was adopted, and the name of the Society which was organized was called "The American Society for the Promotion of Christian Union on Apostolic Principles." At the same time schisms occurred in Churches in Kentucky and Tennessee, and also in eastern Virginia. Several new denominations were also organized. The Christian Reformed Church was formed in 1835 by a separation from the Dutch Reformed Church. The same year the Catholic Apostolic Church was organized, more commonly called "Irvingites," after Edward Irving, an eloquent Scotch preacher, and one of the original and most influential promoters of the movement. Also the Adventist Church. The Presbyterian Church in 1837 was divided into the Old and New School branches.

Mission work received a new impulse. The Board of Foreign Missions of the German Reformed Church was organized in 1838. In 1837 the Presbyterian Board of Missions was formed which took up the work of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. The same year the Foreign Missionary Society of the Lutheran Church was organized. The Free-Will Baptists had preceded, having organized their Missionary Society in 1833. April 4, 1838, the first Missionary Society of the Evangelical Association was organized. The Conference organized itself into a Missionary Society. It adopted a regular Constitution, calling itself "The German Evangelical Missionary Society of North America." And in the Autumn of 1839, the first Woman's Missionary Society of the Evangelical Association was organized.

There was increased enterprise in the newspaper world. The "Public Ledger," Philadelphia, was established in 1836. "The Christliche Botschafter," German organ of the Evangelical Association, made its first appearance January, 1836. The "Religious Telescope," the organ of the United Brethren Church, appears as a semi-monthly, December 31, 1834. The unprecedented financial and industrial panic of 1837 unsettled everything, and retarded the enterprises of the Churches in all lines. Specie payment was suspended; State banks failed by the scores, and "Shin-plasters and speculation are now the order of the day." People everywhere were "in the highest state of excitement in consequence of the derangement of money matters." These conditions embarrassed seriously the Methodist Church which the year previous suffered the total loss by fire of "our noble Book Concern," and of the Conference Seminary at Norwalk, Ohio. Bishop Emory, of said Church, died the same year.

By this time, too, the anti-Slavery agitation became heated and acrimonious. Under the fiery appeals of William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips and other eloquent philanthropists and abolitionists to the American conscience, the cry of immediate abolition was taken up by Churches and ecclesiastical bodies throughout the country. Winebrenner took an active part in this agitation, and used the columns of "The Gospel Publisher" freely to advocate the cause of emancipation. He was a member of an anti-slavery society formed in Harrisburg in 1836. The assassination of Revs. Lovejoy and Bewley, in 1837, who "fell martyrs to the holy cause of Abolition by the hands of cruel, blood-thirsty bands of ruffians and murderers," greatly inflamed the passions of the multitude. The public "anti-slavery meetings encountered violent opposition, hissing, mobs, pelting and personal abuse, and was followed by social ostracism of the reformers."

The deepening interest in popular education resulted in 1834 in the passage by the Legislature of Pennsylvania of a law establishing a system of free and public schools. Two years later a "determined effort was made by the combined forces of ignorance, prejudice and caste to repeal this Act. The hero of the battle for free schools was Thaddeus Stevens, of Lancaster City. In 1909, in Lancaster county, a monument in his honor was erected "as a tribute to the signal services rendered by him in the Legislature of Pennsylvania in preventing the repeal of the public school law enacted in 1834."

This was a controversial age. Several public debates were held which attracted general attention. Already in 1829, at Cincinnati, Ohio, one between the forces of skepticism and infidelity, led by Robert Dale Owen, an astute and versatile disputant, and the redoubtable Alexander Campbell, the peer of any debater of the century. Another in 1837 between Campbell as the champion of Protestantism against Bishop John B. Purcell, in defense of the Roman Catholic Religion. A few years later Campbell had for his antagonist N. L. Rice, Presbyterian, on the action, subjects, design and administrator of baptism, and ecclesiastical creeds as terms of union and communion. The churches of God were made familiar with these discussions by the publication of extensive excerpts in "The Gospel Publisher." The spirit of controversy had also gotten into the minds of some ministers of the Church of God. At Uniontown, Md., in June, 1838, a debate on "infant sprinkling and immersion" took place between Joseph Adams of the Church of God, and Rev. R. Weiser. The same year, in April, Elder W. Smedmer held a debate at Akron, Ohio, with a Universalist, Freeman Loring, on the question, "Do the Scriptures teach that all mankind will be ultimately holy and happy?" Later in the same year Smedmer had a debate with Rev. Dr. Shaffer, of the Methodist Church, on infant baptism and immersion.

In 1835 Texas declared itself independent of Mexico and established a provisional government, and in 1837 it became an independent republic. April 2, 1836, the bill to admit Michigan into the Union was passed by both Houses of Congress. April 4, 1836, the Act for the admission of Arkansas became a law. The American Temperance Society held its eighth annual meeting in 1835, and reported 2,000,000 persons in the United States who had ceased to use intoxicants, with more than 8,000 local societies. In 1839 that remarkable temperance worker and organizer, Frances E. Willard, was born, who for years was President of the Woman's Temperance Union. Dwight L. Moody, the greatest evangelist of the century, was born February 5, 1837.

CHAPTER VI.

THE period beginning with 1840 was one of unprecedented activity and auspicious success. By the close of the year 1844 practically the territory which now comprises the East Pennsylvania Eldership was quite well covered. There are more churches now within the territory, but many local points have been abandoned, and several counties have been taken off the ecclesiastical map. There were then churches, or preaching points, in eighteen counties east of the Allegheny Mountains. Clearfield county has since been added, but Berks, Lehigh and Montgomery have been abandoned.

One of the stimulating elements of this period was the Millerite excitement. While few, if any, ministers of the Eldership accepted Miller's theory, the whole of eastern Pennsylvania was wrought up to an unusual degree over his predictions. The ministers were probably all pre-millennarians, and so could earnestly and conscientiously preach the doctrine of Christ's second coming to judgment; yet they refrained from fixing dates. But not so a percentage of the lay membership. William Miller, "the prophet," earnest and confident, predicted "the end of the world" about the year 1843. He began preaching this theory prior to 1840. A native of Pittsfield, Mass., when four years old he, with his parents, removed to Hampton, N. Y. Thence at the age of twenty-two he removed to Poultney, Vt. He preached that Jesus Christ would appear a second time in 1843, in the clouds of heaven; that he would then raise the righteous dead and judge them, together with the righteous living, who would be caught up to meet him in the air; that he would purify the earth with fire, causing the wicked and all their works to be consumed in the general conflagration, and would shut up their souls in the place prepared for the devil and his angels; that the saints would live and reign with Christ on the new earth a thousand years; that then Satan and the wicked spirits would be let loose, and the wicked dead be raised—this being the second resurrection—and, being judged, should make war upon the saints, be defeated and cast down to hell forever." The first General Conference of his followers was held in Chardon street, Boston, October, 1840. They first claimed the whole of the Jewish year from early in 1843 to March, 1844, the earliest date fixed by any of the Adventists being Feb. 10, 1843, the forty-fifth year from the date when the French army took Rome, in 1798. Then Feb. 15th was fixed, the anniversary of the abolition of the Papal government and the establishment of the Roman Republic. Then as these dates passed, the Passover was fixed, being April 14th. Next the date of the Ascension. Great excitement and extravagances everywhere attended the movement. It was a movement widespread, intense and enthusiastic. Sermons and lectures on the subject were everywhere delivered. And while Winebrenner and "The Gospel Publisher" did not endorse Miller's views, the advocates of the theory had access to many pulpits of churches of God. And Weishampel in his editorials rather apologized for those who "violently opposed, and in some instances were embittered against, these men for preaching the near approach of the end," and urged them "not to condemn them. It is their privilege to look for him." Yet he urged the churches "to get these lecturers by all means. Revivals follow their lectures wherever they go." There were not wanting "signs" that the prediction would be fulfilled. There were signs in the sun, a well-proportioned cross on the sun "having been seen by many." Signs in the moon—"three black streaks running across the moon on a horizontal line." "Strange sounds" were heard in various places, so that "those who were in the fields ran home. Some thought the earth shook, and there were sounds like the roaring of cannon." Thomas Hicker-nell states that as he traveled through Delaware and Union counties, Ohio, a distance of thirty-three miles, "the same strange sounds were heard all along the road." Then came the strange visitor, to many so portentous of evil, the comet of 1843, with a tail 130,000,000 miles in length, upon which many gazed night after night appalled "at the wonder of the heavens." Multitudes of good men in the Christian church, down to a recent period, saw in the appearance of comets not merely an exhibition of "signs in the heavens," foretold in Scripture; but also divine warnings to repentance and improvement of life of vast value to humanity. As forecasting the end of the world, to say nothing of the many examples in the earlier mediæval period, cometh in the tenth century strengthened the belief in the approaching end of the world, and increased the distress and terror of all Europe. Then, too, the stars began to fall "like streaks of light in the sky, trailing the path of destruction." In other parts of the heavens there was a phenomenon like "a perpendicular column of red fire, twenty-five feet in length and one foot in diameter." "The moon was encircled by a large ring, within which six or seven other apparent moons appeared, all dotted over with seeming stars." Newspapers were full of these descriptions, which inflamed the minds of the credulous, and incited others to blasphemous scoffing. Papers wholly devoted to the advocacy of this theory appeared in various places. Advent camp-meetings were held in divers localities.

Preceding and simultaneous with the appearance of these prophetic signs extensive revivals were promoted, and the converts among the churches of God were numbered by hundreds. Men and women were "powerfully convicted," and often were in great agony of soul. The preaching was terrific, and brought corresponding fruit. It was regarded as "not the work of man, however human agencies may be employed." That there were "imperfections" was freely granted; but "in all that man touches there are imperfections. However, the phenomenon itself we regard as the work of the Holy Spirit alike beyond human power to produce it or to control it." These revivals were enjoyed at almost every preaching point over the whole East Pennsylvania territory, while the Editor of "The Gospel Publisher" reported "powerful revivals in progress in Ohio." From various points it was reported that "the altar is nightly thronged with penitents." In small villages like Milltown as high as twenty were at the altar in one night. At Springville, now Florin, Lancaster county, Pa., seventeen. At this place forty-three were baptized. At Linglestown "from ten to fourteen are forward every meeting to be prayed for." A characteristic report came from Washington, Lancaster county, Pa. On Sunday night "one came forward and was blessed. On Monday night seven came forward. On Tuesday night fifteen. On Wednesday night thirty. On Thursday night about thirty. On Friday night about thirty." At the Eldership in 1843 nearly every minister reported that he "had seen the Spirit of God poured out in a very special manner, and many sinners converted." Lancaster and Dauphin county circuit, with Keller and Thomas as pastors, reported "that between five hundred and six hundred had been converted from New Year, 1843, to April 1st, and that he and Harn had, during that time, baptized about two hundred and fifty." At the Eldership in 1843 Winebrenner said: "The Lord truly has done great things for us and the people during the past Eldership year. The numerous accessions to the Church are without a parallel in the history of the Church of God."

Camp-meetings under the direction of committees appointed by the Elderships, were held in many localities over the territory in Pennsylvania and Ohio. Early in 1841 counsels and directions were given through the paper concerning these meetings. Similar admonitions were frequently repeated. Chief among these was the advice "to go praying that God might bless their labors and convert sinners." This in view of the statement that "camp-meetings got a little out of credit, because there was so little good done for a few years back." There should be "not so much feasting, but the chief concern should be for souls to be brought into the ark of safety." Hence "more good was done last year at camp-meetings than was done for several years before." In 1840 camp-meetings were held three miles from Taneytown, Md.; at J. Baker's, near Linglestown, Dauphin county, Pa.; near Lisburn, in York county; on Kister's farm, near Goldsboro, York county; near Old Harmony, Butler county; at Millerstown (Annville), Lebanon county; near Fayetteville, Franklin county; at Churchtown, Cumberland county; near Landisburg, Perry county; in Powl's Valley, Dauphin county, and one at Andrew Miller's, four miles east of Harrisburg. Six were held in Ohio, to wit: at Daniel Baughman's, 13 miles north of Canton, Stark county; at Crooked Run, Tuscarawas county; at Joseph Sherick's, Wayne county; at Canton, Stark county, at Frederick Clark's, 8 miles north of Mansfield, Richland county; on St. Mary's Mission, Mercer county. The reports from these camp-meetings are meager, but there were from six to eighteen and more conversions at each one, a probable total of three hundred and fifty.

The year 1841 surpassed the former year in the number of camp-meetings and in results. There were thirteen held in East Pennsylvania, viz.: near Lancaster, Lancaster county; near Fayetteville, Franklin county; near Kingston, Cumberland county; near Pine grove, Schuylkill county; in Shaffer's Valley, Perry county; near the Poor House, 3 miles from Harrisburg; near Newburg, Cumberland county; near Entriken's Bridge, Awkwick Valley, Huntingdon county; in Powl's Valley, Dauphin county; Frankfort township, Cumberland county, at Harter's Mill, Fautz's Valley, Perry county; and one in Plain Cabin Valley, Huntingdon county. Awkwick Valley is on what earlier was the Fort Littletown circuit, near Walnut Grove. The name is derived from the creek, called the Big Awkwick (differently spelled), and the Awkwick school-house was one mile from Maddensville. Here J. Lininger, who emigrated to North Bend, Iowa, was preacher in charge when the camp-meetings of 1842 and 1843 were held. Three were held in West Pennsylvania, viz.: one in Venango county, near Bro. J. Ayers'; near Old Harmony, Butler county, and one near Mt. Pleasant. Three were held in Maryland, one near Uniontown, Carroll county; one near Broad Fording, Washington county, "on Bro. Bean's place," who became a minister of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and later lived at Bainbridge, Lancaster Co., Pa., and one near Hawk's Meeting-house, in Frederick county. There were five in Ohio, viz.: at Canton, Stark county; eight miles west of Wooster, Wayne county; St. Mary's Mission, Mercer county; near Fracksville, Richland county, and on ground belonging to David R. Shelly, three miles east of Smithville, Wayne county. Very imperfect reports of these twenty-four camp-meetings were ever published, but five hundred conversions is a conservative estimate. This is based largely on statements as to the number at the altar at different meetings, and the number fellowshipped. At one camp as many as twenty were at the altar in one night, and thirty-nine converts are reported. W. Barr, of Harrisburg, reports that at the Harrisburg, or Poor House, camp "about sixty mourners were down at one time, and on the last night of the meeting thirty young men went forward in a solid column and knelt down at the mourners' bench." This was in part the result of the spirit which animated the camp-meeting people, aided by environment, and favored by the remarkable presence and power of the Spirit. For those who "concluded to tent prepared their minds and their spirits with fasting and prayer. You would hear them talking much about the meeting, and but little was said about the preparation of the necessaries of life. Anything would do them for the body. Their principal concern was about the soul, how they might be built up and sinners converted to God."

In 1842 there were eighteen camp-meetings held, nearly all on old grounds. West Pennsylvania had but one, while Ohio again held five, one possibly at a new point called "Allaman's farm," but no county is named. It was at this camp-meeting that Isaac Whisler, later of Fredonia, Iowa, was converted. He says "it was an old-fashioned, Holy Ghost meeting." In East Pennsylvania the Bedford county camp-meeting probably took the place of the Awkwick Valley camp of 1841, as it was on the same circuit. It was held three miles east of Stonertown. One of the converts of the Broadfording camp, Washington county, Md., was Abraham Resh, who in 1847 emigrated to Venice township, Seneca Co., Ohio, and ten years later was ordained by the Ohio Eldership. About two hundred conversions were witnessed at the camp-meetings which were reported. At all these meetings there was considerable German preaching. Often revival meetings followed the camp-meetings, as at West Newton, Westmoreland county, Pa., formerly called Robbstown, where Dobeon reported that "since our last camp-meeting the Lord has abundantly blessed the labors of our hands."

In 1843 the brethren in Ohio held six camp-meetings; Maryland, two; East Pennsylvania, ten; and West Pennsylvania, two. One of these was held "on Abraham Sherick's land, formerly J. Myers,' near the Mennonite meeting-house, Westmoreland county."

The Summer of 1841 was the banner year for camp-meetings. By 1844 some opposition against them developed among those who had formerly strongly endorsed them. This was the result in large part of the lack of encouraging results, as the number of converts decreased from year to year. The reaction from the Millerite excitement also manifested itself. Yet the number of such meetings held in 1844 did not decrease.

The number of camp-meetings held in 1844 was twenty-four. East Pennsylvania and Maryland had twelve; Ohio had the same number as the previous year, and West Pennsylvania had four more. These were partly in new territory. One was in Irwin township, Venango county; one in Rockland, same county; one in Westmoreland county; one in Fayette county; one in Indiana county, Indiana Mission, and one at Slippery Rock, Beaver county. One of the East Pennsylvania camp-meetings was held at Two Taverns, in Adams county, a county which has been almost wholly abandoned by the Church. The one at Rockland, in Venango county, was held by the church at that place, where Thomas and John Hickernell had organized a church a few years before. J. Myers says "the people in general were of the lower grades, just beginning to be properly civilized after they embraced religion." Reports published of the number of converts at these camp-meetings exceeds one hundred and fifty. The number of tents ranged from eight to thirty.

As the fruits of the combined labors of the bannered hosts of the Lord during these five years are reviewed the thoughtful reader well-nigh feels as if he were in an atmosphere of romance. The workers were coherent, enthusiastic and potential. Revival meetings, protracted meetings, barn-meetings, woods' meetings, quarterly meetings, and camp-meetings were the incessant order of the day. Opposition there was, but it was overruled for good. Within the ranks of ministers and churches "unity of sentiment and feeling and brotherly love prevailed." The royalty of friendship was exemplified. There was faithful, plain preaching on church government, ordinances, church name and other distinctive tenets held by the brotherhood. The ordinances were observed at each camp-meeting, and it was not uncommon for Methodists and members of the Evangelical Association to participate in the ordinances, and occasionally a Methodist minister. Some despised these illiterate men. On one occasion one "handed down his Greek Testament in contempt, as if his dabbling in Greek would authorize him to abuse us either in English or in Dutch." Indeed often in reporting work the statement that "there is considerable opposition" was followed by the assurance, "but I take that for a good sign." But persecution was no new and no strange thing. The Jews were the first willful persecutors of Christianity. Intolerance, especially in religious matters, seems congenital. The habitual impatience of new truth, or of new doctrine in opposition to cherished ideas, which have long had a quiet lodgment in the mind is difficult to resist. And this species of conservatism is eminently developed in theologians and religious classes. Then the ecclesiastical jealousies liable to be awakened do not tend to make the path of the reformer a smooth one. Fanaticism is also engendered in behalf of any creed or cause with which personal feeling has become associated. It must also be remembered that ministers those days were not always polished and honey-mouthed in dealing with the "errors of the sects." Illiberality and rusticity are closely allied. But opposition and persecution discouraged but few. As of old when Pharisees and Sadducees, long at variance in religion and politics, united in their enmity first against the preachers and then against the people, in vain did they attempt to suppress the miracles and the preaching which kept the name of Jesus ringing in their ears. Prisons were in vain when a divine hand opened the door. The church soon learned to understand the philosophy of persecution. So in these more modern times. They saw that experimentally persecution has no logic to convince the thinking mind, no pathos to warn the soul, no terrors to convert men. It confirms the true disciple in his faith. The results justified this confidence.

In 1841 the Board of Missions of the Pennsylvania Eldership sent Samuel Conrad as a missionary into Virginia, and while "a number had been converted" during the year, no permanent work was established. To get appointments was easy, for McCartney had six the year before; but while "prospects appeared good," he left no permanent fruit. This was in Berkeley county, to which Conrad was sent in 1841. Somewhat better success attended the efforts in what is now West Virginia, where John S. Kerr labored in 1842. He gathered a small band in Brooke county, and organized the first church at the Forks of Fish Creek. As no other minister of the Church had been in that country, he urged brethren to come to his help, "so that the odious name of Kerrites may be avoided."

An incursion was made into Sussex county, Delaware, in 1841, the most southern county in the State, by Levi Record, of the Pennsylvania Eldership. He reported that he had "baptized several persons. The people seem to be much excited on the subject of baptism"; "requests the saints in Pennsylvania and elsewhere to pray for the success of the work of God in Delaware," and invited "such of the preachers as preach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth to come and help us." But about this time he "surrendered his license," and so ended his work in the Eldership.

A persistent effort was made during this period to establish the cause in Baltimore, Md. Jesse Appler had moved to that city in 1840, and urged preachers of the Church to visit the city. "If they could come they could preach in the Court House yard, where thousands of people could hear them." Evidently this call was responded to, for in 1842, through the earnest labors of McFadden, the work had so far progressed that when Winebrenner visited the city in the Spring of 1842 he organized a church. The preaching then was "in the open air, in market houses and other places." In the Fall "they rented the Paca Street Institute, in which they met for a short time. This becoming too small to contain the increasing congregation, they rented a larger hall at the corner of Lexington and Eutaw streets." Lack of preachers prevented the appointment of a regular pastor for 1843. Bamberger and McFadden labored there from the Fall of 1842 until the Spring of 1843. Mackey spent some time there a little later, followed by Flake and Keller. Winebrenner had been in Baltimore in December, 1841. He went by way of Hanover, Walkersville and Uniontown, and preached in the Reformed church at Hanover, at the Glade Reformed meeting-house, in Uniontown and Baltimore. Of Baltimore he said, "I think on the whole the prospect for raising a church of God in Baltimore is pretty good." He speaks of "the fertile and delightful Glade Valley, the pleasant and delightful home of my childhood and youth." He returned home over the same route, stopping at his brother Christian's to attend the funeral of his father, Dec. 11, 1841. In Frederick county, Md., at a point called "Resolution" a church was organized Feb. 14, 1841, of which G. U. Harn, then "a beardless boy" was elected elder, and Jesse Leatherwood, deacon. The work had its beginning in a special meeting, at which five were baptized, one a Methodist preacher's son, and another a Methodist for thirty years. In the Fall of the same year a church was organized at Pine Grove school-house, of which most of the members at Resolution became members. In Washington county Smedmar reported that the "cause is prospering slowly, but surely." Conrad, in 1841, organized a church at "Manor," possibly Sample's Manor, and "opened up a number of new appointments." Work was also begun at Waterloo, Carroll county, and at Blairsville, in 1842. J. H. Hurley, later of Illinois, in 1843, gives an account of a revival at Pleasant Grove school-house, in Cotoctin Valley. The Hagerstown circuit in 1844 was served by G. U. Harn, and he reported "most of the churches in a quite prosperous condition." He had a revival 5 miles from Emmittsburg, with about twenty conversions, "several of them members of a certain church numbering about one hundred and fifty members, and only three persons who will pray in the congregation." Harn sometimes walked nine miles to an appointment, preached, and then walked back. Baptism was preached everywhere, and the converts were forthwith baptized. At Frizzlesburg, in Carroll county, a "new meeting-house was built and dedicated May 12, 1844."

In Pennsylvania east of the Allegheny mountains the ministers were pushing out everywhere as they were able, extending their fields and promoting church work. Some of the circuits became too large to be served by one or two men successfully, while stronger churches were demanding more preaching, especially on the Sabbaths. Snively, who was located at Bainbridge, on the Susquehanna, in Lancaster county, says: "The extent of my circuit now is about forty miles." He not only preached over the territory in the county westward of Lancaster City, but eastward and northeastward, at Ephrata, Reamstown, Adamstown, Hinkletown and other points. Other points called for preaching, but he could not respond. He had fifteen appointments, and he says "there are now many other places where the people want preaching." This demand was heard from nearly every section of the territory. There is a suppressed complaint on account of "the support being cut off by making stations of those places able to support." The largest circuit in the Eldership was in Lebanon and Schuylkill counties, on which the preacher had to travel one hundred and fifty miles on one round over his field. This was all done on horse-back. The spirit of aggression was in the hearts of the ministers. They were adding new preaching points to their fields and extending the borders in all directions. They felt that they were "well able to go up and possess the land." Many churches were established during this period. At Carlisle, in 1840, there was a company of believers who worked diligently, and occasionally others through their labors and at protracted meetings "joined themselves to the Lord." But the formal organization was effected in 1843. In Landisville, Lancaster county, more rapid progress was made. In March, 1840, John C. Landis wrote "in behalf of the scattered brethren of East Hempfield township, Lancaster county," saying, "We have had only three sermons preached here this whole Winter. We have no organized church yet." But the main reason was removals of Church families to the West. But the revival wave of 1842 swept over that community; many were converted, and a church was organized in 1842. Jacob H. Hershey, who died in 1898, was long an office bearer in this church. In October, 1843, the church "began the erection of a meeting-house," and on Oct. 15th, laid the corner-stone. The house was dedicated to the Lord Jan. 7, 1843. Harn, in 1844, in announcing a camp-meeting near Mt. Joy, invited the churches at Maytown, Landisville, Marietta and Rohrerstown "to attend, with as many tents as they possibly can." Protracted meetings had been held at Maytown in 1841. At Rohrerstown a protracted meeting was held "in H. Bear's ware-house, beginning Oct. 28, 1843," but no organization reported. But at Marietta, May 2, 1841, Snively reported that "we have constituted a little church, ten in number, and soon, from present prospects, expect to swell the number to twenty."

Lancaster church had many vicissitudes in its history. Organized in 1816, it had become small in numbers, under the long pastorate of John Elliott, from its organization until 1838. In the seven succeeding years "it had the labors of several ministers, until 1840, when it had no regular pastor." It "had become rather discouraged, when it pleased God to visit them again." On the 22nd of January, 1841, Winebrenner, Flake and Ross went "to Lancaster to hold a meeting for a few days." This meeting continued until in March, resulting in from one hundred and fifty to two hundred conversions. The church decided to build a new Bethel, and purchased a lot on the corner of Prince and Orange streets for $1,500. Here the new house was erected. The corner-stone was laid Aug. 12, 1841. So Flake reported in August, 1841, though in 1861 he gives the year as 1842. He laid the corner-stone and Winebrenner delivered the address. Besides these two ministers, Wm. Miller, Wm. McFadden and J. Keller were present and took part in the services. Winebrenner wrote the hymns used on the occasion, as also one of the hymns for the dedication, which took place on Sunday, March 20, 1842. Winebrenner preached at 10 a. m., from II. Kings viii. 63; in the afternoon Flake preached from Heb. xii. 22-24, and in the evening Ross preached from Luke xiv. 22. "The new meeting-house of the church of God at Elizabethtown" was dedicated Sunday, Oct. 1, 1843. For nine years the church at Washington had no house of worship. But in the Summer of 1844, a bethel was built, the corner-stone of which was laid in July, and the house was dedicated Dec. 22, 1844.

In Lebanon county a bethel was built at Millerstown in 1842, and dedicated Oct. 1 and 2, of that year. The name of this town has been changed to Annville. At Stumpstown, now Fredericksburg, Lebanon county, the work was making good progress during 1841-43. Additions to the church were frequently reported. Finally in 1844 the church decided to build a bethel, of which the corner-stone was laid Aug. 25th. T. Strohm preached on the occasion, from Ezra iii. 9. Winebrenner also preached, and he laid the corner-stone. Monroe Valley, or Kreizer's, is a point four miles from Fredericksburg, where successful church work was also done at this time.

The work at Mahantango Valley, Schuylkill county, began as early as 1834, but not under the preaching of Church of God ministers. The converts first received light on baptism, and were immersed by United Brethren ministers. It was then that Church of God ministers entered the Valley, such as Snively, Keller and Strawbridge. The Heplers and Haases and Klingers were among the first converts. At Weishampel, in the adjoining valley of Deep Creek, the first church of God was organized, in 1842, under the labors of Thomas Strohm. At Scotchman's Lock, on the Schuylkill river, now called Auburn, Samuel K. Moyer and Joseph K., his brother, natives of West Brunswick township, Schuylkill county, were among the earliest converts, and members of the first organization of the church of God, formed in 1843.

In Dauphin county the small band of Christians at Hummelstown slowly increased. Protracted meetings were held under adverse conditions, and souls were converted. At Highspire, in 1843, the church built a house of worship, which was consecrated "on the first Sabbath in August." J. K. Buser, who died in 1887, was the leading instigator in the erection of the first bethel, and was a member of the first organization of the church of God in Highspire. At Rockville, five miles above Harrisburg, a bethel was built in the Summer of 1843, and was dedicated July 4th. Winebrenner preached in the morning from I. Kings viii. 63, and at night he preached on the ordinances, "which were then administered to a goodly number of disciples." There was also regular preaching at McAllister's, a few miles above Rockville; at Dauphin, still further up the river, and at Clark's Ferry and Chubb's school-house, in Powl's Valley.

Cumberland county showed good results of the labors of these years. In Warrington township "a new church of thirty-two members was organized." At Cross Roads a new house of worship was dedicated. At Cedar Spring, now Milltown, the beginnings of Sunday-school celebrations are seen. Three schools, Walnut Grove, near Camp Hill; Shiremanstown and Cedar Springs, in 1841, united in a grove under "their own respective marshals" to hold a union Sunday-school celebration "for the purpose of treating the children to a procession, address and repast, to encourage them in attending Sabbath-school and learning." This was on Saturday, July 24, 1841. Sixteen rules were laid down. It was on Sabbath, September 12th, following this celebration that "the new house of worship at Cedar Spring" was dedicated, David Maxwell, William Miller, J. Winebrenner, and Jacob Keller officiating. At Good Hope a bethel was built in 1843. It is the old neighborhood of H. Murray, later of Iowa, who in later years deprecated the low condition of that church, which has become extinct. In the Winter of 1841 the Mechanicsburg church held a revival meeting at which there were over one hundred conversions. In 1843 they decided to build a new meeting-house, but delayed the matter for various reasons. In 1841 the brethren in Newville had "succeeded in getting a little house of worship;" "but as the people have got the idea that we are a poor set of deluded 'Mackeyites' (as we are termed), they do not think worth while to come and hear our preaching brethren." A work of grace was enjoyed in 1843 at Marsh school-house, three miles below New Cumberland. "The church of God in John Basehore's neighborhood," Cumberland county, in "the Conodoguinet creek," dedicated "their new house of worship on Sabbath morning, October 29, 1843."

In Franklin county a church was formed at the Wolverine school-house, now the Lurgan church, by E. West, in about 1840. In 1842 the Orrstown church was organized by James Mackey, at the home of Joseph Strawbridge.

Sections of York county have always been good ground to sow Church of God seed. It has yielded good fruit. At Siddonstown, in 1843, it was noted by the Editor of "The Gospel Publisher" that "there is a young church of warm-hearted disciples formed, consisting of about forty members." Shaw and Hinkle were the pastors. There was regular preaching at York Haven. At River School-house, now Goldsboro, a church was organized in 1842 by J. G. Kister. In 1843 there was a revival here and at Newberry at which one hundred conversions were reported. Buttstown, at Bro. Baker's, and Yocumtown were also points at which there was stated preaching. Adams county, with a number of preaching places, was at this time part of the West York circuit. Petersburg and Bender's School-house had small bands of disciples.

Second Bethel at Landisburg, Pa.

Perry county yielded good results to the early labors of the ministry of the Church. Good work was done by emigrants into the county from churches further East. In 1840 quite a revival was experienced at Shaffer's Valley, where thirty-seven were converted. This is near Landisburg, where a good foundation was laid for permanent church work. In 1842 they began the "building of a meeting-house," under the labors of C. Price and S. Conrad. It was finished and dedicated October 15, 1843. Winebrenner preached the dedicatory sermon. This was a brick building, considerably larger than the original house built by Wingert. It was replaced in 1873 by another and larger brick building, 53 by 35 feet, which was dedicated November 23d of that year. G. W. Seilhammer was pastor. Ministers at the dedication were G. Sigler, A. X. Shoemaker, Jesse Kennedy, W. L. Jones and J. B. Soule.

About six miles eastward from Landisburg is the old Soule neighborhood.

John Soule and family moved to this locality about 1830, bought a farm and began improving it. He opened his house for religious worship, and for some years services were held there. Soule, his wife and two sons, Henry L. and Jacob B. were converted in 1840. The sons later entered the ministry. It was shortly after their conversion that a church was organized in Soule's house, of which John Soule and George Kintner were chosen elders, and Peter Kintner, deacon. M. F. Snavelly was pastor at this time. Snavelly also preached at Pisgah, Oak Grove, Montabella Furnace, Deardorf's, Newport, Kumler's School-house, Wild Cat Valley, Turkey Valley, Kennedy's Valley and Buffalo Valley. In a school-house near the present Red Hill Bethel, a protracted meeting was held in 1843, Jesse Oren and his wife being among the converts, and a church was organized.

The work extended from Perry into the adjoining county of Juniata, and by 1844 sufficient points for preaching were opened to justify the making of a field called Juniata circuit. In the Winter of 1840 Samuel Angle, of Shippensburg, assisted Snavelly and J. W. Collins at a protracted meeting at Waterford, Juniata county, as a result of which they "were called upon to organize a church which has its name from the New Testament." The elders were D. A. Clugston and Joseph Hazelet, and the deacons, George Kline and John Serves. There were eighteen members.

Good success attended the labors of the ministers further across the mountains, in Huntingdon, Fulton, Bedford and Blair counties. In 1844 there was an Awkwick circuit, to which Lininger was assigned, but at the meeting of the Eldership in 1845 it was vacant, but J. Lininger was sent to Broad Top and Awkwick. This field extended from Saxton to Ft. Littleton. Lininger had been pastor on this field from 1841. It was at a meeting held in Bedford county in the Winter of 1842-3, that the Carpers were converted, which in 1854 moved to Bureau county; Ill. Under Lininger's labors a revival occurred at Awkwick School-house, in 1842, where some of the Gutschalls and Ramseys were converted, who became members of the first organization of the church at Walnut Grove. The Ramseys later emigrated to Iowa. Lininger also organized a church in 1842 at Round Knob School-house, with eight members, of which William Figard was elder, and John Sear, deacon. Plowman pushed further south in Bedford county, and held protracted meetings within three miles of Bedford. Work at Stonerstown and Puttstown was making good progress. There was quite a revival at Puttstown in September, 1841, in the school-house, where Lininger organized a church, with Jacob Reed as elder, and David Berkstresser, deacon. The organization was effected on Sabbath evening, October 17th, and consisted of thirteen members. Puttstown is a short distance above Saxton, and Stonerstown below. At Entriiken, nine miles toward Huntingdon, and Coffee Run, revivals were also enjoyed in 1841-42. In October, 1840, Lininger and Snavelly held a protracted meeting on Broad Top mountain, at Anderson's, and reported a few conversions, with "many more in search of truth." In May, 1841, Snavelly organized a church there, with seven members. Samuel Anderson was elected elder, and James Edwards, deacon. "More will soon join in with them." In 1843 a Bethel was built in that neighborhood. At Woodbury, in the north-eastern corner of Bedford county, a church was organized by Keller in 1841. In 1842 quite a revival occurred in a barn near the village. There was German and English preaching by Mullenix and Keller, and "some of the people got their eyes opened respecting sectarianism." This place is in the Morrison's Cove, where the Church was firmly planted some years before. In 1841 quite a revival was held at Mary Ann Furnace, not far from Martinsburg, where "many were powerfully convicted." Lininger, writing from Martinsburg in June 17, 1841, says: "I have now ten appointments, which I fill every two weeks, and the cry of the people still is, 'Come and preach for us.'" He had organized a church at Entriiken's Bridge, with twelve members, and was also pushing the work in the Cove. At the Eldership he reported that he had organized three churches on the Cove Mission during 1841. In 1842 a church was organized at Martinsburg, and they proceeded at once to build a Bethel, which was dedicated August 11, 1843, when the dedicatory sermon was preached by Winebrenner, the other ministers present being Snavelly, McCartney and Lininger. In 1844, C. Price "paid us a visit," says J. Keiser, of Hollidaysburg, Blair county, and "preached for us in the Baptist meeting-house." "We have good prospects of getting two more openings about 4 to 6 miles towards Pittsburg." "Opposition is strong."

And toward Pittsburg the church extension work was pushed vigorously. In 1842 the Pennsylvania Eldership appointed J. M. Klein across the Allegheny mountains into Indiana county, where he began his labors in the Spring of 1843. He preached at Cherry Tree with very good results. He reported baptizing "a number of believers." At his camp-meeting that year he states that "we shall not overreach by saying fifty were converted." A church was organized with thirty-five members. On August 12, 1843, a church was also organized at Brush Valley, with Michael Fetterman, elder, and David Fetterman, deacon. For 1844 Klein and Price were appointed to this mission. Price, however, was changed by the Standing Committee to Cove Mission. Klein reports laboring in Indiana and Cambria counties. "The churches are on the increase, and generally speaking in a good condition." Already in 1842 Lininger had extended his labors into Indiana and Cambria counties, and "had seen about fifty converted." He "formed a church in Indiana county." Also in Susquehanna township, Cambria county, where he organized a church in July, 1842, of twelve members, with Isaac Gifford for elder, and William Gifford, deacon. It was known as Grass Hill Bethel. In August, 1840, John Buhaup, "one of the building committee of the meeting-house just built by the church of God at Pittsburg," reported "the house now ready for preaching." It was located "at Byardstown, Pittsburg." Before dedication a protracted meeting was held, and Keller preached in it August 20th. They had "been holding worship in it since that time," wrote Buhaup June 4, 1841. The church then "numbered about twenty members." In Westmoreland county the church organized at Rosenberger's, or Bethany, prior to 1844, had built a house of worship, in which the Eldership session of 1844 was held. At Funck's successful meetings were enjoyed. At Mt. Pleasant E. West and Bauermeister held a successful meeting in 1841. At West Newton a church of twenty members in 1843, "all Germans." They at once formulated plans "to build a house of worship this coming Spring"—1843. Work in Fayette county was reported by Dobson in 1843, where they enjoyed "a glorious visitation of God's reviving Spirit." This was "8 miles east of West Newton." A camp-meeting had been held at same point in Fayette county in 1843. The first converts in Fayette county were under the preaching of Thomas Hickernell "when on his mission to western Pennsylvania." D. Wertz, in 1844, held a protracted meeting in Greene county, at Windy Gap School-house. Following this meeting, Wertz went home with Henry Sherick and preached near his home in a United Brethren meeting-house, in Washington county. Sherick was one of the converts of the big revival at Lisburn, Cumberland county, in 1825, and removed to Washington county some years later.

In Butler county, the work at Harmony following the camp-meeting of 1841, and at Slippery Rock, made steady progress. At the former place the church increased to forty members, and at Slippery Rock to thirty. Yet Hickernell lamented that "not so much good is being done; very few conversions. And it is the same in Venango county." Butler and Venango counties constituted a circuit in 1841, with Hickernell and Ramsey as preachers. A church was organized this year eight miles from Butler. One had been organized "in the neighborhood of Bros. Carner and Snow, of twenty-three members," in the Winter of 1840-1. In Venango township, Venango county, quite a revival took place early in 1842. Church organizations were effected wherever there were revivals, as Hickernell wrote: "We in Venango county, when preaching and meeting with success, form the converts into a church, and then proceed to teach them further their duties." In April, 1842, one new meeting-house was dedicated in Venango county. Work was also begun in Mercer county, where "at the Meshanick," Thomas Hickernell held a successful meeting toward Spring of 1843.

During this quinquennium in Ohio Eldership, the work was carried forward with resolute purpose and commendable zeal. The churches prospered, the borders were enlarged, new fields were opened and additional counties were added to the territory. The mission work was pushed with characteristic energy. In Pennsylvania there were three circuits besides the Pittsburg mission. In Ohio the new counties entered were Miami, Summit, Marion and Columbiana, with a mission in the "Western Reserve" and one in the State of Indiana. A Bethel had been built at Sugar Creek, where the Eldership met in 1841. Also at "Bro. Funck's," where an adjourned meeting of the Standing Committee was held in 1840. Hickernell organized a church at Hyattsville, 14 miles north of Dayton, in 1843, consisting of twenty members. John Simons removed to Wayne county, where in 1841 there was a church organized "in Bro. Allman's neighborhood." From Richland and Mercer counties Hickernell reports twenty conversions at Gallion, and smaller numbers at other points, with eighty-five baptisms within a year. The work in Marion and Miami counties began largely through the labors of David Shriner. He was a native of Frederick county, Md., and his parents were members of the German Reformed Church. He was converted at a camp-meeting near Hawk's meeting-house, in Maryland, and united with the Methodist Protestant Church. When he moved to Ohio, in 1833, he joined the same Church. Hickernell led him into the light on what became to him by this time a troublesome question, baptism and human creeds. He was baptized by Wm. Adams, and his house became the meeting-house for the neighborhood. In 1844, at a special meeting in his house "some sixty persons embraced Christ," and a church was organized. Shriner was elected elder, and Lemon C. Haines, deacon. Hickernell and Adams also did effectual mission work in these counties. Hickernell in 1842 spent some time in Summit county, part of the Stark county circuit, where they "realized an unusual manifestation of God's power." During that Winter "thirty embraced religion." In Columbiana county, adjoining Stark county on the east, and bordering on Beaver county, Pa., a mission was established in 1842, to be supplied by E. Logue and A. Hollems. In 1843, J. Hickernell was appointed to this mission, and served it during 1844.

In 1841 George Baker, of Indiana, attended a camp-meeting in Mercer county, Ohio, bordering on Indiana. He was an emigrant to Indiana, and was a lay preacher in the Church. At the Eldership, October, 1841, a circuit was mapped out, comprising Mercer, Van Wert and Allen counties, Ohio, contiguous territory, and Adams county, Indiana, adjoining Van Wert and Mercer. In 1842 Indiana Mission was created, with J. Martin as preacher.

As yet there was but little attention given to the question of Sabbath-schools. The matter received but limited attention by pastors, for their hands were full and their time required for other work. One of the first schools established was at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, Pa. The lead had been taken in that county by Ludwig Hacker, a member of the Seventh Day Baptist Church, in the middle of the eighteenth century. But the vine he planted was of slow growth among the German people of that county. The Mt. Joy school was organized in 1840, and D. M. Martin, who however gives 1843 as the date, says this step "should induce the different churches of God in Lancaster county, and elsewhere, to organize Sabbath-schools." The church at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, organized a Sabbath-school on New Year's day, 1841. It at least celebrated its first anniversary on New Year's day, 1842. At Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, a Sabbath-school was organized in September, 1844. These schools were invariably called "Sabbath-schools." "Celebrations" were held in the Summer, when the schools would go to the woods nearby in processions. The time was spent in singing, prayer, addresses, sermons and recitations by children ranging in age from seven to fifteen years. A "repat" was served at noon, which meant "a plentiful dinner." After a brief intermission the order of services of the forenoon was repeated, with different speakers. There were no amusements.

As yet the brotherhood was not agitated with the discussion of questions on which divergent views prevailed. They were too much engrossed with church work. Yet some questions would naturally arise as the consciousness of a growing brotherhood was awakened. They were a grave, austere body of people, with sentiments bordering on Puritanism. Theaters were as popular then as now, but the ministry of the Church endorsed the "Gospel Publisher's" view which characterized them as "cradles of vice, schools of scandal; yea, trap-doors of hell." To be a Christian and patronize the theater, ball-room and like places was considered totally incompatible.

The Bible Wine controversy had hardly become a living issue at this time, and indeed at no time became of general interest among the churches of God. It received but occasional mention. To nearly all the churches of God and their ministry "wine is grape juice fermented," and they left it at that.

Naturally they defended the "mourners' bench," or "anxious seat," which was so unpopular with formal Churches. It was an evolution, and not a studied innovation. Winebrenner did not introduce it, but it grew up under his preaching. Sinners were so deeply convicted that they fell down anywhere in the congregation and cried with loud voice for mercy. It was found more practicable to bring these struggling souls together in order to instruct them and pray with them. They did not, except in private houses, have ante-rooms into which to take them. They were very bolsterous, and cried mightily to God for pardon. And while at first kneeling was considered "a most proper position for one asking forgiveness of God," they needed no instructions on this point. And so the custom of inviting penitents to "the altar" became firmly established. There, "in the agony of their souls, they made often a great bodily struggle, and sometimes fell over upon the floor, and tossed themselves about, until by faith they laid hold on the promises of the Savior, and he blessed them." But what was first a convenience soon became a sine qua non, a necessary condition of salvation, so that it was thought no one could be saved without going through this experience at the mourners' bench. It was therefore quite a concession when as early as 1843 it was admitted editorially that "we do not preach up a mourners' bench as a divine command. We use it only as a human measure."

Aside from baptism, the washing of the saints' feet and experimental religion, nothing provoked more heated discussions than the Church itself. Is it a "sect," and by what right is it assuming the name "church of God"? The departure from the teachings of Winebrenner's "Scriptural View of the Formation, Government and Discipline of the Church of God," and conformity to other ecclesiastical organizations opened the way for incessant and acrimonious discussions of this question. With one voice, including Winebrenner's, and with some degree of ungentle and trenchant diction, they resented the charge that they were Winebrennerians. "They reject the name Winebrennerian and utterly abhor that or any other human appellation." "It is entirely discarded by all the members of this body of Christians." "The Church discards every human invention." "The name Winebrennerian is entirely disowned by the Church, not one member being willing to wear it." When the opposers of the Church denounced the arrogant assumption of calling the new body of believers the Church of God, saying, "No body of Christians has a right to call itself the Church of God," they replied that they should not be "censured for glorying in scriptural names." The "Presbyterians have no right to call themselves the Church of God. Nor any others. It would be inconsistent. Nor are they willing that any body else should call them so." "But we deem it the filial duty of the child to own the father's name. So we, if we are the children of God by conversion, should acknowledge the same in our individual capacity, and in a collective capacity as a church." With equal and vigorous consistency they repudiated the charge that the Church of God is a denomination or sect. No terms were too expressive with which to denounce "sects" and "sectarianism," and so to resent such a charge against themselves. Editor McCartney in caustic terms denies those charges as published by the "Baptist Record," saying: "He errs in calling the Church of God a sect. She is no sect, much less a modern sect. She existed before sectarian names and practices introduced their concomitant evils into the world, paralyzed in a great degree the efforts of Christ's chosen ministers, enervated the motives of the gospel, hardened men's hearts against the sympathetic and melting appeals of Calvary, rendered them deaf to the claims of heaven, taught them to observe the traditions of the elders rather than the word of God, and gained popularity in an almost entire departure from primitive principles. He has committed an egregious error in saying that J. Winebrenner is her 'leader and founder.'" All this Winebrenner emphatically taught. In answering A Converse, of the "Christian Observer," in 1844, he said: "I wish you to let the readers of the 'Observer' know that the 'Church of God' is no sect, of which Mr. W. is the leader. No, sir; her name, her leader, her laws and her subjects are the same now as they were from the beginning." The "Baptist Record" persisted, and Winebrenner replied: "We said the 'Church of God' is no sect, and we say so still, and stand prepared to prove it whenever the editor of the 'Record' will cease his puerile nick-naming, and take his stand like a Christian, and a scholar, to defend the opposite."

Baptism was a constant theme of pulpit discussion. It proved the great battle ground for a generation, and was the decisive question for scores and scores of converts of the Methodist, the German Reformed and Lutheran Churches. It was prominent in sermons everywhere. The washing of the saints' feet was frequently assailed, and was vigorously defended. Its observance was universal in the churches of God, and it was quite generally practiced by the United Brethren, the Mennonites, and to some extent by the Free-will Baptists. The arguments and objections of those who opposed it were frankly stated and forcibly answered. They generally insisted that "if feet-washing be no commandment, then there is no commandment to be found in the gospel." Some strong advocates, like Peter Nead, members of Churches which rejected the ordinance, were freely quoted. These discussions were more frequently between the editors of "The Gospel Publisher" and editors of other religious papers. These amenities of editorial life were a characteristic of the age.

A somewhat protracted discussion was conducted in 1843 through the "Reformed Church Messenger" and "The Gospel Publisher" between Winebrenner and J. W. Nevin, of Mercersburg Reformed College, and later President of Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa. It was on Winebrenner's part a most lucid and trenchant "defense of the views and doctrine of the Church of God."

Minor questions were also mooted. Among these was the title "bishop," which for a while seemed to be popular, instead of "elder," as all were opposed to "Rev." Human creeds were discussed, only to be reprobated with extreme severity and intemperance. They were characterized as "calculated to deceive and bewilder;" their "requirements are unreasonable;" they "circumscribe us in the pursuit of knowledge;" they "enslave the church of God and her free-born children;" "they prevent the spread of the gospel," and "they are the work of fallible men, who have had the arrogance to assume that they had the right to dictate to their fellow men how they should interpret God's blessed word."

The question of ordination by the imposition of hands began to be discussed pro and con in 1842, and continued to monopolize considerable time and space in "The Gospel Publisher", "The Advocate" and Eldership sessions for twenty-five years. A debate on baptism was held at Mechanicsburg in the Winter of 1841 between E. West and Rev. Mr. Weiser, a Lutheran minister. West maintained that "immersion of believers is the only Christian baptism." The controversial spirit is likely to grow on a man, and especially when as successful in maintaining one's position as West was at Mechanicsburg. And so West was soon in another "public debate on baptism at Landisburg, Perry county, Pa., with Rev. H. Slicer, a Methodist minister." The proposition was "both the subjects and mode of baptism." This was in the Spring of 1842. Whatever connection the question of rebaptism had with the baptismal controversy, it arose at this time. It was charged by pedit-baptists that to immerse one who had been sprinkled was a second baptism, which by act denied the first baptism. How, then, when one who had been immersed, fell away and was reclaimed, when he applied for baptism? Winebrenner, W. Miller and McCartney discussed this question in the Fall of 1841, and gave it as their clear conviction that "baptism before conversion is unlawful, and therefore a person should be rebaptized after he becomes a believer." Or as Editor Welshampel put it: "Christ's order requires faith and repentance first, and then enjoins baptism as a Christian duty." As for infant baptism, that is "rationalism, and should not be considered valid because done unauthorizedly." But rebaptism of a baptized believer, after having fallen away and being reclaimed, was not approved.

Care was taken not to make baptism a condition of church fellowship. At first the ordinance was too often neglected, and stronger ground had to be taken, involving the danger of making it the door into the church, or a prerequisite to church fellowship. But baptism during this period was strongly preached everywhere, and but few ministers failed to keep the matter of church fellowship a secondary consideration.

The well-known singer and evangelist, Ira D. Sankey, was born at Edinburg, Pa., in 1840. The celebrated moral suasion crusade, known as the Washingtonian movement, had its origin in the reformation of a Baltimore drinking club in April, 1840. The organization of Washingtonian Temperance Societies became endemic. The churches favoring total abstinence took a very active part in the movement. But it had spent its force by the end of 1843; yet it is claimed that "a quarter of a million would be a low estimate of the number of habitual drinkers of intoxicants reclaimed through the instrumentality of the Washingtonian agitation." The order of Sons of Temperance was the offspring of this crusade, instituted in New York City, September 29, 1842.

The Evangelical Synod of North America was organized in 1840. Also the German Evangelical Lutheran Protestant Church. It was opposed to Synodical organizations.

Under guise of a divine revelation in favor of polygamy, Joseph Smith and Hyrum Smith, Mormons, for a criminal act were arrested and lodged in jail at Carthage, Ill., in June, 1843. On the evening of June 27th, a mob attacked the jail, and both the Smiths were killed. Brigham Young was appointed head of the Mormon Church.

In 1844 the Southern Baptists began their separate organization. In 1843 the Wesleyan Methodists withdrew from the main body on account of slavery.

CHAPTER VII.

THAT astute political philosopher and great popular leader, James G. Blaine, begins his "Twenty Years of Congress, from Lincoln to Garfield," with a review of the events which led to the political revolution of 1860. In doing so he goes back to the original compromises between the North and the South in the Constitution; the acquisition of Louisiana from France, in 1803; the agitation of the slavery question in connection with the application of Missouri for admission into the Union as a slave State in 1820, and the Missouri Compromise; the annexation of Texas in 1845, and other great historical events of the first half of the century. So there are three factors which in a measure determined the religious trend of the period upon which the Churches in America entered in 1845. Of these, two were identical with the political events of the country—Slavery and the war with Mexico. The war with Mexico began officially May 13, 1846, and the treaty of peace was ratified by the United States Congress on Friday, March 10, 1848. Not only had this war a demoralizing effect, but it intensified the popular disposition for territorial acquisition. The impoverished condition of Mexico induced the cession to the United States of California, New Mexico and Utah the same year. All claims on the part of Great Britain to Oregon, Washington and Idaho had already been extinguished in 1846. The history, political and religious, of all this vast territory on the Pacific coast thus hinged, for the time at least, on the war with Mexico, and the significant events following the discovery of gold in California in 1847.

But slavery had a more immediate effect on the condition of the Churches. Beliefs and opinions are largely determined by heredity and environment. In the slave territory of the United States ministers and Churches advocated and defended the system of involuntary servitude upon scriptural grounds. In other sections they were at first divided, but gradually became strongly in favor of the abolition of the entire system. In border territory it created bitter antagonisms and heated controversies, and greatly interfered with the peace of churches and all aggressive church work. The churches of God in Maryland maintained a neutral attitude, although nearly all the ministers were opposed to slavery. But in West Virginia some trouble developed. Even in Greene county, Pa., bordering on West Virginia, there was serious dissatisfaction. The Church there was "greatly injured by dissensions on the slavery questions." They had "excluded pro-slavery persons from Christian and church fellowship." This Winebrenner seemed to disapprove and "censure." But he explained by saying: "I do not censure churches for excommunicating slaveholders when the action of the church is regularly had, but I condemn all irregular and proscriptive proceedings." "The church alluded to did not exclude slaveholders from their communion, but those members who cast their votes in favor of slave-holding candidates for civil office. Now, the exercise of such proscriptive power was evidently not intended to be sanctioned by the General Eldership." Religious bodies in the North became strongly anti-slavery, and adopted resolutions on the subject at all their meetings. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a leader among women in the anti-slavery agitation, as also famous in the woman-suffrage movement, was at the zenith of her power at this time.

Nothing had a more quickening influence on American life than the increasing facilities for transportation and intercommunication consequent on the building of railroads, the growth of periodical literature and the invention of the magnetic telegraph, the offspring of American genius.

The tide of emmigration continued to rise, and with it many families of churches of God in eastern Pennsylvania were carried westward to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa. And even from Western Pennsylvania and Ohio further West. This depleted many of the churches, while many of these families were scattered far apart in their western homes. The great work of the period was to rebuild the decimated churches in the East, and to follow these families to their newly made homes. Ministers in proportion also went with the tide, but only too often to quit the active work and homestead on the rich government lands under the Homestead Laws which had been enacted by the State and Federal Governments in order to stimulate emigration and to remove some of the hardships of the common law. In some instances there was an effort to colonize, and thus nuclei, or centers of development of church life were formed, resulting in the permanent establishment of churches. Men and means were the great need of the Church, and there was immense consequent loss. Winebrenner was the undisputed leader in all the work of the Church. He was not only primus inter pares; he was premier. But his time was too much preoccupied with duties in the East to become a general missionary in the West. The Hickernells, Harn, Logue, Hawk, and others worked heroically, "but what are these among so many?" Winebrenner not only visited the Ohio and West Pennsylvania Elderships, but also some of the camp-meetings in their territories. In 1847 Harn made a tour to the West by way of the Ohio river to Cincinnati, St. Louis and then up the Mississippi to the northern counties in Illinois. On this tour he preached. He preached in Athens county, Ohio, the south-east corner of which borders on the Ohio river. S. S. Richmond was on this charge as the appointee of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. He also preached for the brethren in Meigs county, on the Ohio river, adjoining Athens county on the south. Thence he proceeded on his journey via St. Louis to Burlington, Iowa, within 30 miles of which place, at Trenton, Ia., Logue was engaged in missionary work. Thence to Davenport, Iowa, and Savanna, Ill., from which point he went across Carroll county, Ill., into Ogle county, the second county eastward from the Mississippi. Here he found some brethren from Maryland, his native State. He preached at a Methodist camp-meeting in Ogle county. Also at Mt. Carroll, Carroll county. This country he characterized as a "new world." From this point on he says he "preached almost continually." He visited Boone and McHenry counties, and preached at various points, and made an incursion into Wisconsin. Two observations made in his letters indicate how much the Church lost by not having men and means to make the best use of its advantages. "My soul has been grieved and deeply distressed that so much ground should pass uncultivated." "Circuits are unsupplied that used to support two preachers."

The prospects in 1845 were not so encouraging. From different points in Pennsylvania and Ohio the reports came that "there is nothing very encouraging to communicate." In making its report on the state of religion the committee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1845 said: "The state of religion at present, and for the last year or two, has not been so cheering and prosperous as in former years." At this time "the whole number of ministers in the three Elderships," was ninety-three; "the number of churches and preaching places, about five hundred, and the number in membership, about ten thousand." In Ohio churches were being edified and some new ones organized. In Richland county, E. West was stationed at Vermillion for the year 1845, and the church increased. In 1845 H. Murray traveled the circuit, with A. Megrew, which included Wayne, Holmes, Tuscarawas, Coshocton, Stark, Portage and Summit counties, on which they "had about thirty appointments, giving the people of our charge preaching every two weeks." Progress was made, and the work was divided, leaving Murray twenty appointments. The third year the work was reduced to Stark, Portage and Summit counties. He opened new points until he had eight preaching places. He organized a church "in the Stump neighborhood in 1846," in Stark county, which grew until it had fifty members when Murray left. At Dalton, Wayne county, Megrew organized a church in 1845, and a Bethel was built. Calls from Darke county, Ohio, along the Indiana line, were responded to by T. Hickernell, the indefatigable missionary, and good work was done. Also in Clark county, east and south of Darke. The first preaching in Hancock county was about six miles west of Findlay, where John Bolton, father of the three Bolton brothers who became ministers, located in the year 1847. He was a native of Lebanon county, Pa., of German descent, a "member of the old school Lutheran Church." He was converted in Stark county, Ohio. Upon his invitation William Adams, of Richland county, visited the Bolton neighborhood and preached in John Bolton's house. The "first church of God in all this country" was "organized there in the Summer of 1848, in a meeting held by W. Adams aided by H. Murray." It consisted of John Bolton, Mary Bolton, John F. Fox, Susan Fox, Martha Heck and Elizabeth Geyer. John Bolton was elected elder, and John F. Fox, deacon. Hickernell also penetrated into Montgomery county, where he had preaching at Father Shupp's, one mile from Dayton. At Wooster, Wayne Co., Ohio, A. Megrew organized the first church of God in May, 1848, consisting of sixteen members. Charles Huff was elected elder, and J. P. Winebrenner, deacon. John J. Bear, assigned to Ashland circuit, moved to Shenandoah, Richland Co., Ohio, and traveled "a circuit which is nearly 200 miles around." M. A. Cook was sent to Athens county, Ohio, by the West Pennsylvania Eldership in 1845, where S. S. Richmond had been doing good work, and did successful preaching. He held a camp-meeting during the Summer. He extended his labors into Meigs county, on the Ohio, south of Athens, and even penetrated into Adams, four counties further west, where he "found matters partly encouraging, and partly to the contrary." In Canaan township, Athens county, a church was organized at the time of the camp-meeting. Other organizations existed at this time in Athens county, and were visited also by John Hickernell, in 1847. Harn, in June, 1847, had visited Athens county on his tour to the West. He preached in the Court House in Athens county, on the Commission, and at sundry other places. Richmond again followed Cook in 1847, and did good work. Columbiana county, Ohio, was part of the West Pennsylvania Eldership territory, and was in good condition. T. Hickernell went as far South as Preble county, Ohio, the third county north from Cincinnati, on the Indiana line, and held a protracted meeting of two weeks near Twigsborough, and organized a church of twelve members, with Alexander Makee and Wm. Hutton, elders, and John Hutton, deacon. Yet the brotherhood in Ohio was not satisfied with the results of their labors, and the question found public expression, and attempted solution: "Why is it that the Church of God does not have more success in Ohio?" In 1848 "the brethren at Madisonville, four miles north of Wooster, on the turnpike, erected a large and commodious house for the worship of God. It was dedicated on the 22nd of October, 1848." E. Logue preached the dedicatory sermon.

The three ministers appointed to Indiana by the Ohio Eldership in 1844 were local missionaries, and did not accomplish much. They are classed among the "General Missionaries" at the Eldership in 1845. J. Martin became an active worker, and was efficient in the work in the years following. T. Hickernell in 1846-7 preached in Adams county, at the home of "Bro. Snayers," and at "Bro. Walter's," De Kalb county. These families had emigrated from Pennsylvania, with a number of others, and had been members of churches of God. Hickernell was assisted in 1848 by A. B. Slyter. They worked westward and northward, into Wells, Huntingdon, Allen, Whitley, Noble, De Kalb and La Grange counties. In Noble county they held a successful camp-meeting in 1848. Work progressed so favorably that they arranged for a meeting in the neighborhood of John Martin's, Milford township, La Grange Co., Ind., in November, 1846, to organize an Eldership. In 1849 Wm. Booth emigrated to Wayne county, Ind., on the Ohio line, east of Indianapolis, and called for Hickernell to come and preach for them. By such means the work was extended from county to county, until in 1849 ministers were regularly appointed to five counties, while there was considerable preaching in several others. Winebrenner and Harn preached at points in Allen county, at John Winebrenner's, in Noble county, where a cousin, Andrew Winebrenner, desired a regular preaching place to be established. Also in Elkhart county. Families of churches of God in Ohio and Pennsylvania had emigrated to these and various other counties; and while some stood aloof, waiting for ministers of the Church of God, many others had united with other Churches.

The principal Church work in Illinois during the years 1845-50 was done in the northern section of the State. Emigration to that section was then much larger from Pennsylvania. Already in 1837, John A. Shuler, years after the organization of the General Eldership one of its treasurers, had moved from Middletown, Pa., to Ottawa, La Salle county. A colony of Church of God families emigrated from Lebanon county, Pa., to La Salle county, Ill., in 1849, and settled at Troy Grove. Among them were the Klinefelters, Fahlers, Kreislers, Gephards, Firestines, Hawks and Waggoners. The population of Chicago at that time was 19,725. Others settled in Bureau and Henry counties, west of La Salle. But more located in Carroll, Ogle, Jo Daviess and Stephenson counties, in the extreme northwestern part of the State. Some of these were from Washington county, Md., and constituted the "Maryland Colony," such as the Millers, Reidenours, McCormicks and Shaeffers. Jacob Miller and family emigrated to Carroll county in 1846, and "were five weeks on the road." It was to these brethren that it was proposed to send Harn as a missionary in 1848, and to raise $200 by subscription to support him. On his tour to the West in 1846 he had visited them and preached in these northwestern counties in Illinois. He baptized a few persons in Mt. Carroll. John Blickenstaff, an Indiana minister, also preached some in this section in 1847. This year the East Pennsylvania Eldership established an Illinois mission, but left it unsupplied. There was also preaching in Whiteside county, south of Carroll, in 1847. There were some eighteen Church of God families in Ogle and Carroll counties in 1847 which had emigrated there from the East, and prospects for Church work were most encouraging. In Fulton and Adams counties, some distance southward, were also Church of God families which were calling for preachers. The only church of God organization mentioned as early as 1848 is that at Mt. Carroll, Carroll county, which was formed about that time by G. U. Harn.

Iowa, "the most purely agricultural of all the United States," was originally a part of the immense territory included in Louisiana, and ceded to the United States in 1803. In 1838 the Territory of Iowa was organized in due form. In 1844 a State Constitution was framed, and after some delay, on Dec. 28, 1846, the new State was admitted into the Union. It lies in the Zone of the greatest movement of migration; is "the beautiful country," and after its organization as a State attracted emigration from all the States eastward. The earliest emigration of Church of God families was in 1837, when the families of Jacob Smith and John L. Waitman located in Henry county. Then came David Neff, John McCormick, John Zentmyer, John Neff and their families, with a few others, who located near Trenton, same county. This is in the southeastern corner of the State. They soon began to hold prayer-meetings in their homes, and invited ministers of the Church to come and preach for them. "Father Joseph Barton was probably the first one to preach for these people. He was followed in 1845 by Samuel Scott and E. Logue." Logue reported his labors in Iowa, and "prospects in that country," to the East Pennsylvania Eldership in November, 1845. On March 4, 1847, he wrote that he had held a protracted meeting near Trenton, where he lived; that "twelve or thirteen were converted, and ten united in church fellowship." In May, 1847, Hawk, who lived 50 miles North, in Johnson county, visited Trenton, Henry county, and preached to this "small church," and he states that "they are all Germans." There was then a small company of Church of God people at North Bend, Johnson county, Hawk's home. Henry Bechtel, of Cumberland county, Pa., emigrated to Johnson county, Iowa, in the Spring of 1845, and in the Fall of the same year he moved to North Bend. He says "there was no church of God in those parts, and there was no one to contend for the New Testament doctrines as held by the Church of God save myself and companion in life." "John Kepford and family were the next to come to this beautiful prairie country." A prayer-meeting was started and a Sunday-school organized. "In the meantime Logue came into the southern part of the State, and hearing of this little band started out in search of us" Jan. 20, 1848. Logue visited North Bend the second time and organized a church of six members, with J. Hawk as elder, and H. Bechtel, deacon. The other members were Mrs. Hawk, Mrs. Bechtel, and John Kepford and wife. Logue continued to preach in Henry county and other points for some three years. In the Spring of 1849, M. F. Snavely emigrated to Johnson county, Iowa, and settled at North Bend, followed in the Fall by J. Lininger and others from Huntingdon and Bedford counties, and "six or eight families from York county." Others during the early part of the Summer of 1849 emigrated from Fishing Creek, Dauphin county, Pa., to near Grandview, Louisa county. Up to Aug. 17, 1849, there was no post office nearer North Bend than Iowa City, and no "blacksmith, wagon maker, shoemaker or cabinet-maker nearer than Iowa City, from seven to ten miles off." Big Creek, 12 miles from Mt. Pleasant, Henry county, became the home of Joseph Barton, of Stark county, Ohio, in 1839. In 1845, his brother Thomas located near him, and in 1847 a church organization was formed, the place being known as "the Home Bethel."

At the Indiana Eldership in November, 1848, A. B. Slyter was appointed missionary to Southern Michigan. His work was interrupted, and limited results followed. Already in 1841 a church was organized in Michigan under "the labors of a good brother" which, after carefully canvassing the question of a title, decided "to call it the church of God in ———. This is the Bible name," writes one to the "Union Herald" in that year. "It is naming the body after its Father." "If Wesley, or Calvin, or any other man, or set of men, is the author of the church, then label it after the person who has begotten it; but if God is the father, then let it bear his title." This movement was not under the labors of a minister of the Church of God.

In 1847, when on a tour to northern Illinois, Harn "traveled in eight counties and a part of Wisconsin Territory," but no permanent work was accomplished.

In the Fall of 1847, Elder H. Rupp, of Richland county, Ill., with several other families, moved to Missouri, where he did the first preaching by a minister of the Church of God. But as he remained only a short time in the State, nothing permanent was accomplished.

Work in what is now West Virginia was pushed forward with considerable success. In Brooke county John S. Kerr organized a small church in 1847, and the people generally "assented to the truth we preached." A mission established in Wood county in 1845 was making fair progress. D. Wertz reported successful meetings in Marshall county in 1848, with "prospects of the reformation growing more flattering." He organized a church with Samuel Smith as elder, and Lazarus Ryan, deacon, which had increased to seventy-five members by May 23, 1848. "The new meeting-house at Woodlands, Marshall county, W. Va.," was dedicated in 1849. The East Pennsylvania Eldership continued its mission in Virginia, in Berkeley county, with but small success.

In Maryland considerable progress was made during this period. At Sandy Mount, Carroll county, there was a good beginning made for church work in 1849. At Parksville, in Washington county, a church was organized in 1849. The church at Sample's Manor the same year secured by purchase by Thomas Grim the union school-house for a house of worship. A church was also organized in 1848 in a dwelling house near Emmittsburg, Frederick county, in 1848, and steps were taken to build a bethel. In Baltimore persistent efforts were put forth to establish a church on a lasting foundation. The church "had become somewhat scattered and discouraged," wrote Winebrenner, when in 1848 he assisted McFadden in a special meeting. But he thought "the church in Baltimore is likely to do well." The church was laboring under serious disadvantages. Not able to build a bethel, it worshiped in 1846 in Howard Street Chapel, a Methodist house of worship which it rented. But it had to "give it up, and go back into a hall it had used for several years." An effort was made to build a bethel, or to buy a suitable building. This was partly successful, for in 1847 "the Cove Street meeting-house" was purchased, a small building, "forty by thirty feet in dimensions," for $800. But according to Winebrenner's statement in 1849, the work moved along very slowly, and with not very inspiring prospects. The debt contracted by the purchase of the Cove Street property proved a menacing hinderance.

The general interests and the work in the West Pennsylvania Eldership were, with slight exceptions, in good condition and were making steady progress. Virginia was still a part of the territory of said Eldership. Greene county, Pa., in the southwest corner of the State, contiguous to Marshall county, Va., on the west, and Wetzel county on the southwest, was the scene of encouraging revival work in 1846 and following years. A church of "upwards of fifty persons [fifty-six] was formed upon the original New Testament platform" in the Winter of 1846. At Aleppo, Greene county, a house of worship was built in the Summer of 1847. The work in Cambria county, under the labors of J. M. Klein, made encouraging progress. Joseph Glenn, of the Rockland circuit, Venango county, in 1848 "extended his labors into the adjoining county of Clarion" with good results. At Brush Valley, Cambria county, in 1848, a new meeting-house was built. The work under Hickernell and Ober, of the Westmoreland and Cambria circuit, was pushed southward into Fayette county. The Perryopolis Mission in said county was established in 1845, under Daniel Wertz as missionary. In 1849 Indiana county was part of the Westmoreland field, and a good degree of success attended the labors of Ober and Hickernell. In 1849 a church was organized at Mill Creek Furnace, near Johnstown, Cambria county, by Ober. The same year at Fayetteville, Mercer county, the church continued its building project, and dedicated in the early part of the Summer. Special efforts were made from 1846 to 1849 to save the church at Pittsburg. The Eldership was not able to supply it with a pastor. Harn agreed to serve the church, and located there in 1846. In June, 1847, he reported that "things began to wear a promising aspect." Also that "the church has taken a new place of worship, over which they hold the sole control." Harn was succeeded by J. A. Dobson, and the prospects apparently grew brighter. In January, 1849, J. Myers expressed it as his judgment that "the church in Pittsburg may do better in future than it ever did heretofore." But at the Eldership in October, 1849, no pastor was assigned to Pittsburg, and Winebrenner in December, 1849, wrote: "The things most unaccountable to us are the giving up of the Pittsburg station," etc.

A similar course of events attended the work in Philadelphia, in the East Pennsylvania Eldership. In March, 1845, the church numbered thirty members, with J. Quigley, pastor, and the "prospects are flattering." "A conditional contract" was made for a house of worship prior to the Eldership in November, 1845. In May, 1846, there were two separate church organizations in Philadelphia, with Quigley and Deshler as pastors. Winebrenner visited and preached for the brethren in Philadelphia in January, 1847. In April, 1848, Harn was appointed as Quigley's successor, Quigley serving the other congregation. Services were held in Howard Hall, Shippen street, between Third and Fourth, and in Native Hall, on Third street. But Philadelphia as a station does not appear on the Journal of the Eldership from the Fall of 1848 until October, 1865, when D. A. L. Laverty was appointed to the Philadelphia Mission, to take charge April, 1866. While the work in Philadelphia was thus suspended for eighteen years, elsewhere it was carried forward with unabated energy. A number of houses of worship were built, and thus a more permanent character given to the churches. At Woodbury, Bedford county, the first bethel was erected in 1845. John Carper and George Ditz were the Building Committee. The house was dedicated by Samuel Angle, of Shippensburg, who presented a pulpit Bible to the church. At Siddonstown, York county, "the new meeting-house" was "dedicated to the worship of God on the 1st day of January, 1845." The years following to 1849 "very gracious outpourings of the Spirit of God" were enjoyed, and "many obtained the pearl of great price." At Auburn, Schuylkill county, steady progress was made by the church. It was one of the twenty-eight appointments on the Dauphin, Lebanon and Schuylkill circuit served by T. Strohm and A. Snyder, extending from Matomoras in the northwestern part of Dauphin county, to Orwigsburg, Schuylkill county. Winebrenner preached there in 1848 for several days, and says "the little church in that place bids fair for the kingdom." A bethel had been built there in 1846. Prior to that they held their meetings in private houses, and then in an old building used as a pottery. "The brethren put the clay apple-butter and milk crocks in the upper loft, and, cleaning the rubbish and dirt out, put benches in it, and then it was ready for the preacher. It is said that in less than one year over fifty persons embraced religion in the old pottery shop."

The present house of worship was erected in 1868, and was dedicated Sept. 27th. The services continued two weeks. Keller preached the dedicatory sermon, and was assisted by J. Haffleigh and I. Brady.

The church at Orrstown, Franklin county, organized in the house of Elder Joseph Strawbridge, built a bethel in 1845. The trustees were Jacob Knisley, Abraham Hostetter and Emanuel Kendig. The church then numbered forty-two.

"A snug little bethel" had also about this time been erected at Hollidaysburg, Blair county. There were about "eighteen or twenty members." The town had five hundred of a population, with five churches.

At Soule's, Perry county, the church erected a log bethel in 1846, which was dedicated by Winebrenner. The ground was donated by John Soule, in whose home the church had held its services for nearly six years. He and his two sons, Henry L. and Jacob B., both later ministers in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, "mainly built the house."

A church was organized at Hinkletown, Lancaster county, Feb. 5, 1847, with John Stamm, elder, and ———— Rodgers, deacon. In January, 1848, they decided to build a bethel; laid the corner-stone on May 28th, and the dedication took place Sept. 24th of the same year, Winebrenner, Swartz and Keller officiating.

On July 27, 1847, John C. Booth, pastor, states that the "remnant of five members" of the church at Newville, Cumberland county, rebuilt their bethel, which had been wrecked by "a terrific gale," and dedicated it, and organized a church of twenty members.

At Maytown, Lancaster county, the services were held in a school-house from 1847 to 1849, when the need of a bethel was strongly urged by the pastor, endorsed by Winebrenner.

In Perry county, "the new bethel near Bro. Kumbler's (Red Hill) was dedicated Dec. 18, 1849.

At Smoketown, York county, May 13, 1849, the bethel was dedicated by the little church which "had come to the conclusion to prove the Lord in the matter of tithea." "The new bethel at Andersontown, York county, was dedicated on Dec. 31, 1848.

On Dec. 25, 1849, "the bethel at Camp Hill, near Bowman's, Cumberland county," was dedicated. A collection had been announced. It amounted to $45.00. Winebrenner, Maxwell, Howard, Seabrooks, Dresbach and J. F. Miller were present. This bethel is still used by the Camp Hill church.

Bethel at Camp Hill, Pa.

The Churchtown bethel, removed into the village, was dedicated Nov. 11, 1849.

Plans were matured in January, 1849, to build a "meeting-house for the worship of God" in Newport, Perry county.

Successful work was done during this period on the Awkwick circuit in Huntingdon and Bedford counties; at Orwigsburg and vicinity, in Schuylkill county; in Blair county from Hollidaysburg to Martinsburg; at Goldsboro, York Haven, Newberry, Lisburn and other points in York county; in Dauphin county, and in the Mahantango and Deep Creek Valleys, Schuylkill county. The mission interests in Lehigh and Berks counties were well cared for by J. Keller, with favorable indications. One new point was opened in Berks and three in Lehigh, and "he had invitations from four or five different places."

At the Eldership in November, 1848, Benjamin Howard, "a member of the Church of God in the State of New York," being present and made an advisory member, "gave a brief sketch of the origin and views of the churches of God in that State and Nova Scotia." He reported a church in Ogden, Monroe county, N. Y., thirty years old, "in order and practice the same with yourselves," with "a fine meeting-house, and sixty to eighty members, wealthy and respectable." Also one in Livingston county. "There are also in Nova Scotia a number of churches called the churches of Christ, or churches of God. They refuse all human titles." Howard remained the greater part of a year in Pennsylvania, preaching among the churches in Perry, Franklin, Cumberland, Dauphin, Lancaster and other counties in the State, and Carroll county, Md.

Many Sabbath-schools were organized during this period, the Eldership and ministry generally taking a positive stand in their favor. Eight camp-meetings were held in Pennsylvania in the Summer of 1849; three in Ohio; one in Indiana, and two in Maryland.

In 1849 A. D. Williams, Free Baptist, wrote of the ministers and members of the churches of God, "They are peculiarly a zealous and fervent-spirited people."

The ministers were self-sacrificing, devoted and resolute. The fields of labor were in many instances very large, as some circuits extended through two and three counties, a distance of from sixty to one hundred miles between the extreme points, with as high as twenty-eight preaching places. Four weeks were required to make a "round" on the circuit, during which the minister was absent from home. Ministers rode horseback, with saddle-bags for an outfit. To serve such fields in heat and cold, rain or sunshine, with a very limited financial remuneration, required contempt of dangers and hardships, courage to meet obstacles and difficulties almost insurmountable, tenacity of purpose of an intrepid character, and heroism of the highest order. There was nothing empirical in their make up. Their ambition was to enlarge their fields and to save souls. Underlying all reform movements with them was the universal panacea of the gospel—a regenerated spirit. They had no utilitarian theories, no eudemonism, which made the permanent elevation of the race possible without genuine, radical godliness. And so they had but one mission.

The membership of the churches in these early years was of high repute for piety and practical godliness. Discipline was rigidly administered. The local eldership was watchful, paternal and jealous of the good name of the church. Delinquents were admonished, and from the incorrigible fellowship was withdrawn. The church was careful to have no communion with the world. They were radical in their views concerning worldly associations. This developed in the position taken relative to Secret Societies. It was their zeal for the purity of the church and the good name of its members that led them in many instances to oppose the joining of Benevolent Societies, Odd Fellows, Masons, and even Sons of Temperance. The underlying thought of this opposition was primarily that the church is "based upon principles of most unbounded philanthropy and benevolence," and does not need these worldly organizations. Also that fellowship in these organizations is contrary to the teachings of God's word, which require the believer to have no fraternity with the world. The church is sufficient for all purposes. In this view they were sustained by the Elderships, which were explicit and positive in their deliverances on the subject. Winebrenner, however, did not take such a radical position. Answering the advocates of the then popular view on these organizations he said: "We accord to men the right of private opinion, and will not proscribe and condemn them for holding different views and opinions in matters of indifference." "We are neither their advocate, nor their judge. We are willing that to their own master they should stand or fall." "We are opposed to Secret Societies. Masonry and Odd Fellowship we hold to be far more anti-Christian orders than the Sons of Temperance. Yet there are doubtless many good men connected with them." The Evangelical Association officially took the same radical position against Secret Societies, and it would not ordain men to the gospel ministry who were members of these Orders. And in the United Brethren Church membership in these Secret Orders was "totally prohibited," and "there shall be no connection with secret combinations."

To quite an extent intermarriages with persons in other religious bodies, and more especially with non-Christians, was discouraged. Family worship was insisted upon, and the family altar was erected in every church home. The subject was frequently the theme of sermons and the topic of discussion in "The Church Advocate." Specific directions were often given as to time and order of conducting this service. Fasting and prayer were inculcated, and special days were almost annually named to be thus observed. Prior to the opening of the camp-meeting season of 1847 Winebrenner wrote editorially: "We cordially recommend to the churches of God the observance of days of solemn fasting and praying in reference to the approaching camp-meetings. Such days, rightfully observed, are among the best means of preparing for a successful effort upon those occasions."

The matter of tithing received considerable attention. Winebrenner advocated tithing in a series of editorials in 1848. But while individuals in the churches adopted it for their own rule, it failed to receive general endorsement.

On judicial oaths there was greater unanimity, and the practice of "affirming" instead of "swearing," was quite general. Mackey, for a generation a Justice of the Peace, insisted that judicial oaths before magistrates are not anti-scriptural. Miller questioned his conclusions, and contended that an "affirmation alone is scriptural." He had the churches largely with him.

While the question of the relation of baptism to church membership came up repeatedly, it was only in comparatively few churches that baptism was held to be a pre-requisite to church fellowship. While there was considerable sentiment in favor of unfermented wine and unleavened bread in the administration of the Communion, it at no time became the general practice. The example of Christ was urged in favor of the practice, but it did not convince the ministry and churches that it had the authoritative sanction of command. And so it was considered a matter of opinion, and a non-essential. But this did not enter into the question of temperance, or total abstinence. The ministry and churches always strenuously insisted on abstaining from the use of intoxicants.

The question of union of the churches of God and the Free Baptist Church was considerably discussed during 1847 to 1849. A. D. Williams, a Free Baptist minister, in a communication in "The Church Advocate" of Feb. 15, 1847, favored such a union, and urged that to this end the two bodies should seek to become better acquainted. Winebrenner replied to Williams by private letter, concerning which Williams, in another communication published a month later, said: "I can not refrain from expressing my satisfaction with the spirit of all you sent me." He continued to urge union, not "like the mechanical mixture of oil and water, but that union of aim and object, actuated by the same hallowed spirit, that like melted wax mingles and loses all traces of its former plurality, or separation." Harn interpreted this correspondence to mean that Winebrenner was considering "the propriety and expediency of a union between the Free Baptists and the churches of God." He favored further efforts in that direction, and expressed his desire "to see more of these fraternal epistles." He himself manifested this spirit when later in the same year on his tour to Illinois he was entertained by, and preached some days for, a Free Baptist pastor in Athens county, Ohio, and later in northern Illinois he "preached seven times to a little church of Free-Will Baptists," speaking "near three hours in my Sunday discourse, giving an outline of what were our views." They agreed with all but two points, one of which was "the title we give to a church," on which point "they say it was their original practice, and they were certain we were right." But evidently Winebrenner was misunderstood, as later expressions of his views indicated that he could favor union only on the New Testament basis of one true church, the church of God, so construed as to give no recognition to sectarian denominations, for to his mind the church of God is not and can not be a sect. In 1848 "Benjamin Howard, a member of the Church of God in the State of New York [Free Baptist] was present and invited to a seat as an advisory member" of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. During the Winter and the following Summer he preached among the churches of God in the Eldership, and organized a church of God in Pfoutz's Valley, Perry county. Beyond thus creating sentiment in favor of a closer union between the two bodies nothing was accomplished. Such were the clearly defined and positive views of ministers and churches against sectarianizing the church of God that organic union with any denomination was considered impracticable. In August, 1846, the World's Christian Convention for promoting Christian union was held in London, England. Brethren suggested that the Church of God be represented, and Winebrenner declared that his "whole heart and soul would be favorable to the proposition, provided some of our rich brethren would furnish the means." The "unity of all saints," he declared, is "a consummation devoutly to be wished for." Winebrenner would have been the delegate had the means been secured.

The work of Howard revived the question of local church ordination. Winebrenner had taught in 1829 that "the presbytery of the church" has the right to ordain to the ministry. At that time he recognized no authority higher than the local church. And while he was foremost in the organization of annual Elderships, and of the General Eldership, the former of which assumed certain of the powers of the local church, he did not convince all the churches that his later position was scriptural. Howard was accordingly "licensed as a missionary to travel and preach among us and elsewhere wherever his labors may be desired" by the church in Pfoutz's Valley. Thus was revived the controversy over local church licenses which, as Winebrenner stated editorially in December, 1849, was settled by Eldership resolution in 1846.

The official title of a minister received considerable attention toward the close of this period. Winebrenner quite early affixed "V. D. M." to his name, and continued to use it as Editor to the close of his connection with "The Advocate," and in all his later publications. Other ministers followed his example. To distinguish teaching elders from ruling elders, when the two classes became clearly recognized, the use of "bishop" became somewhat general. "A Letter from Bishop was a common heading of contributions for "The Advocate" in 1845-9. But as this savored of episcopacy it was abandoned. "Rev." was anathematized, and so the scriptural title of "Elder" was everywhere accepted. It was proposed to make Winebrenner a "Bishop," but it seemed so inconsistent that few favored it.

This period is notable for the widespread grief awakened among the churches by the death of some very excellent young ministers, including J. H. Bamberger and John C. Booth. Bamberger's relation to Winebrenner, and his most promising future, made his early death a sorer affliction. Winebrenner's funeral sermon, delivered before the Eldership in 1846, was the apotheosis of a Christian minister. Text—Acts viii. 2.

While the churches of God were earnestly contending for the unity of the body of Christ, schisms developed in some organizations, and new denominations sprung up. The Seventh-Day Adventists arose in 1845. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, effected a separate organization the same year. The Southern Baptists the same year separated from the general body because of slavery. The Millerites organized themselves into a Church about this time. In 1846 the Evangelical Alliance was founded. On May 27, 1847, an Anti-Slavery Presbyterian Church was formed, and adopted the name "The Presbyterian Church of America." The Spiritualists, while not assuming a strict denominational organization, trace their origin back to 1848. The first National Assembly of Archbishops of the Catholic Church met in Baltimore, Md., in May, 1849. The Mormons emigrated to Utah in 1848, and settled in the valley of the Great Salt Lake. In December, 1845, Texas was annexed to the United States, but was invaded by Mexico, which had never acknowledged its independence, and thus originated the war with the United States. The war continued until March 10, 1848, when the treaty of peace was ratified by the Senate of the United States.

CHAPTER VIII.

THIS semi-decade witnessed certain events of a religious and political character closely connected with ecclesiastical affairs which were of tremendous import. The Churches became more apprehensive of the political power of the Catholic Church than in earlier years. The foreign immigration had been slowly advancing, and said Church was thus receiving large accessions. They retained for years the ideas, prejudices and customs of the Old World. This growing strength of the Church, so un-American in its genius, emboldened its priesthood and led to certain aggressive movements upon some American institutions. The leaders ventured upon a fuller development of the peculiarities of their system than had ever been made in this country. In its "festivals," its relics of apocryphal saints, the official advertising of "indulgences," the chastisement of offenders for the purpose of keeping others in subjection, and its resort to the whip and to excommunication with their terrific accompaniments, a great advance was made toward that type of Roman Catholicism then prevalent in Europe. The Churches became apprehensive of the permanent establishment of European Romanism in the United States. And it was equally feared that with it would come fundamental changes in our political institutions. The first Plenary or National Council convened May 10, 1852. Among its most offensive acts was the condemnation of the system of public schools which had been generally established. The activity of the Jesuits in bringing forth their peculiarities more conspicuously intensified popular apprehensions. Hence arose the Know-Nothing party, which flourished from 1853 to 1855, and was somewhat of a politico-religious character. Its purpose was to prevent the election or appointment of any alien to office under Federal, State or municipal governments. They had their great strength in the anti-Catholic portion of the people, and were largely recruited among the Protestant Churches. Mackey as one of the Editors of "The Advocate," in 1854, endorsed the movement, for "there is, we trust, virtue and integrity enough among us to preserve the nation." The public announcement of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception on Dec. 8, 1854, as a part of the Roman Catholic Creed, and the Provincial Council at Baltimore, Md., adopting the "Blessed Virgin, conceived without sin, as the special patroness of the United States" came as great surprises to the Christian public of the United States. The Church of God was intensely anti-Catholic, and its members were in fullest sympathy with the movement to restrict the power of the Catholic Church. What proportion of the 23,191,074 population at the census of 1850 was Catholic does not appear; but as three-fifths of the foreign immigration during the decade was Catholic, the ratio of Catholics was steadily increasing.

During this period the first general battle for Statutory Prohibition was fought. Hitherto, except in the State of Maine where a limited Prohibitory Law was enacted in 1846, and made more stringent in 1848, moral suasion was employed by the advocates of temperance. License laws with certain prohibitory features were placed on the statute books of all the States, but the temperance people depended on moral means to overcome the evils of the excessive use of intoxicants. But on June 2, 1851, the Legislature of the State of Maine adopted the Prohibitory Law which was the type and example of all such laws which were passed in other States, and were "Maine laws." This was the first battle and the first signal victory in the celebrated campaign of 1851-4 for legal Prohibition. The ministers and churches of God gave no double-tongued utterances and assumed no equivocal attitude on this great issue. Not only for themselves did they boldly enter the open door of casuistry and perplexity of Paul's fine statement of the law of consideration for others by adopting total abstinence; but they were ready by all proper means to help to crush out the evil which was ruining so many lives, and which has ever been the most fruitful source of corruption, poverty and crime. "The Church Advocate" was freely used by Winebrenner, Weishampel, Mackey, Flake, Harn, Thomas and others in advocacy of a Prohibition bill before the Pennsylvania Legislature in the Winter of 1851-2. Some misunderstood the terms of the bill, as it was "erroneously stated by the press generally over the State that the liquor bill was the same as the Maine Law." Winebrenner corrected this, by stating that the bill which originated in the Senate did "prohibit the liquor traffic altogether, in a manner similar to the Maine Law," but that "it was so entirely changed and modified" before it passed the Senate "as to defeat the object of the numerous petitions sent to the Legislature." But the bill was defeated in the House. Christian people at once renewed their efforts, beginning this time with a purpose to elect a majority of the next Legislature "composed of men pledged to legislation in the shape of a Prohibitory Law." At the session of the Legislature of 1853 a resolution was introduced "referring to a vote of the people. . . . the subject of a Prohibitory Liquor Law." Winebrenner and others freely used the columns of "The Advocate" in behalf of this measure. Voters were urged to pledge themselves "to make the question of Prohibition the main issue in the next election for members of the Legislature." And as the Legislature failed to pass the Prohibitory resolution, the work of organizing the voters was at once begun. The slogan was, "The Maine Law." Winebrenner published on the editorial page an unsigned "Temperance Address. To the Voters of Dauphin County," saying, "The sum total is to work and battle for the Maine Law." Editorially he stated that "the ministers of Harrisburg, and throughout the Commonwealth, have all taken their stand in favor of the Maine Law." He answered the question, "Whom shall we vote for?" by saying, "3rd, Vote for such only as are from principle avowed, well-known and openly pledged Prohibitory Law men." Joseph Ross, Middletown, Dauphin county, merchant, lay preacher and Treasurer of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, was one of the candidates on the Prohibition ticket in October, 1853.

Winebrenner was "on the stump" during the campaign at many of the "Maine Liquor Law Township Meetings." But the Democratic party carried the election.

Yet on Jan. 14, 1854, Winebrenner wrote: "The prospects for the enactment of a Prohibitory Law are decidedly encouraging." A bill was carefully prepared and introduced, but it failed of passage. The work of reorganizing the temperance forces began at once, and the "marshalling of the Temperance Hosts of the Old Keystone" was pushed "with promptness and vigor." To secure a majority in the Legislature in favor of Prohibition at the session of 1855 was the avowed purpose.

In other States the temperance people were more successful. In Michigan the Maine Law was "approved by the people by a majority of ten thousand." In New York the Maine Law was submitted to popular vote by the Legislature," and it resulted "in a glorious triumph." Vermont in 1853 enacted the Maine Law. A popular election in Wisconsin resulted in favor of the Maine Law. In Connecticut "a stringent and well-guarded Act of Liquor Prohibition passed both Houses in 1854 by a very decided majority." Retailing of liquor to be drunk on the premises was prohibited in 1851-3 in Illinois. Ohio in 1851 adopted Section 18 of the schedule, which prohibited the granting of any license in the State to traffic in intoxicating liquors. The Maine Law was enacted in 1852 by the Legislature of Rhode Island.

On Sept. 6, 1853, the World's Temperance Convention met in New York. It was an occasion of great interest, and Winebrenner urged brethren to attend it, as it was held immediately preceding the World's Fair in the same city. There were two thousand delegates in attendance, among whom was Winebrenner. An incident in this connection reveals the spirit of the times on the slavery question. Winebrenner had permitted "Jr." to publish a note on the editorial page on the Convention in which he stated that "admission was gained by Wendell Phillips, the noted Abolition and Disunion agitator . . . with others of the fanatic species so common in the North," and that the Convention the second day "rejected these turbulent spirits, and proceeded to business." This called out several pungent replies in which slave-holders were denounced as "ungodly, heaven-daring, God-provoking, hypocritical." Colored people had also been "excluded from that august combination of pro-slaveryism, calling itself the World's Temperance Convention." Winebrenner was silent during this controversy, and in his report of the Convention made no reference to Wendell Phillips' presence.

The public conscience in the North had been outraged by the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law in 1850, and the efforts to enforce its provisions made it each year increasingly odious to the people of the Northern States. The thought that the black man was included in the brotherhood of man developed slowly, but it gained ground rapidly under the teachings of Phillips, Garrison and men of that type. In these great-hearted men one gets at the heart of the abolition crusade, the undefiled spring of brotherly regard, out of which all their gracious conduct flowed, not as an exaction, but as free token of fundamental sympathy. Men were made also to see the moral principle involved, and multitudes seeing it did not lack courage to maintain it. Yet the friends of the slave were greatly in the minority. Winebrenner was conservative. He called slavery "a great moral wrong, but there are mitigating circumstances which forbid a wholesale unchristianizing of all who are guilty of the wrong." Two years earlier, in 1851, he published an editorial, "Our Position on Slavery Re-defined," in which similar views are expressed, and declares that the resolutions on slavery adopted by the General Eldership in 1845 "do not bear the construction that they are intended to disallow any one, under any circumstances, who bore the relation of master to slave to be received or retained in the Church, or to be at all entitled to the exercise of Christian forbearance and toleration."

Hence, when the time came to send missionaries of the Church of God to Texas, a slave State, Winebrenner was foremost to favor the movement. Opposition early developed against the project, but Winebrenner persistently favored it. Wertz wrote to Winebrenner in 1854, "I think your proposal for two missionaries for Texas is extravagant, and out of place. Why go to that slave State, while there is so much needed in our free and prosperous States?" The genesis of mission work in Texas was similar to that in the Western States. Cheap land and most fertile soil invited emigrants. Among the first from Church of God families was Elias W. Hollar, from near Shippensburg, Pa., who wrote a letter for publication in March, 1852, urging the sending of missionaries to Texas. The suggestion was at once approved by Winebrenner, who continued to urge the movement until missionaries were appointed. He at once called for a missionary, when A. X.

Shoemaker responded, offering to go if his support were guaranteed. Thomas, Swartz and Hinney were the Board of Missions of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and on April 23, 1852, they proposed to "appoint a missionary to Texas, provided we can get a suitable person to go, and sufficient means." Meanwhile additional Church families removed to Texas, among them Joseph and Sarah Cunningham, John Cunningham and Eliza Wagoner, of Broad Top, Pa., and Conrad Seabough. Hollar located in Dallas county, the third county south of Oklahoma, and the fifth west of Louisiana. The others located 9 miles west of Paris, Lamar county, bordering on Oklahoma, and the third county west of the southwestern county in Arkansas. J. A. Rupley and Mr. and Mrs. Eberly, of the Cumberland Valley, emigrated to Texas in the Winter of 1853. By this time the colony was so enthusiastic over the missionary question that on Jan. 31, 1853, Cunningham wrote, "Send us an able preacher. We will support him." The General Eldership in 1854 adopted a resolution, recommending that the Board of Missions appoint two missionaries to Texas immediately. Through some misunderstanding the brethren in Texas got the impression as early as the Winter of 1853 that two missionaries had been appointed to that State, for on April 24, 1854, Joseph Cunningham wrote, "We are under many obligations to you and the Church for the preachers you sent us out here in Texas. We have been looking daily for them ever since the first of January." The East Pennsylvania Eldership did not carry out the recommendation of the General Eldership, as it did nothing relating to the Texas Mission that Fall. But at the session in 1855 it had before it the names of B. Ober and E. Marple, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, as candidates for the Texas Mission, and it referred their names "to the Board of Missions, to meet in Middletown on Tuesday, Nov. 13th." At this meeting the Board, consisting of Winebrenner, Thomas and Colder, appointed "B. Ober as a missionary to Texas."

He was then in his thirty-second year. He was converted on Sunday night, Jan. 2, 1844, at a prayer-meeting held in a private house near Woodbury, Bedford Co., Pa. Shortly after he was baptized by the pastor, J. Lininger, "in the old Woodbury Furnace Dam, where the ice was eighteen inches thick." He united with the church at Martinsburg, Blair Co., Pa. Thence he moved to Indiana county and united with the church at Garman's Mills, where he preached his first sermon, after he was licensed by the West Pennsylvania Eldership at its session at what is now Barkeyville, Venango Co., Pa., in 1847. He traveled with J. Hickerneil on the Westmoreland and Cambria circuit, Pa.; then on the Marshall county circuit, W. Va., and the Wheeling Mission. He died suddenly at Butler, Okla., Sept. 26, 1911, in his eighty-eight year.

At a later meeting (March 27, 1856) the Board of Missions appointed E. Marple missionary to Texas to accompany Ober.

Marple was a native of West Virginia, and was of a Protestant Methodist family, but declined to become a member, as "they don't preach and practice all the gospel; but then there will be a Church somewhere that will preach all the requirements of the gospel, including foot-washing, and when that Church comes around I will certainly join it." He heard D. Wertz preach a doctrinal sermon sometime later, and when he was through Marple said, "There is my Church, and I will join it." In the Summer of 1852, under the labors of B. Ober, he joined the Church of God and was baptized. That Fall, being twenty years old, he was licensed by the West Pennsylvania Eldership. He was appointed pastor with A. C. Marple in 1853 on the Marshall county circuit, W. Va. In the Fall of 1854 he "went to Iowa, looking for a home and a new field of labor," returning in the Spring of 1855 with the intention of going back to Iowa. "But being appointed to the Texas Mission, all my bright prospects in Iowa went to the tomb."

E. Marple.

Following up Church of God families as much as possible was the rule, and proved the right method of Church extension. This was T. Hickernell's method. Preparatory to undertaking mission work in Illinois he traveled through Whiteside, Adams, Clark, Morgan, Sangamon, Crawford, Jasper and Cumberland counties. This was characteristic work in those days, though it involved privations and hardships. Through emigration from eastern churches nuclei of churches were formed, and calls for preachers came from many distant points. "Come in God's name. This is too good a country for anybody to wait for food or raiment." "We desire to have one or more of the preachers to come and labor in this part of Illinois." "Send us a preacher, and we will help to support him. It is a pity to see such a field open, and no laborers in it." Such were the Macedonian voices from Iowa and Illinois in 1850, 1851, 1852 and 1853. Men and money were the great needs of the hour. Churches in the eastern sections were being decimated by emigration, and the law of self-preservation demanded heroic efforts to gather these emigrants into churches in their new homes. Where ministers were located with their newly formed churches revivals were promoted, as at North Bend, Ia., in 1851, and other points. A colony from Westmoreland county, Pa., in the Spring of 1850 located 13 miles west of Burlington, Ia., and began church work. Among them were Elder William Vance, Christian Landes, C. M. Dillinger, C. F. Stoner, Henry Rosenberger and William Spear and their families. In 1851 another colony from Ohio located near Grandview, Louisa county, among them Elder A. Megrew and the Huff families. A party of eighty-three left Harrisburg, Pa., in the Spring of 1850 for the vicinity of Muscatine, Iowa. From Trenton, Iowa, Joseph B. Nickel wrote in April, 1851, "And behold the tide of emigration! Thousands are flocking to Iowa." From Johnson county, Iowa, Snively wrote in the Fall of the same year, "Emigrants are flocking into the State in great numbers." This was also true of Illinois. Had colonizing been the rule, and not the exception, mission work would have been much simpler and less expensive and laborious. Another serious embarrassment to mission enterprises was the tendency on the part of ministers going West and missionaries sent out to locate. Lack of support sometimes made this necessary. With conditions more favorable hundreds of churches could have been built up in place of tens. When in 1850 the establishment of a mission in Iowa was being considered, Winebrenner wrote: "We now have the offer of a good and able missionary to the State of Iowa, provided he can be sustained. In order that the Board may be able to make effective and timely arrangements for the support of those large and promising missionary fields in Iowa and Illinois it is desirable that our general missionary agents should proceed with their work as speedily as possible." The scheme was a large one for the East Pennsylvania Eldership to undertake alone. Subscriptions and donations were solicited to sustain five missionaries in the West—two in Iowa and three in Illinois—during the next Eldership year, commencing with April, 1851, and ending with March, 1852." Vance had gone to Parish, Des Moines Co., Iowa, in 1850, and Megrew followed in 1851. They were the advance guard in a movement which "will ever be memorable in the history of the Church of God, as 1851 was the year in which successful missionary work was inaugurated in the States of Illinois and Iowa. It is true that some work had been done in these States prior to the above date, but nothing like organized effort had been attempted in Illinois, and but little in Iowa" (Sandoe). It was at the Eldership held at Churchtown, Cumberland Co., Pa., October, 1850, that "arrangements were set on foot" to begin this great work. It was committed to the Board of Missions—E. H. Thomas, A. Swartz and Wm. Hinney. At their meeting held at Me-chanicsburg, May 1, 1851, they officially ratified previous arrangements, and appointed "A. Megrew to Iowa; Jacob M. Klein, to Central Illinois; Daniel Wertz to the Rock River Country, Ill.; George Sandoe to Southern Illinois and Indiana, and Thomas Hickernell, general missionary for Indiana and Illinois."

The amount of $1,200.00 was appropriated toward the support of these five men for one year. They were reappointed the following year.

Daniel Wertz was a native of York county, Pa., born Oct. 21, 1816. He was raised in the faith of the German Lutheran Church, and to carry out his own religious convictions as he approached his majority he was compelled to forsake houses and lands, father and mother and kinsfolks. For he was converted at the age of nineteen, and at once identified himself with the Church of God, and became an active worker in his Master's cause. For a while he preached exclusively in the German language, but gradually acquired the English, and therefore did not much preaching in German. When in his twenty-third year, having removed to Ohio, he was licensed to preach by the Ohio Eldership in October, 1839. The Ohio Eldership a few years later sent him into western Pennsylvania, where he was preaching when the West Pennsylvania Eldership was organized in 1844. He spent the closing years of his life in Iowa. He had the true missionary spirit. He had the reputation of being "an efficient and successful minister, a devoted and zealous Christian and an excellent man."

Daniel Wertz.

Archibald Megrew was a native of Allegheny county, Pa., born in 1810; but was converted at Churchtown, Cumberland Co., Pa., in the Spring of 1833, and united with the Churchtown church at its first organization. He emigrated to Ohio when a young man, where he received his first license, in 1841. His principal ministerial work was done in Ohio and Iowa, to which State he emigrated in 1851. As a member of the Iowa Eldership he was held in high esteem, having been elected Speaker in 1852, the second session he attended, re-elected in 1853 and 1854, and at later sessions. He was elected by the Iowa Eldership a delegate to the General Eldership of 1854, 1857, 1866, 1869, 1872 and 1875. He was regarded as a man of strong and clear convictions, and was never afraid to express them. He was always solicitous for the purity and continued prosperity of the Church. His was a spirit of contentment, and he lacked those qualifications which the insinuating preacher of discontent usually has. Greater usefulness could have attended the labors of his life if he had been kept steadily in the field, instead of devoting so large a portion of his time to the farm. He died at Letts, Iowa, July 6, 1894, aged 84 years, 7 months and 10 days.

Other ministers entered the active work in both Illinois and Iowa. Jacob Lininger, residing at North Bend, Johnson Co., Iowa, in 1853, "extended his labors over seven counties—Johnson, Washington, Des Moines, Henry, Louisa, Muscatine and Cedar. M. F. Snavely also did effective work in Iowa, as did W. Vance. All the regular missionaries traveled over extensive fields, and reported most encouraging results. On Feb. 9, 1851, Vance reported the organization of a church at Danville, Ia., which worshiped in a school-house. At North Bend, Johnson Co., Iowa, they worshiped "in a humble school-house" until the Summer of 1853, when they built a "meeting-house 30 by 35 feet, frame," which was dedicated on Dec. 11th. David Gill, who removed to Buchanan county, Iowa, from Wayne county, Ohio, labored some in the ministry, seeking to "establish the Church of God." A. Megrew preached in said county in 1852. Megrew had reached his Iowa field in June, 1851, and found "the Church of God hardly known here." He began his work in Louisa county, and gradually extended the field into Des Moines, Buchanan, Henry, Johnson and Muscatine counties during his first year, these being the southeastern group of counties, except Buchanan, which is the third county south of the Minnesota State line and the third west of the Mississippi.

Elder Thomas, Indiana, was the first minister of the Church to preach near Glendon, Guthrie Co., Iowa, the fourth county east of the Nebraska State line. The first church was organized in the county in 1853, with eleven members. A prosperous church was organized at Dodgeville, Des Moines county, which, in 1854, began to arrange to build a house of worship, having been "shut out of the school-house." In 1854 Megrew made "a preaching tour up North about 120 miles," into Cedar, Linn and Buchanan counties, preaching in school-houses and holding protracted meetings. In some places other ministers ignored him because "they could not understand what kind of a Church the Church of God is." At North Bend the church lost some converts because it "has taken a stand not to receive any into fellowship except they be first baptized." But the church prospered and grew strong. In 1854 J. Hawk labored in Scott county, Ia., his "field of labor," on the Mississippi.

The three missionaries in Illinois opened a large territory. Wertz located in Jo Daviess county, the extreme northwestern corner of the State. His work extended over Jo Daviess, Carroll, Ogle, Stephenson, Winnebago and Boon counties, a circuit of 200 miles, with twelve regular appointments the first year, and about one hundred conversions. He found twelve Church families when he entered on the mission in a distance of 80 miles; no organized church, and no prayer-meeting. In September, 1851, he baptized fifty-eight at Pleasant Valley, and had baptized twenty-six before. A church was organized at that meeting, and measures were started to build a bethel. By March, 1852, this church numbered eighty members. He reports, March 6, 1852, having "organized a church of about fifteen members in Mt. Carroll." The church and German Baptists "are about making an effort to build a meeting-house in Mt. Carroll."

Klein located in Homer, La Salle Co., Ill. He left Venango county, Pa., where he was pastor, April 26, 1851, by private conveyance, and reached his destination June 25th. His field, while called the Central (Ill.) Mission, was in the northern-central section, south-west from Chicago, with Homer (Troy Grove), La Salle county, as the headquarters. In addition to his home county he traveled over Livingston, Woodford, Peoria, Fulton, Henry, Putnam and Bureau counties, lying south and west of La Salle. He established the first year twelve regular appointments, giving them preaching every three weeks. He found Church families very much scattered. Part of the time he had the assistance of D. L. Byers. A church was organized at Troy Grove, a Pennsylvania settlement, of twenty-six members, in 1851. Also one at Hollowa, one at West Bureau and one at Moory's school-house, Bureau county, and one at Eden's Point, LaSalle county.

J. M. Klein.

Sandoe was a native of Lancaster county, Pa., and, with Klein, had been licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership. His field was nearer the center of the State than Klein's, as he located at Martinsville, Clark Co., on the boundary line between Illinois and Indiana, as he was to travel in both States. He left Pennsylvania for his future field of labor May 11, 1851, and reached Martinsville, Ill., June 5th. His territory embraced a circuit of 350 miles, as he described it—75 miles to Decatur, Macon county; thence southward to Jasper county, 80 miles; thence eastward to Greene county, Ind., 85 miles; thence northward to Park county, Ind., 55 miles, and thence back to Martinsville, Ill., 55 miles. The counties included are Clark, Macon, Moultrie, Coles, Scott, Cumberland, Jasper and Crawford, Ill., and Park, Greene and Vigo, Ind. The first church which he organized was in Park county, Ind., composed of twenty-three members. He also formed churches at Rife's and Shroll's, Macon county, Ill., Jan. 17, 1852; at Martinsville, in the Garver settlement, and at other points. The work prospered, so that he insisted on more ministers being put on the territory. He had the assistance of T. Hickernell, the General Missionary, and in 1853 I. E. Boyer, of Pennsylvania, reached Decatur and began mission work by taking four of the preaching points in Macon county. In 1854, D. Kyle, of Pennsylvania, arrived at Decatur, and took up some of the points in Macon county. Sandoe preached in Decatur in 1852 and 1853. Around Martinsville he had the assistance of Rupp.

By 1854 work was started in Sangamon county, by J. H. Hurley, earlier of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The General Missionary sent to Indiana and Illinois in 1851 with the three other missionaries, Thomas Hickernell, proved an indefatigable worker. He reported in 1852 that "my mission now takes in territory of 1,000 miles and upwards. He organized churches at different points, to which pastors were afterwards appointed. Among the first was one in Auglaize county, Ohio, adjoining Mercer on the south. A German minister of the M. E. Church, living at Kossuth, sent for him to baptize him. A revival followed and a church of God was organized. Hickernell continued his work southward in Ohio through Miami, Montgomery, Preble and Adams counties. The whole southwestern group of counties were territory of much promise. In his work in Ohio he was assisted by C. Sands, who preached largely in German. He complained that many of the points which he opened were neglected by the ministers sent there after he left. In Indiana he preached in Miami county, five counties west of his home. Here he attended a camp-meeting in 1853, and thence traveled 200 miles in his carriage to attend a camp-meeting in Illinois, west of Homer, La Salle county.

Some nights during this tour he says, "I slept quietly in my carriage till morning." He also preached in Parke, Vigo, Greene, Marion and Wabash counties, Ind. In Illinois he got as far north as Tazewell county, in central Illinois, and labored in revival meetings in Macon, Moultrie, Marion, Jasper, Clark and Crawford.

In 1851 when these vast enterprises were inaugurated the statistics published showed that there were 168 churches of God, 375 preaching places, 130 ministers, and 17,550 members. Of the number of churches 27 were reported in Ohio in 1854, by which time the total number had considerably increased. For while the missionaries sent out into Indiana and Illinois were diligently at work in those States, other ministers in those States and in Ohio were making full proof of their ministry. The need of more preachers was deeply felt, as calls came from many directions which could not be answered. The Indiana Eldership had a mission in Defiance county, Ohio, with several churches, where J. Martin and D. Keplinger preached. The latter also traveled through Huntington, Whitley, LaGrange, DeKalb, Allen and Wells counties, Indiana. At Georgetown, Defiance Co., Ohio, a church was formed in 1852. The church at Zanesville then numbered twenty-six. Keplinger, who labored also at Zanesville, Wells Co., Ind., traveled from 200 to 230 miles every four weeks, and preached "from fourteen to sixteen times every round." In 1853 he had F. Komp as a colleague, and his field included also Elkhart, Kosciusko and Wabash counties, with several "missionaries" to help him. His field was "as much as 450 miles round." The work had been so successfully extended into Miami county that a camp-meeting was held there in 1853. J. Martin had organized a church in Jackson, Steuben Co., Ind. They had introduced "quarterly meetings," which F. Komp says "are of great utility and interest, as people are more likely to attend on such occasions, and hence we can have access to their hearts."

In Ohio "the Church of God is still engaged in pushing onward the great gospel car of salvation," wrote David Baker in 1850, when reporting from various points in Wayne county. In this county, at Wooster, in 1854, the church decided to build a house of worship. They were not able to do this alone, and so they canvassed twenty-seven other churches for funds. A serious accident occurred in "putting up the timbers," in which a dozen men were more or less seriously hurt. This delayed the work, so that the dedication did not take place until Aug. 5, 1855. Winebrenner preached the sermon. The work was also extended into several new counties southward and westward from Wayne, into Wyandot, Hancock, Coshoc-ton and Seneca. In Columbiana county, which the Ohio ministers again took up, M. Coates organized a church Dec. 14, 1851. Also in Tuscarawas county, and at Paris, Stark county. A Bethel was built in Stark county in 1852. In Canaan township, Athens county, a new meeting-house was dedicated in 1853. The work, however, was languishing in Athens and Meigs counties for want of preaching. A church was organized near Upper Sandusky, Wyandot county, in 1851, and one near Columbus, Franklin county. A Bethel was built at Father Stump's, Stark county circuit, and dedicated June 22, 1851. In 1853 the meeting-house at Dalton, Wayne county, was completed. The Tiffin circuit, in which Seneca county was included, was making progress under the labors of West and Wilson, and a mission church was formed in Tiffin City in 1854. Other counties in the northwestern part of the State in which good work was done were Defiance, Crawford, Logan, Henry and Wood. In Wood county a church was organized by J. M. West in June, 1852. It consisted of fourteen members. In Tuscarawas county the church at Windfield, "being shut out of the United Brethren church put up a very neat Bethel, 34x40 feet in size," which was dedicated in November, 1854. In 1853 continued work around Findlay, Hancock county, was reported, a church having been previously organized in Liberty township, about six miles west of Findlay, on the Blanchard river. Also at another point four miles north of Findlay, and one southward about six miles. West was pastor. J. Myers, on his way to Blanchard Fork to a special meeting, preached in a school-house in Findlay in November, 1853. A. L. Nye did efficient work in Henry and Defiance counties in 1854. But complaint was early made that many points where these aggressive, enthusiastic missionaries had gathered small churches were neglected, or abandoned. School-houses, too, were often closed against the preachers, and the few members not being able to build houses of worship these points were necessarily discontinued. This was true in all the States.

Closely connected with the contemplated mission work on the part of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in Indiana, Illinois and Iowa was the tour made through the whole territory in 1850 by Winebrenner and Harn. Winebrenner on May 1, 1850, announced that he and Harn would "take a journey to the West during the ensuing Summer." It was to be "a preaching tour for the good of souls and the promotion of the cause of all causes—the church of the living God. We design to make it an exploring missionary tour. Our brethren in Ohio and the far West have long pleaded for a visit." Flake, who had charge of "The Advocate" during Winebrenner's absence, also states that "a visit of this kind was much desired by the brethren West of the mountains." He informed his readers that the two tourists "went. . . . in a plain and strong and roomy carriage, with two horses, which will permit them to seek the scattered members of the Church in their journey of a thousand miles or more, to Iowa." He calls it "an old-fashioned visit to the churches," probably recalling similar tours by Wesley, Asbury, Albright and Whitefield. They started May 20th, on which evening they held services at Mechanicsburg. Thence to Shippensburg, on the 21st; McConnellsburg, on the 22nd; Bloody Run, on the 23rd; Woodbury, on the 24th; Martinsburg, on the 25th and 26th; Shellsburg, on the 27th; Somerset, on the 28th; Bethany, on the 29th; McKeesport, on the 30th; Pittsburg, on the 31st; Old Harmony, on June 1st and 2nd; Wooster, Ohio, on June 8th and 9th. At Wooster they had preaching simultaneously in the bethel and in the court-house at 10 a. m., and "in the afternoon and evening in the Baptist meeting-house." Harn's controversial spirit developed at Wooster. Hearing that a Methodist minister would preach on Monday evening on baptism at Moreland, he went there to hear him, and then arranged to reply to him on Thursday evening. Winebrenner heard Harn's sermon, and regarded it as "a more triumphant refutation of any man's argument than I have ever heard." Not so Mr. Parker, the Methodist minister, for he at once arose "in the congregation and challenged Brother Harn, or myself, to a public debate." This challenge they declined to accept as they "were on a journey through some of the Western States, and had a chain of appointments already out." From Wooster they went to Mendon, Mercer county, via Jeromesville; Ashland, county seat of Ashland county, where they preached in the Court-house; Bucyrus, county seat of Crawford county; Wyandot, Brownsville; Kenton, county seat of Hardin county, and Lima, in Allen county, reaching Mendon, Mercer county, June 21st. At Kenton the Methodists, Baptists and New School Presbyterians had a revival in progress, which they attended, with one hundred and fifty conversions. At Mendon, Thomas Hickernell had a revival in progress. From Mendon, O., they passed on to Fort Wayne, Allen county, Ind. Thence through Noble, Elkhart, St. Joseph and La Porte counties to New Buffalo, Mich., on Lake Michigan. From here "we entered, horses and all, on board the splendid steamboat 'Julius D. Morton,' and crossed the lake to Chicago," where they arrived at 2 o'clock on the night of June 29th. They did not preach in Chicago, but attended services in the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches, where "the preaching was plain and practical, but the worship cold, heartless and formal." Leaving Chicago July 1st, they went by way of Napier'sville, Dupage county; Aurora, Kane county; Syracuse, De Kalb county, and Ogle county, near Mt. Morris, where they found settlers from Washington county, Md., and reached Mt. Carroll, Carroll county, Ill., their main objective point in that State, July 5th. On the evening of July 6th they "commenced a series of meetings in the court-house in Mt. Carroll." During Lord's day "the court-house was thronged all day." Four sermons were preached that day. From Mt. Carroll, on the 9th, they came down to Whiteside county, and thence still southward into Rock Island county, visiting Church of God families, until they reached Stevenson (now Rock Island), where on July 11th, they crossed the Mississippi to Davenport, Scott county, Iowa. Thence down the river to Muscatine, county seat of Muscatine county, where they "met a number of former friends and brethren from Pennsylvania." Thence westward to Iowa City and North Bend, Johnson county, reaching North Bend near midnight, July 13th. This was a Pennsylvania settlement. Here they preached in a school-house, July 14th. The church at that place had "some twenty members or upwards." Returning to Iowa City, they had "preaching in the Baptist meeting-house in the evening" of July 14th. July 15th they left for Louisa county, stopping at Columbus City. Thence still southward into Henry county, and across Des Moines county to Burlington, where they recrossed the Mississippi into Illinois on their return journey July 18th. They "took the direct road towards Peoria," where they arrived July 20th. Here they "preached three sermons in the Methodist meeting-house and two in the Baptist church." From Peoria they went due south to Springfield, Sangamon county. They passed eastward south of Decatur, Macon county, stopping with Church families, to Charleston, county seat of Coles county, and on to Martinsville, Clark county, near which place "on Sabbath, July 28th, we held a woods meeting at Bro. Fasig's." There was "a small church of God in that neighborhood, numbering some twenty odd members." From Martinsville, Ill., on July 29th, they went to Indianapolis, Ind., passing through Vigo, Clay, Putnam and Hendricks counties "on the National Road," into Marion, where the capitol of the State is located. From here eastward they again had "a chain of appointments ahead," reaching to Wayne county, Ind., at the Ohio line. These appointments were in Lutheran, Methodist and Presbyterian houses of worship, near which families of the Church lived. All along their route these families were found, living many miles apart. They passed through Preble county, north-eastward across Montgomery, Miami, Champaign into Union, and thence south-eastward to Clintonville, Franklin county, four miles north of Columbus, where they again met T. Hickernell, who was conducting "a two-day's meeting" with "a church of God of about twenty members." They reached this point Aug. 10th. They visited the State capitol "in course of erection, and other State institutions." There were several Church of God families living in Columbus. August 13th they left Clintonville, and went north into Delaware county, and thence through Morrow county toward Mansfield, Richland county. Thence eastward through Ashland county back to Wooster, Wayne county. When they reached Wooster they had made a circuit of 1,700 miles. They went 8 miles northwest of Wooster and "attended the Chester camp-meeting, held on the lands of Bro. Peter Sherick and Daniel George." Thence on the 22nd they went "to the Summit county camp-meeting," the next county northeast of Wayne. Returning to Wooster, they tarried there, preaching at various near-by points, until Aug. 30th, when they went to the Reedsburg camp-meeting, in Wayne county. Sept. 2nd they started homeward through Stark and Columbiana counties, into Pennsylvania, their first objective point being Fayetteville, Lawrence county, and thence to the Venango county camp-meeting, which they reached Sept. 5th. After camp on Sept. 12th, they left for Evensburg, Butler county, and on to Old Harmony again, and down to Pittsburg. They went as far south as Washington county, and then eastward to West Newton and Bethany, Westmoreland county, which they reached Sept. 20th. Thence, after a four days' journey they arrived home in Harrisburg on Sept. 28th, after "an absence of four months and eight days, during which we traveled 2,500 miles, preached 124 sermons, passed through six States and 217 cities and towns. Our traveling expenses amounted to $92.65, and our receipts in the shape of collections, etc., to $120.75." In September, 1853, Winebrenner visited western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio, assisting at woods meetings and camp-meetings at various points.

Overtures toward union between the Free Baptist Church and the Church of God were more of a local, than general and official, character. A. D. Williams, Free Baptist minister, and brother-in-law to G. U. Harn, unofficially labored more or less for union of the two bodies. He preached at many points for churches of God, and wrote considerably for publication in "The Advocate." These local movements were earnestly fostered by Benjamin Howard and his son, S. B. Howard, who lived in Eastern Pennsylvania for a number of years and part of the time, about 1850, and again much later, was a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. B. Howard, after his preaching tour in East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1848-9, made a tour westward as far as Illinois. He was in Illinois when in 1850 Winebrenner and Harn were on their western tour, and wrote, desiring to meet them. He advocated local union of Free Baptist churches and the Church of God. And ministers of the Free Baptist Church in some localities organized churches of God, some of which became identified with Elderships. Such a course was quite objectionable to the leaders of the Free Baptist Church. Their organ, "The Morning Star," on September 24, 1851, answered this question: "Is it right for a F. W. Baptist minister to lay aside the usages of the F. W. Baptists, and organize a church, calling it the church of God?" The answer was: "It is not. Have we not suffered enough by some of our members and ministers going into almost any and every new notion that is got up? If any are not satisfied with our name and usages, the way is open for them to unite with those whose views are more congenial to their own." It is clear that at that time the name, "Church of God," was a vital point, and on this "The Morning Star" said, "The name is of little consequence compared to the nature." Not so did those F. W. Baptists think in central and western New York, which called themselves churches of God, and from which the Howards came. Nor those in Ohio and Illinois which held like views, and some of which united with those Elderships. But while B. Howard failed to meet Winebrenner and Harn in Illinois, he returned to eastern Ohio by the time the camp-meetings were held there which Winebrenner and Harn attended. At the Summit county camp-meeting the three met; but whatever may have been subjects of discussion or conference between them neither gave any account thereof. But at the Ohio Eldership, held in October, 1850, Howard became a member of the Eldership, and was appointed a "missionary among the churches in Ohio." Within the territory of the Ohio Eldership were some Free Baptist churches, and one of Howard's duties was to work for union between them and the Ohio Eldership. At the same Eldership "Bro. Ray, Free Will Baptist, applied for a union between the Church of God and the Society [church] with which he labors." In 1851 the Standing Committee of the Ohio Eldership appointed Bro. Dennis "to take charge of the Washington and Middletown churches of the Free Will Baptist Association." In the West Pennsylvania Eldership similar efforts of a local character were made by F. W. Baptist churches in the southern counties in New York, and a missionary of the Church of God was sent among them. Winebrenner's and Harn's tour excited much interest among Reformed, Lutheran and Methodist ministers in various localities. They preached in a number of places on the scriptural view of the church of God, and on baptism and other Church doctrines. In some places, as in Miamisburg, Montgomery Co., Ohio, each of the pastors of these three churches "delivered addresses on the subject of baptism and the original organization of the church of God exclusively."

In Michigan not much was accomplished during this period. Prospects were reported good, but the supply of ministers was inadequate to meet the calls. Wm. Adams in 1853 organized a church in Genesee county, the fourth county north of the Ohio line. A. B. Slyter, the missionary of the Indiana Eldership, lived in Barry county, the third tier of counties north of Indiana, and the second east of Lake Michigan. He preached over "nearly one-half of the southern peninsula of the State, making some four hundred miles round."

In the territory of the West Pennsylvania Eldership there was progressive activity, with inspiring success. It is true that when J. Myers was in Pittsburg in May, 1854, he sadly exclaimed, "No church here, and the few remaining of the used-to-be church" are still attached "to the principles of the Church. That, however, is all." Yet not so elsewhere. In the Virginia part of the territory Davis, Ober, M. Coates and Wertz labored with self-sacrificing zeal, which was amply rewarded. They labored principally in Marshall, Harrison and Wetzel counties. A number of churches were organized. Houses of worship were built at Bowman's, Upper Turkey Foot, Antioch and on the Wheeling Mission. In Pennsylvania, in 1850, a church was organized of seven members near Laurel Hill Furnace, Westmoreland county; one at Red Stone, same county; one at Stevens' Mills, Indiana county, and two in Somerset county. In this county William Davis enlarged the mission field during 1853 by adding six new appointments, with the prospect of opening more. "Prospects are flattering at these new appointments." Near Jacksonville, Greene county, Stephen Barnhart, a local minister, did good work. Revival meetings were held in many places, and a good number of converts was added to the churches. In the Summer of 1852, the church at West Newton, Westmoreland county, built a meeting-house, which was dedicated Nov. 12th. In 1853 "the brethren and friends in the Slippery Rock Settlement, near Wurtemburg, Beaver county, 12 miles north of New Brighton, erected a new meeting-house," which was dedicated October 28th, "the day previous to the sitting of the Eldership" at said place. There was still considerable German preaching in Venango and several other counties.

In East Pennsylvania Eldership more attention was now given to confirming and permanently establishing churches than to aggressive Church extension work. Indeed with its five missionaries part of this period in Illinois and Iowa, and the prospective mission to Texas, there were not sufficient funds for mission work at home. Conditions, too, were changing. The United Brethren and the Evangelical Association, and to a less extent the Methodist Church with its exclusively English ministry, were quite successful in their work, and were establishing churches not only in counties around those in which the Church of God was working, but through the territory in which the Church was successfully operating. And the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, and even the Presbyterian Church, were becoming more evangelistic, and were beginning to meet the spiritual needs of their membership more satisfactorily. School-houses were being closed especially against night preaching and revival services, thus making not only missionary work more difficult and expensive, but necessitating the abandonment of many such points where churches could have been established. But the ministry, true to its divine vocation, devoted itself with unabated and well-sustained zeal to its work, and the results justified the self-sacrifice with which the cause was advanced.

The work of the East Pennsylvania Eldership south of the Potomac was limited to Berkeley and Jefferson counties, W. Va., (at that time a part of Virginia), and Frederick and Loudoun counties, Va. William Johnson was the missionary in this territory in 1853 and 1854, except Loudoun county. He had ten appointments, which he "intended to fill every two weeks."

In Maryland disaster finally overtook the work in Baltimore. "Owing to the inability of the few brethren at Baltimore to sustain their preacher and keep down the ground rent on their bethel, the committee have sold it for $800." This was in 1852. But for certain reasons the purchaser refused to take the property, and a second sale was necessary. The Uniontown church, in 1850, after "rejecting from her communion all those who had so far backslidden as to give no evidence of acceptance with God," but receiving "a goodly number into fellowship," "numbered about eighty." There was a church at Waterloo, and one at Sandy Mount, Carroll county, organized in October, 1850, of twelve members, but which in a short time doubled its membership. At Sigler's appointment, Frederick county, a church was organized Sept. 28, 1852. One at Aushour's school-house, Middletown Valley, same county, on Sept. 28, 1852. Henry McBride was elected elder, and George Sigler, deacon. Protracted meetings were held in the vicinity of Emmittsburg, Frederick county, Md. In Washington county the cause was advancing under the energetic labors of the young pastor, A. X. Shoemaker. He had nine appointments, and added a few new ones, among which was Williamsport, on the Potomac.

In Pennsylvania this period was one of church-building. At Plainfield, Cumberland county, the brethren worshiped in a Union meeting-house, built about 1850. The church was organized by Peter Clippinger in 1854. At Liberty Hall, Wild Cat Valley, Perry county, the church dedicated a new bethel on Nov. 12, 1854. J. Winebrenner and J. F. Weishampel officiated, the latter preaching in German in the afternoon. The church in Martic township, Lancaster county, decided to build a meeting-house in 1850. Martin Huber donated one acre of land for the purpose. The Building Committee were Martin Huber, Stephen Wiggins, Samuel Martin, Abraham Mylin, John Albright, Philip Frankford, Jonathan Sethalts and John Lighteiser. It was a stone house, and was dedicated Feb. 15, 1851. The membership of the church numbered "seven or eight." C. Price preached his first dedicatory sermon on this occasion. In the "new town of Goldsboro," York county the church began the building of a bethel in 1851. Green Spring church, Cumberland county, dedicated their new bethel Nov. 6, 1852. Winebrenner preached the sermon. The church numbered about forty. On Nov. 28, 1852, "the bethel at John Soule's, Perry county," was dedicated by J. Winebrenner, who stated that "the cause is prospering and the churches appear in good spirits." "Having enlarged and refitted the bethel," the church at Middletown, Dauphin county, held re-dedicatory services on Feb. 6, 1853. Winebrenner preached in the morning; E. H. Thomas, in the afternoon, and Wm. Mooney, in the evening. At Kimmel's, Schuylkill county, they "built a handsome brick meeting-house" in 1852. This house of worship was built on the corner of George Kimmel's farm, who later bequeathed his estate to the German Eldership. Special interest attaches to the building of the bethel at Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, Pa. April 30, 1853, it was announced that the church at said place "having lost their meeting-house, have resolved on building another." The house was not destroyed, nor honestly lost. But with indomitable courage the church went to work to build a new house, which Winebrenner pronounced an ornament to the town, and as handsome as any meeting-house in the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The corner-stone was laid by J. C. Owens, July 3, 1853, and the "large and handsome new bethel was dedicated by J. Winebrenner Dec. 18, 1853." Other ministers who participated in the services on Saturday afternoon and evening and during the Sabbath were J. Keller, E. H. Thomas, J. C. Owens, J. Ross, A. H. Long and ——— Helfenstein, a Reformed minister. At Weishampel, in Deep Creek Valley, Schuylkill county, a church was organized in 1853, composed of twenty-one "charter members." "Steps were immediately taken to build a house of worship." A stone building was erected "at a probable cost of between $800 and $1,000." The Shippensburg church, in Cumberland county, re-fitted and modernized its bethel in the Summer of 1853, and rededicated it Nov. 6th. The Newburg bethel was built during the same Summer, located 7 miles from Shippensburg, and was dedicated on Oct. 30, 1853, being the Sunday of the Eldership held at that place. E. H. Thomas preached the morning sermon, from Zech. vi. 12, 13. Near Marsh's (or Musk's) school-house, in York county, under the pastorate of J. H. Hurley, the brethren built a comfortable meeting-house in the Fall of 1853. They had been worshipping in a school-house "originally designed for the double purpose of meeting-house and school-house, and had been so used for thirty years. But by some art and craft it has latterly fallen into the hands of sectarian directors, and they have unrighteously taken in hand to exclude Bro. Hurley and the brethren of the Church of God," "informing us that we had night-storming enough, that we could no longer have the use of the house." The new house, also later called "Fairview Bethel," was dedicated June 4, 1854. James Colder preached the sermon. G. W. Coulter preached on Saturday evening. D. Maxwell, as Colder said, "the Bishop in charge," "solemnly dedicated the house."

The most costly and magnificent church enterprise of this period was that of the Mulberry Street church, Harrisburg, Pa. The inception of this project dates from about the 1st of February, 1854, as Winebrenner announced on Feb. 11th, that "the church of God in this place has concluded to remove their place of worship from Mulberry street to the corner of Fourth and Walnut streets, there intending to erect a large and commodious house of God, worthy of the capital of Pennsylvania, and worthy of the Church of God. They bought the plot of ground extending southward from the corner of Fourth and Walnut to the Alley midway between Walnut and Market streets for $5,000. The elders, John Young, Jacob Melly, David Lingle and Isaac Stees "were authorized and empowered to sell so much of said lot or piece of ground as might not be required for the erection of a house of worship and a parsonage." This they did, for the sum of $3,200, reserving ground for the house of worship on the corner of Fourth street and the Alley, and a parsonage lot adjoining, which thus cost them $1,800. The Union Bethel on Mulberry street was "sold to the School Directors of the borough of Harrisburg at and for the sum of $1,800." In this first announcement by Winebrenner of this movement to secure a new home for the Harrisburg church he called it "the Metropolitan Bethel," and adhered to, and advocated, this name until, and after, the laying of the corner-stone. James Mackey was the pastor, and on June 10th he announced that "the new church edifice, which our brethren intend to erect in this borough, is now in progress. The size is 55 feet by 70 feet, and it will be built of brick." The church could not build this house without help from the community and from the other churches of the Eldership. They had the ground, but not a dollar more. McFadden and Winebrenner were active in collecting the funds, a total of about $10,000 being required. The corner-stone was laid Sept. 10, 1854, Winebrenner delivering the address. Mackey, then one of the Editors of "The Advocate," as well as pastor of the church, "solicited a copy of his address from Winebrenner for publication, which he has kindly furnished." A part of this address was published Sept. 21, 1854, and in it Winebrenner said: "The house which we have here commenced. . . we have taken the liberty of calling 'The Metropolitan Bethel.'" He acknowledged that "this is a name not exactly approved by all our friends; nevertheless, we think it is happily chosen and quite appropriate." To this Colder, one of the Editors, appended a Note: "In justice to the brethren in Harrisburg, we must say, that we have never known one of them to use or approve of this name for the new Bethel." Winebrenner did not furnish the balance of his address for publication. The Bethel was not completed by the time for the meeting of the Eldership, Oct. 26, 1854, as was anticipated, and so the place was changed to Mechanicsburg. At said Eldership Colder was appointed Mackey's successor at Harrisburg, taking charge April 1, 1855. The work on the Bethel was resumed early in the Spring of 1855, and the house was completed and dedicated Nov. 4, 1855, the Eldership having convened in it Nov. 3rd. "Wm. Mooney officiated in the morning; J. C. Owens, in the afternoon, and E. H. Thomas and J. Ross, in the evening. As late as March 29, 1855, Winebrenner still called it 'Metropolitan Bethel;' but this name does not appear in connection with the dedication and Eldership notice. The record in the Journal is: 'The East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God met in the Lecture Room of the Fourth Street Bethel.'" This has been its name ever since. The controversy over the name was the first outward sign of friction between Winebrenner and Colder, which constituted such an unfortunate episode in the history of the East Pennsylvania Eldership.

Work was still carried on at Marietta, Lancaster county; Hummelstown, Dauphin county; Pottsville, Schuylkill county; Colebrook Furnace, Lebanon county; New Market, York county; Bloomfield Furnace, Huntingdon county; Roxbury, Franklin county, near York Haven, York county and various points in Adams county where no churches were permanently established. In Schuylkill county, Mahantango Valley, Keller in the Winter of 1850 reported about fifty conversions. In the Hepler community permanent work was done. Also at Kessler's, Pine Grove, Port Carbon, Shamokin and Tremont, Ashland and Schuylkill Haven by 1853. In 1852 Keller organized a church at Donaldson, with Abraham Werntz as elder, and Jacob Hostter, deacon. The Juniata and Matamoras circuit was steadily enlarged, including from ten to fifteen points, among them Matamoras, Millers-town, Red Hill (Perry county), Thompsonstown, Lykens Valley, Clark's Valley, Turkey Valley and Wild Cat Valley. In the Winter of 1850-51, A. Snyder, of the Matamoras and Juniata circuit, organized a church at Millerstown, Perry county, consisting of nine members; and one at Thompsonstown, Juniata county, consisting of seven members. The Perry county circuit grew by 1854 to have ten appointments. Work was begun in Reading, by Keller, during 1850. In 1850 J. H. Hurley succeeded in organizing a church in New Bloomfield, Perry county, the county seat. In 1852 A. Snyder reported organizing a church at Rebecca Furnace, Morrison Cove circuit. Churches were also organized as follows: At Red Hill, Cumberland county, in 1851; one at Corbin school-house, Huntingdon county, in 1852; one at Deer Lick, under A. J. Fenton, in 1852, on the Fulton county circuit; one at Spruce Hollow, Bedford county, under A. Snyder, pastor; in Dauphin Winebrenner preached for a small church organized in 1853 in the Hall of the Sons of Temperance, J. Haifleigh, pastor; one at Knobsville, Fulton county, in 1853, of fourteen members. In Altoona, Blair county, church work was begun in the Winter of 1852-3, by Wm. Clay. The preaching was in the Baptist meeting-house. In November, 1854, Winebrenner, Harn and Weishampel held a protracted meeting there. No church was as yet organized, though there were about a dozen Church families in the town, and Winebrenner urged organization and the building of a bethel. A lot was at once "selected for a bethel."

The missionary spirit continued to prevail among the ministers and churches. There were new and inviting fields East of the Alleghenies, as well as West, and in the far southwestern State of Texas. Keller, who had much experience in mission work, in December, 1852, suggested the creation of a new mission in Northumberland, Montour and Columbia counties, lying immediately North of Schuylkill and Dauphin counties. A few points had been taken up in the southern part of Northumberland county, and Weishampel had visited Columbia county and preached in different places. It was to be known as the "Susquehanna Valley Mission," and pledges were at once solicited for the support of the missionary. In 1853 Stees was appointed "to labor as he can on the Susquehanna Mission." Another proposition for a new mission was made by William Johnson, in January, 1853. This was to be in Huntingdon county, embracing the territory around Mount Union, "including Mill Creek, Huntingdon and all the villages east of Tusseys Mountain, from Shirleysburg to Warrior's Mark." The same year Simon Fleegal, who was on the Broad Top circuit, opened appointments in McConnell's Cove, and reported good results. At the Eldership in 1854 A. J. Fenton and Philip Shaw were appointed to the "Iowa Mission." In Lancaster City a division occurred in the Orange Street church, about 1852, and a second church, known as the Chestnut Street church, was organized, with W. G. Coulter, pastor, followed by A. Snyder in 1853. Both "churches seem to be in a prosperous state," said Winebrenner after a visit to the second church April 3, 1853. But "a worm smote the gourd that it withered," and by the beginning of 1854 the Second church "dissolved their connection with the Eldership, by an arbitrary act of their own." Winebrenner seldom was so severe in his denunciations as in this case. He "did not believe them capable of perpetrating such a folly and shame." The following week he published another brief editorial "respecting the disorderly and sinful movement of the Second church of God at Lancaster." "The church is greatly at fault for rashly attempting to dissolve their connection with the Eldership and Church of God," and "recreantly transferring themselves to a sectarian community;" "a criminal movement." The church was taken into fellowship by the United Brethren, who "erred in manifesting a grasping and proselyting spirit, and by opening their arms and showing a readiness to receive into their communion such as by their own legislation they have declared unworthy of Christian fellowship." But the church did not long survive.

An event of far-reaching significance was the return to the United States of James Colder, Winebrenner's son-in-law. He located in Harrisburg, his native city, where he was born Feb. 16, 1826. He was educated in the schools of Harrisburg, at the Harrisburg Academy, Partridge's Military Institute, and Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., where he graduated in 1849.

In 1850 he was married to Ellen Winebrenner, who died March 24, 1858. In September, 1849, he joined the Philadelphia M. E. Conference, and was appointed to a circuit in Lancaster county, which he served until 1851, when he was appointed a missionary to China. He reached Fuh-Chau in July, 1851, and labored there as a missionary until the Spring of 1854, when he returned home, reaching New York on April 7, 1854. He had changed his views on the ordinances and Church Polity while in China, and was immersed at Hong Kong, China, November 6, 1853, and severed his connections with the M. E. Church and resigned his appointment as missionary. He had been a frequent contributor to "The Church Advocate" while in China. In May, 1854, he was licensed by the Standing Committee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. At the Eldership in 1854 he was appointed to Fourth Street church, Harrisburg, and became its pastor in April, 1855. Meanwhile Winebrenner had associated him with himself as Assistant Editor. Colder brought with him from China a youth, Ting Ing-Kau, and a married woman, Cheung Chio. This youth he proposed to educate for a foreign missionary. For this purpose he lectured on China in many pulpits of the Eldership, and as far West as Wooster, Ohio, and received quite an amount of money. The movement was endorsed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and by the General Eldership in 1854, Winebrenner personally endorsed it, saying: "Why should not the Church of God awake to the subject of Foreign Missions, and take immediate steps to assist in this mighty and glorious work of Christianizing China? She can at any rate easily afford to educate young Ak-Kau, as he is familiarly called, and send him to his country-men as a messenger from the Church of God."

Interest in camp-meetings did not seem to abate during this period. In 1850 camp-meetings were held as follows: On the Dauphin county circuit, Landisburg circuit, York county circuit near Newberry; Newburg, Cumberland county; near Churchtown, same county; Broad Top; at Kimmel's, Schuylkill county, and in Mahantango Valley, same county. Also one near Uniontown, Md. All these in the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. In the West Pennsylvania Eldership territory camp-meetings were held in Brush Valley, Indiana county; in Irwin township, Venango county, and one in Marshall county, W. Va. In the Ohio Eldership territory three camp-meetings were held, viz.: Chester township, Wayne county; Reedsburg, same county, and in Summit county. One was held in De Kalb county, Indiana. One was held in Barry county, Mich. The number of conversions reported was one hundred and fifty. The number of tents aggregated from five to twenty-four.

In 1851 there were twelve camp-meetings held within the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, as follows: In Carroll county, Md., and in Washington county, Md.; on the Dauphin county circuit, on Broad Top circuit; near Shipensburg, Cumberland county, and at Newburg, same county; near Churchtown, same county; near Elizabethtown, Lancaster county; near Mt. Joy, same county; near Goldsboro, York county; one in Fulton county, and two in Schuylkill county, one of them at Kimmel's, and one in the Mahantango Valley. In Ohio Eldership territory the following were held: In Knox county, in Summit county, in Wayne county, one eight miles north-west of Wooster and one near Smithville; one in Ashland county and one in Geauga county. The Indiana Eldership held three camp-meetings, to wit: one near Laketon, Wabash county; one in Whitley county, and one in Mercer county, Ohio. One was held in Kent county, Mich. The West Pennsylvania Eldership reported but two camp-meetings. One of them was held in Indiana county, Pa., and one in Marshall county, W. Va. The brethren in Johnson county, Iowa, held one near North Bend. The number of conversions reported is one hundred and seventy-three.

In 1852 eighteen camp-meetings were held. Iowa held two, one at North Bend, and one in Benton county. Illinois held one in Pleasant Valley, on the Rock River mission. Indiana held one. Ohio held one in Wayne and one in Ashland county. In the West Pennsylvania Eldership territory one was held in Venango county, Irwin township; one on the Susquehanna River, in Indiana county; one at Turkey Foot, Somerset county, and one in Marshall county, Va. In the East Pennsylvania Eldership territory the following were held: Near Newburg, Cumberland county; Broad Top circuit, Huntingdon county; Orwigsburg and Mahantango Valley, Schuylkill county; in York county; and one in Washington county and one in Carroll county, Md., and "The General and Model Camp-meeting" near the Camp Hill Bethel, Cumberland county. This was an attempt to hold a large camp-meeting, with corresponding results. Camp-meetings in other parts of the Eldership were discountenanced by the leaders, with but partial success. Winebrenner announced and encouraged it editorially, and called it "the great gathering of the people." A day of fasting and prayer was officially fixed for the Tuesday before the camp opened. There was a general camp-meeting committee, and seven subordinate committees. Ten "Rules and Regulations" were published in advance. President C. G. Finney, Oberlin College, who had world-wide fame as a revivalist, was invited, but could not come. It was to be "a camp-meeting for the promotion of piety and the conversion of sinners." It began Aug. 20th and closed Aug. 30th. The general committee had secured one hundred tents from the State Arsenal. Only fifty were needed. It rained the greater part of the time, yet on the second Sunday, with a clear sky, it was estimated that 5,000 people were on the ground. Thirty-four churches were represented. There were forty conversions. The following ministers were present: Winebrenner, Thomas, Swartz, Keller, McFadden, Hurley, Owens, Price, Snyder, Maxwell, Kyle, Hartman, Laverty, S. Fleegal, Haidleigh, J. J. Miller, Bowser, Stamm, Johnson, Hoover, Rockafellow, Kister, Mateer, Shoemaker, Harn, Hinney, Morenzo and Welshampel. The total number of conversions at all the camp-meetings reported was only one hundred and forty-six. Immediately after the camp-meeting season the question was mooted, "why so little good is done at camp-meetings and other meetings." There was a growing tendency to omit the ordinances of Feet-washing and the Communion, but baptism was generally administered to the converts.

In the Summer of 1853 the following camp-meetings were held: Near Dodgeville, Des Moines county, Iowa. In La Salle and Macon counties, Ill. Near Peoria, Franklin county, and in Miami county, Ind. In Wayne county, Ohio. One each in Lawrence and Somerset counties, Pennsylvania, and one in Marshall county, Virginia. In East Pennsylvania, one in Deep Creek Valley and one at Kimmel's, Schuylkill county; one in Lancaster county. One near Dillsburg, and one near Andersontown, York county. One in Washington county, Md. One at Stonersville, Bedford county, and one at Nobbsville, 8 miles from McConnellsburg, Fulton county. One near Landisburg, Perry county. One hundred and fifty-nine conversions were reported. The number of tents ranged from nine to twenty-six. At the close of these meetings Winebrenner expressed it as his opinion that "the day is probably past for camp-meetings." The churches were losing interest in them, so that the Standing Committee of the Ohio Eldership "Resolved, That we very much urge the propriety of the circuits and churches in waking up to their duty in sending in their requests for camp-meetings."

There were twenty-five camp-meetings held in 1854, as follows: One each in Des Moines and Louisa counties, Iowa. In Illinois one was held near Mt. Carroll, Jo Daviess county, and one in Macon county. One was held in Kosciusko county, Ind. Ohio held one in Stark county, and one in Tuscarawas county. In the West Pennsylvania Eldership territory one was held in Marshall county, Va.; one in Fayette county, one in Venango county, one in Indiana county and one near Black Lick Furnace. In the East Pennsylvania Eldership territory camp-meetings were held as follows: One in Washington county, Md., and one in Carroll county, Md.; while in the State of Pennsylvania the following were held: East York circuit, West York circuit, Perry county circuit; Franklin county, near Orrstown; on the Lancaster county circuit, Broad Top circuit, Cumberland county, near Mechanicsburg; Dauphin circuit, near Linglestown; in Deep Creek Valley and near Orwigsburg, Schuylkill county, and one near Fredericksburg, Lebanon county. Comparatively few conversions were reported. The camp-meeting held near Mt. Carroll, Ill., reported forty conversions, while less than that number were reported at all the others.

The Churches at this period were permeated with a spirit of controversy.

Theological polemics were the delight of some of the strongest men in different denominations. The slavery question, more and more agitated in Church and State, contributed to this. The Christian Church was very aggressive under the erudite and forceful leadership of Alexander Campbell, whose spirit was largely imbibed by the ministry of his Church. They kept the subject of baptism prominent in all their ministration; attacked other Churches, and issued repeated challenges to debate the question. The ministers of the Church of God possessed much of the same belligerent spirit; but they confined themselves largely to their own pulpits. Winebrenner was not by nature and training a controversialist. He discussed all the theological questions of the times, as his favorite phrase was, "pro and con." But he never had a formal debate with a minister of any denomination. He generally preserved an attitude in which dignity at times seemed singularly blended with disdain. Not so with Harn, as may be seen in his keen, penetrating eye and aggressive countenance.

He was a man richly endowed by nature, and of studious habits. He was fortunately placed for the development of his talents, and he rose steadily to larger and larger prominence and usefulness. He was ambitious, and was restless as a caged lion. Fearless, resolute and resourceful as a preacher or antagonist in the arena of debate, he made a splendid record in the theological marathon. Everywhere he went he kindled the beacon-fire of truth touching the distinctive doctrines of the Church of God. As Irving says, he was none of those "who stand shaking in the wind, irresolute which way to steer." There was a bustling, disputatious tone in his preaching, instead of the drowsy tranquillity of pulpits in earlier days. Harn was a trained controversialist. He had his first public debate when not over seventeen years of age, on the evils of slavery, in his native State, Maryland, and in the midst of slavery and slave-holders. He was prepared to talk eight hours. The episode at Moreland, Ohio, on the tour which he made with Winebrenner in 1850, revealed his character. Out of it grew a challenge from the minister to whom he there replied to debate the subject of baptism. Harn accepted the challenge. It was a newspaper debate, Mr. Parker, Methodist minister, apparently preferring this. Winebrenner had charged Parker with teaching that "immersion is not baptism." Harn made a specialty of this, and in discussing the mode or action of baptism confronted Parker with the proof of Winebrenner's charge taken from Parker's published sermons and books. The discussion of the subjects of baptism followed. The debate between Harn and A. Keller, a Methodist minister, on the same questions, was held in Irwin township (Barkeyville), Venango county, Pa., in 1853. It continued five days. Harn affirmed that "Immersion in water of a proper subject, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is the only apostolic baptism." Keller affirmed that "Infants are scriptural subjects of baptism." It was a memorable debate, not forgotten for a generation.

In 1850 J. H. Hurley and Rev. McDougal had a spirited debate on the subject of washing the saints' feet. It was held in Perry county, Pa. The same year Hurley states that he "had a spirited controversy with J. F. Weishampel on the validity of lay baptism, he affirming, and I taking the negative. After discussing it in a friendly manner in "The Church Advocate" for many months, J. F. Weishampel exhausted his store of arguments, and gave the subject over to Elder G. U. Harn. After five more months of debate I gave the closing address."

B. Ober, from a natural trend of mind, was disputatious, and this spirit was fostered and developed by environment. It might, with James Fenimore Cooper, be said of him what Cooper said of the Indian Chief Mohegan, "That his faults were those of an Indian, and his virtues those of a man." He was a brave and self-reliant disputant, having great tenacity of purpose. The Disciples were the dominant element in southwestern Pennsylvania and northern West Virginia. Ober often came in contact with them while preaching in and around Wheeling. On the action of baptism they agreed with the Church of God. But the name of the Church they repudiated, and often made it a subject of discussion. In 1851 Ober and Dickey, a Disciple minister, held a public debate on this subject at Proctor; Wetzel county, W. Va.

In 1850, at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, Pa., Elder J. Keller had a five days' debate with A. Owen, of the United Brethren Church, on the Action and the Subject of Baptism. It was quite fully reported in "The Church Advocate" and "The Religious Telescope." Keller was a strong antagonist, but not by nature nor training a controversialist. He was modest and unassuming. He was a tall, well-proportioned man, with strong features and rather commanding presence. He had the reputed intellectual honesty of Montaigne, and made a most successful defense of the propositions he affirmed.

Greater divergence of views on theological questions now began to be manifested with increased intellectual development and wider reading on the part of the ministry of the Church. Winebrenner urged unanimity, but there were frequent discussions of questions on which they did not agree. On the "essentials of baptism" Winebrenner taught that faith, immersion and a scriptural administrator are "essential to the validity of Christian baptism." Hence, he further defined a scriptural administrator to be one "to whom Christ has given authority," a minister duly ordained. This brought up the question of lay baptism, which was defended by several ministers as justifiable in exceptional cases. They thought Winebrenner's view came dangerously near the doctrine of Apostolic Succession, though they accepted it as the rule.

The question relative to the admission of persons into local church fellowship before baptism was of a more serious and practical character. In 1851 Winebrenner in a lengthy editorial answered a series of questions, leading up to the final one as to whether it is right and scriptural to receive persons into church fellowship before they have been baptized. While he acknowledged that in the instances referred to in the New Testament the converted persons were first baptized; yet "not before they were in the general church." His conclusion was that "baptism may be administered either before or after addition to the local church." To this view exception was taken by several writers, so that Winebrenner was constrained to reply in another long editorial on "Terms of Church Membership." He laid down the proposition that "Baptism is not the door into the church," and insisted that it "has nothing to do with bringing in of a soul or body into the general or local church." But this did not settle the question. The opposition in fact gained ground, and in 1853 the Ohio Eldership adopted a resolution "instructing the ministers to teach churches not to admit unbaptized persons into the churches." From Ohio ministers and lay members emigrating to Iowa there introduced the same practice. In 1854 questions on the subject were again addressed to Winebrenner for editorial answer. He replied by reproducing his editorial of 1851, with some additional proofs of his position. In the same issue "Sister M. A. A." taught the contrary, but Winebrenner made no further reply. In subsequent issues of "The Church Advocate" Winebrenner's position was controverted by Henry Fleagle, K. A. Moore and J. E. Cunningham, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and M. F. Snively, of the Iowa Eldership, where baptism before church membership was generally insisted upon. A. L. Nye, of Michigan, defended Winebrenner's views, and Winebrenner himself made brief replies to several of these contributors.

There was general unanimity on the question of rebaptizing persons who, having been converted and baptized, fell from grace, and were reclaimed. It was quite generally answered negatively. Not so in the case of a person to whom baptism had been administered while in an unregenerated state. Winebrenner taught that "the baptism of unregenerated persons is invalid, from the fact that it is nowhere authorized in the New Testament."

A discussion of the subject of ministerial ordination was precipitated in 1850 through the mental illusion of several ministers of denominations who mistook the shadow for the substance, the form for the real thing. One of these ministers, says J. H. Hurley, "very politely informed me that we, as a ministry, were not set apart by the imposition of hands; and if we were thus consecrated we were without the regular succession, and consequently unordained." Hurley does not discuss the subject, but simply states that this polite remark caused him to doubt the validity of ordination without the laying on of hands of regularly ordained ministers. D. R. Rockafellow had a similar experience, and though not skeptical, yet was not prepared to meet the objection. Thus the matter rested from April, 1850, to May, 1852, when Winebrenner wrote an editorial in answer to A. Swartz, who had raised several inquiries touching "a time-honored custom to be found marking the history of the church that by us as a religious body has been practically rejected." Winebrenner called the imposition of hands "a ceremony of supererogation," said that he "fully agreed with the denominations around us in the whole form of ordination, except that of laying on of hands," and then called "on the affirmants of this question to show their authority, and they shall be accommodated with a respondent, and perhaps this mooted and perplexing question may be satisfactorily settled." He was sustained in very brief articles by several correspondents, but Swartz demanded that Winebrenner prove his position, which in an editorial in July he declined to do, on the ground that the demand would require him to prove a negative. But he again flung down the gauntlet, and said: "Who, then, among the masters in Israel will come forward as the champion of this time-honored custom? Whoever will undertake the task shall find a respondent." But while Swartz and a writer under the sobriquet of Apostolic Truth each wrote a long article, it was little more than fencing for position. Thus the matter rested until 1854, when a protracted discussion of the question was conducted in "The Church Advocate." It began by the simple statement by J. G. Cunningham, New Grenada, Pa., that "we as an individual church have come to the conclusion to select an elder and deacon, and have them ordained after the Apostles' manner, by fasting and prayer, then by the laying on of hands." He adds, "We think we are surely taught this by the Scriptures." Colder demanded proof of this statement, in a foot-note to Cunningham's article. This challenge Harn could not resist, and he replied in a four-column article, taking the affirmative. Meanwhile the General Eldership Minutes were published, in which there was found the following: "Resolved, That in the opinion of this Eldership persons entering upon the sacred work of the ministry among us should be solemnly set apart by prayer and the imposition of hands by one or more of the bishops of the Church of God." This resolution was not voted on, but it was referred for discussion to the columns of "The Church Advocate." Swartz began the discussion in a six-column article, reaching the conclusion "that there is not a precept or example in the New Testament for us to do that which the resolution contemplates we should do." Harn followed with arguments in favor of the resolution of which he says: "If these arguments are capable of refutation, I confess I am inadequate to the task." E. H. Thomas coincided with Harn, and in consecutive articles submitted "the testimony upon which I rely to prove the doctrine of the resolution." Winebrenner followed Harn, taking, as he did before, the negative side of the resolution.

He continued the discussion in a series of nine editorials published at intervals, and closing in the issue of "The Church Advocate" of January 24, 1856, with these words: "In no one single case do we find that the Apostles ordained, or set apart, men to the ministry by the imposition of hands." But Thomas Jefferson's words still remained true: "I never saw an instance of one of two disputants convincing the other by argument."

In October, 1851, the first, but limited, discussion on the "right of female preaching" was begun by Ellen Stewart, Copley, Ohio. There was neither sentiment enough in favor of women preaching, nor interest enough in a discussion of the subject, to give it more than a short lease of life. William Byrd's thought was not verified in this case: "So very pliable a thing is frail man, when women have the bending of him."

Sporadic polemical outbursts can also be found on the questions of church music, reading sermons, plagiarism, the mourners' bench and church government. Donations as evidences of good will, and to supplement the small salaries of ministers were strongly urged during this period.

Several notable events outside of the Church, which are of abiding interest, occurred during this period. John Newland Moffit, one of America's greatest revivalists, died in 1850. The death of Adoniram Judson, the senior foreign missionary in India of the London Missionary Society, died the same year. He was a native of Malden, Mass. On the voyage he changed his views regarding baptism. On reaching Calcutta he and his wife were immersed. This led to his withdrawal from the London Missionary Society, and his subsequent identification with the Baptist mission work. June 29, 1852, Henry Clay, who "would rather be right than President," died at Washington. His remarkable intellect, power of gesture and voice placed him in the front rank of America's greatest statesmen. October 24, 1852, Daniel Webster ended his marvelous career. Son of a farmer of moderate circumstances, he gradually rose to such distinction in the councils of the Nation that his public life became so intimately interwoven with the history of his country that both have come down to posterity together. The stupendous work of revising and retranslating the sacred Scriptures by the American Bible Union was begun in 1852. The ministers, churches and Elderships of the Church of God took a deep interest in this work. Winebrenner in 1853 "strongly favored the new version;" but he recognized the fact that "it will take a long time to overcome existing prejudices and supplant the use of the present English version, imperfect and antiquated as it is."

CHAPTER IX.

---

IN studying the history of this period it will be observed that there was one issue which was soon to overshadow every other question in Church and State.

Metaphorically, as literally in the days of Elijah, who appeared on the stage of sacred history with startling suddenness as the Melchizedek of his age, might the servant of some great political prophet have announced that "There ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand." This cloud continued to enlarge until it overspread the whole political heavens, and then burst forth with incredible fury in the great war of the Rebellion. This issue was the old one of human slavery. It was thought that the United States Constitution, together with that "wise and patriotic Compromise of 1820," had settled the question, except as a moral issue. But in 1854 the Missouri Compromise was declared to be inoperative and void, and the advocates and the opponents of slavery were invited to a trial of strength on the public domain of the United States. Already the earlier Compromise of 1850 contained a virtual repeal of the Missouri restriction, which had been treated by both sections of the country as a finality. This act was considered by the vast majority of the people of the free States to be most perfidious, and intense excitement ensued. The Kansas-Nebraska bill only increased the "frenzy and wrath of the thousands and tens of thousands in both the old parties, who had never before taken any part whatever in anti-slavery agitation." The great struggle for the possession of Kansas between the anti-slavery and pro-slavery forces continued until 1859. The pro-slavery party aimed to bring both Kansas and Nebraska into the Union as slave States. Here was the unmistakable beginning of that later series of events which led directly to the great Rebellion and the most sanguinary civil war. No previous anti-slavery excitement bore any comparison with that which now spread over the North. It was felt that compromises were unavailing and at an end; "that no compromise could acquire weight or sanction or sacredness, if one which had stood for a generation could be brushed aside by partisan caprice, or by the demands of sectional necessity." There was no possible concealment of the issue, that nothing remained "but a struggle between the slave States and the free States, growing more and more intense and more and more dangerous day by day."

It may be considered a perplexing problem in psychology to determine under what kind of a moral hallucination or mental illusion, with such social and political conditions, an anti-slavery Church could decide to send missionaries into a pro-slavery section of the country. Churches not already divided were rent asunder by this question, like the New School Presbyterian Church in 1857, which declared that "American Slavery is a sin, and can not be justified under the gospel." The Church of God would have in like manner experienced a schism had churches and Elderships existed in the pro-slavery States prior to the War. Events in Texas are the proof of this. The two missionaries to Texas, B. Ober and E. Marple, by the Spring of 1856 found everything in readiness for them to emigrate to Texas. They left Wheeling, W. Va., by steamer on May 5th, and reached Paris, Lamar county, Texas, June 1st. Lamar county borders on the Red River, the boundary between Oklahoma and Texas. They found the moral and religious condition of the people extremely low. Lynchings and murders were frequent. Yet there were many churches and church-going people. Politically the country was a unit. American slavery was one of the paying and popular institutions. No anti-slavery sentiments were tolerated. "No liberty of speech, or press, or outspoken consciousness antagonistic to that principle" was recognized. The people were suspicious of strangers. Even to be suspected of anti-slavery sentiments rendered one insecure. Excitement on the slavery question ran higher than ever before because of Acts passed by Congress and conditions in Kansas. Even before the missionaries reached Cunningham's home, upon inquiring the way of a man at work in his lot they were asked, "Are you those preachers whom the Cunninghams are looking for?" Upon receiving an affirmative answer, he remarked that he "understood that the Church which we represented is an abolition Church, and that we were sent to stir up the people on that question, and establish an abolition sentiment Church, and if so you will have a warm time of it." Immediately upon beginning their work reports of various kinds were soon in circulation, and opposition at once began. The principal charge against them was that they are abolitionists, and members of an abolition Church. To sustain this charge "a number of anti-slavery resolutions passed by the General and annual Elderships, with extracts of letters from 'The Advocate' were published." But the missionaries answered that they "are not abolitionists in the sense of that term as understood; nor yet members of an abolition Church." Violence was threatened them, and it became necessary to use the press as well as the pulpit to defend themselves and explain their position. But in doing so they offended Church sentiment in the North, and were in turn assailed by the Editor of "The Advocate," who also republished the anti-slavery resolutions of the General Eldership and of Annual Elderships, thus "encouraging our enemies and confirming their charges." "Winebrenner endorsed our course," says Marple in his history of The Texas and Arkansas Eldership in July, 1880, "both by private and printed publications, as long as he had the use of 'The Advocate,' which, however, was soon closed against him also," as it had been against Ober and Marple. The Church and its missionaries in Texas were thus largely placed in at least a neutral position on the question of slavery. They held their first protracted meeting eight miles west of Paris, Lamar county, in August, 1856, where the first church of God in Texas was organized. Marple states that "at this meeting the question with reference to slave-holders was tested. J. M. Brackeen, of the M. E. Church, a slave-holder, and a man of noted piety, respectability and influence, presented himself for membership, and was received." Several others were also received, one being specially mentioned as a slave-holder. Soon after this "the church was organized in Hopkins and Fannin counties," adjoining Lamar county on the West and South; "and within twelve months a considerable Church influence was gathered." The opposition in the North became more general and vehement, so that they became convinced that "our support from the East Pennsylvania Eldership would be discontinued at its next regular meeting, and our names dropped from the Journal of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and we would be left here in a flood of persecution, without either support or license." Then they conceived the "idea of the formation of the Texas Eldership." At first Marple opposed it, and Ober advocated it. But Marple yielded, the announcement was published, and the meeting was held with the church at Liberty, Lamar county, July 31, 1857. One resolution adopted which declared that slavery is a religious and political question, and greatly agitated at the present time by both religious and political men North and South, we think it not expedient for the Church of God to interfere with it." And so they protested "against the resolution of the General Eldership on the subject of slavery as a test of church fellowship." Colder, as Editor of "The Church Advocate," replied that "we believe that churches can be established in Texas without receiving slaveholders. If it can not be done, then there can be no churches of God there, and the sooner our brethren come out from among such people the better." Yet, good reports of the work and prospects continued to be sent North. In 1857 A. J. Cannedy stated that the "Church of God is prospering in Texas." "We have two small organizations here, one in Hopkins county and one in Lamar, and a fair prospect for several more in adjoining counties." In Titus county Ober had been doing some preaching, and results were encouraging. The first meeting-house "for the use of the Church of God in Texas" was built by "the church at Liberty and vicinity," in 1859.

Different Eldershops adopted resolutions condemning the course of the brethren in Texas, both as to the slavery question and the organization of an Eldership. The General Eldership in 1857 took no action on the work in Texas, nor on the formation of an Eldership, as the session was held prior to the organization of the Texas Eldership, and application was not made for a Charter. In 1860, however, the brethren in Texas expected action to be taken on their Eldership. As late as August of that year they were "anxiously waiting for the proceedings of the General Eldership"; but they frankly stated that "we look for nothing else than to be rejected, judging from the past treatment we have received from the Church of the North." But Colder replied that "no application was made by the Texas brethren for admission into this body." "The Advocate" having been closed against the further discussion of the Texas Eldership, Ober and Marple, who were "publishing a county paper at Mount Pleasant," called "The Union," began the publication at the same place of a religious periodical called "Bible Advocate." Winebrenner was the chief apologist of the cause pursued by the missionaries in Texas, though a few others also took up their cause and wrote in their defense. The main points made in extenuation of the course pursued in Texas were the political practice of the slavery question, and the earlier practice on the part of some churches of God in "receiving slave-holders into the church, under certain circumstances." Colder had questioned the authorship of Ober's reply to one of his editorials, and this brought forth a stinging answer from Winebrenner in which he sought to "disabuse your suspicious mind on the subject, by telling you plainly that said reply is Bro. Ober's own defense against your austere onslaught upon him, as one of our missionaries in Texas, through "The Advocate." The personal correspondence between Colder and Winebrenner was conducted with considerable asperity, as each recognized. But as Winebrenner insisted that "the controversy is not of my own seeking," and that he had been "assailed and insulted by slanderous statements, and held up to the world in a false and odious attitude"; he averred that he was only acting in "self-defense and in the performance of a duty which I consider I owe to myself, to the brethren in the Church, and to the public at large." But Colder in his capacity as Editor refused to publish any more of Winebrenner's articles, though he informed Colder that "the Board of Publication have given me the right to reply." Winebrenner, therefore, published in a pamphlet of twenty-eight pages a "Letter on Slavery, with an appendix containing various rejected articles addressed to Elder James Colder, Editor of 'The Church Advocate.'" The pamphlet was published in 1858, when already the troubles had begun in the East Pennsylvania Eldership which threatened to disrupt the body. The Letter on Slavery was subsequently published in full in "The Advocate." Winebrenner's course in publishing this pamphlet was disapproved in resolutions adopted by several Eldershops.

At the Eldership held at Mechanicsburg in October, 1854, James Colder received as his first appointment Harrisburg station. He took charge April 1, 1855.

Already the speck of a cloud, a portentous sign of the approaching storm, was visible to the discerning eye. Little rivalries and jealousies, half unconscious in the minds of the principal actors, were revealed in connection with the Swatara Collegiate Institute project, at first favored by Colder under the leadership of Winebrenner, and thence abandoned in favor of the Shippensburg Institute; and also the sharply outlined diversity of opinions as to the Metropolitan Bethel (Fourth Street), Harrisburg. Yet for two years the agitation in connection with the slavery question was the only issue which was generally recognized. The graver aspects of this question in the political relations of the country began to overshadow the more local and ecclesiastical contentions. By August, 1857, the property of the Shippensburg Institute, a school established some years before by D. A. L. Laverty and S. Knisley, with whom G. U. Harn had become associated, came under the control of a Stock Company, made up of members of the Church, so that on Sept. 3, 1857, Colder stated, that "the transfer of this Institute into the hands of the Church has so far progressed that we presume it may now be said that we have a school under our own control." Two-thirds of the trustees being members of the Church of God, Colder was elected Principal, to enter upon his duties with the opening of the Fall term, Oct. 14, 1857. Being pastor of Fourth Street Church, Harrisburg, and Editor of "The Church Advocate," Colder realized that he would have too much work if to these duties were added those of Principal of Shippensburg Institute, which he also felt it his "duty to accept." Sept. 17th he "laid before the church his resignation as pastor, to take effect on the 1st of October," and "requested the church to take immediate steps to secure a successor." The church accepted his resignation, and chose Wm. Mooney, pastor of Shippensburg church, as his successor. Colder removed from Harrisburg to Shippensburg on Oct. 4th, and Mooney came to Harrisburg Oct. 11th. Colder also became pastor of the Shippensburg church. On Sept. 23rd, "on application of the church at Harrisburg," the Standing Committee "ratified their acceptance of the resignation of Bro. Colder as their pastor, and also their call of Bro. Mooney as his successor." At the Eldership in November, 1857, Colder was appointed to Shippensburg, and Mooney to Harrisburg. On March 24, 1858, Mrs. Colder died. On May 26, 1858, Mooney died. These two distressing events determined Colder's resignation of the Principalship of Shippensburg Institute, though for the time he continued to act as pastor of the church; but changed his residence to Harrisburg. The dissensions between Winebrenner and Colder now developed into a veritable feud, a state of open enmity, in which the local church and the Eldership became involved. Colder on May 13th published an editorial, "A Word of Explanation," and another, "The New Hymn Book," which reflected somewhat on Winebrenner. To these Winebrenner replied, under the caption, "Remarks and Queries to Faultfinders," with a series of ten incisive questions. Colder published these under the head, "A Communication from Elder J. Winebrenner," in which, after some caustic introductory remarks, he took up and answered each question successively, the answers abounding in disagreeably penetrating personalities. On June 24, 1858, upon petition of sixteen ministers and delegates of the Eldership of 1857, G. U. Harn, Speaker, issued a call, "that said Eldership will meet and hold a special and extra session, at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, Pa., commencing on Tuesday, the 6th day of July next, at 10 o'clock a. m." When the Eldership met, "certain charges against Colder, Winebrenner and McFadden, and against three ruling elders of the church at Harrisburg, were preferred and read." After considering the first charge against Colder, and three of the specifications, the whole matter was disposed of by certain findings, and a reference of the matter "to the disposition of the Standing Committee for final action, by which they are to abide." It was further resolved, that "if the above parties fail to meet the above recommendation, then the Standing Committee is authorized to proceed and deal with the parties according to our Constitution." At the extra session Colder was enrolled as pastor at Shippensburg, but disclaimed sustaining that relation, as he was acting as pastor at Harrisburg. As per action of the Eldership, the Standing Committee held three meetings between July 7th and Aug. 16th, but at each one "Bro. Colder failed to submit his case to the Standing Committee as required by the Eldership." The Committee decided that it had "no power to appoint Bro. Colder to Harrisburg," and it "authorized Bro. Flake to preach for the church at Harrisburg until the Eldership." It also declared that it "considered the church at Harrisburg to have complied with the demand of the Eldership in submitting their case to the Standing Committee." But on Aug. 16th "the church of God at Harrisburg held a meeting in the bethel for the purpose of considering the recent action of two of the members of the Standing Committee." In the resolutions adopted the church approved of Colder's declining to submit his case to the Committee. It also "declined the offer of the services of Elder J. Flake, being already well supplied by a pastor." A controversial letter, "in reply to certain proceedings in the church at Harrisburg," was issued on Aug. 24, 1858, signed by Winebrenner, Chairman, and Thomas, Secretary. To this the elders and deacons made circumstantial reply on Oct. 22nd. Officially the existing relations remained in statu quo, until the Eldership convened on Nov. 3, 1858. Charges were preferred "against a part of the church at Harrisburg," and three "charges against James Colder," and were acted upon. Everything in an official sense seemed to have been adjusted. The great battles had been fought, and the forces, which were somewhat divided, all seemed to view the final result with satisfaction. Colder had been appointed to Harrisburg until the Spring of 1859, and he declared: "We have no inclination to quarrel with the Eldership, and are willing to acquiesce in the decision of that body wherein it has made any. The brethren had a difficult and unpleasant task to perform, and we are willing to suffer some things rather than to protract strife." And the Standing Committee two months later, in partly reviewing the actions of the Eldership said: "Harmony and concord once more seemed to prevail, and all parties expressed great satisfaction as to the result. But not everything was settled. Two elements of future trouble remained. A. X. Shoemaker was appointed to Harrisburg, and J. Colder to Camp Hill; and "Bro. Colder and Winebrenner were authorized to submit their personal difficulties for adjustment to the Standing Committee." This Committee consisted of James Mackey, Jacob Keller and E. H. Thomas. Said Committee met, transacted its business, and published its report Jan. 6, 1859. The serious character of the troubles is reflected in the final paragraph of its report: "We can not close the above exposition and statement we have been compelled to make of the circumstances, involving as it does more or less the whole-religious connection of the Church to which we belong, without expressing our heartfelt sorrow of the circumstances which have led to this most unhappy dilemma. The greater part of half a century in which we have heretofore toiled together successfully for the prosperity of our Zion, our God has revealed to us no such severe trial of our faith, nor anything even approaching the deep anguish of soul which, as the people of God, we are at this time called on to suffer. Nor can any one tell how far into an unlimited eternity the dreadful results may stretch themselves which have thus befallen us, and gathered in thick, dark clouds around us." On Jan. 3, 1859, Colder wrote to the Standing Committee: "I feel it is my duty to dissolve my connection with the East Pennsylvania Eldership. I therefore hereby request you to take such action as may be necessary to consummate the above purpose." The Committee, however, did not act on this request. Colder's review of the report of the Standing Committee clearly indicated his indisposition to abide by the conclusions reached. The church had also "remonstrated against the appointment which the Eldership had made for Harrisburg from the first of April next" (1859). It asked that a change be made by the Committee. On this remonstrance the Committee did not act, so leaving the appointment stand. In the same issue with the Committee's Report, the Secretary of the Harrisburg church council published an action, declaring that the church "will not receive Bro. Shoemaker," and requesting "the Committee to make no appointment for next year." At the same meeting the Council also recommended Colder "to withdraw from the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and we, as officers of the church of God in Harrisburg, pledge ourselves to stand by and sustain him." By this time it became evident that the spirit of rebellion had possessed the authorities of, if not the whole, church at Harrisburg, and that extreme measures were imperative. Accordingly at a meeting of the Standing Committee held Jan. 18, 1859, Colder was "suspended from the Christian ministry among us;" the pulpit of the Harrisburg church was declared vacant, and "Elder John Winebrenner was appointed to the pastorate of the church until the first of April next." The general charge upon which the suspension of Colder was based by the Committee was, that he "was repeatedly guilty of insubordination and contumacious conduct, which can no longer be tolerated." In obedience to the action of the Committee, on Sabbath morning, Jan. 23rd, Winebrenner proceeded to the bethel "to claim my rights, and to enter upon the duties of my office." He had been previously notified by the four elders that "the action of the Committee will not be acquiesced in by the church; and you are further notified that any effort on your part to exercise the duties of pastor among us will be resisted." When Winebrenner reached the bethel he, to his "great surprise, found my entrance into the pulpit intercepted by a quaternion of men on each side thereof; and besides, as a further preparatory measure to prevent my getting into the pulpit, the Sheriff and high constable in attendance, to afford them aid and comfort." Winebrenner protested; offered to read to them "the power and authority under which" he acted; but to no avail. He then left the house, and "a portion of the congregation followed" him. The sermon which he had intended to preach was based on Rom. xvi. 17, 18. Theme: "The Power and Duty of the Church Against Offenders." The permeating thought of the sermon is "The doctrine of loyalty and subordination to all rightful authority in the Church." Shoemaker, having removed to Harrisburg, on April 1, 1859, addressed a note to the elders of the church, apprising them that he intended "to enter upon my duties as pastor of the church, and preach in the Fourth Street Bethel on next Sabbath morning and evening." He was promptly notified that "any attempt on your part to supply the pulpit would certainly be resisted." And when he went to the bethel and was "about to proceed into the pulpit, he was met at the steps" and prevented from going further. Colder and his followers having possession of the bethel and all church property, the law was the only recourse where redress could be secured. Accordingly, on April 11, 1859, a Bill in Equity was filed "in the Court of Common Pleas in and for the County of Dauphin, sitting in Equity in and for said County," by John Winebrenner, Isaac Stees, Jacob Updegrove, Michael Newman, Henry Clay, Henry P. Rodearmel, William Brown, George Yousling, Michael Forney, John Brooks, A. X. Shoemaker and William McFadden, vs. James Colder, John Young, A. W. Barr, Jacob Miley, Theodore F. Boyer, P. S. Atticks, S. W. Myers, G. W. Felix, John Ferguson, Jonas Rudy and Joshua Jones. Charles C. Rawn and B. F. Etter were Solicitors for Complainants.

While there was considerable disaffection among the churches on three or four of the fields in the Eldership as a result of these troubles at Harrisburg, there were no other schisms; and while it produced a degree of lukewarmness, few severed their church relations. One minister, however, was disciplined for co-operating with Colder after his suspension, but he remained a faithful member of the Eldership for many years, and died loyal to the cause. Three others withdrew from the Eldership, one of which was restored later, and another one made tentative overtures.

When people were more superstitious than they are now, and had still remnants of the faith of the ancient Greeks and Romans in omens, signs and portents of calamitous events, what has already passed under review, and controversies, difficulties and variances following, might seem foreshadowed in the distressing announcement at the close of the preceding period, and more fully at the opening of the present period, of the death of M. F. Snavelly, North Bend, Ia., as the result of a railroad accident, on the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad, near Joliet, Ill., which occurred to the train on which he and Mrs. Snavelly were returning from a visit to East Pennsylvania. Both he and his wife were "badly scalded," and he died eleven days thereafter. He was not quite forty-five years of age, and was "an amiable and affectionate minister of the Church of God, greatly esteemed by all that became acquainted with him." The only other catastrophe recorded was the destruction by fire of the meeting-house in Adams county, Ind., Dec. 2, 1859, "believed to have been set on fire." But there were more or less troubles and contentions, and numerous controversies and debates. A good deal of the acrimonious belligerency incident to the division in Harrisburg and the Texas Mission disagreement was carried into western Elderships through the dissemination of Winebrenner's Pamphlet on Slavery. The anti-slavery feeling was more acute in the Church in the West than in the East. The Dred Scott decision in 1857, and the bitter contest between Free Soil and Pro-Slavery emigrants which at the same time were pouring into Kansas, each determined its adherents should decide the destiny of that grand Commonwealth, did not tend to put the western religious mind in a state to consider even the question of the possibility of a slave-holder's regeneration as a test of his fellowship in an anti-slavery Church. This was immediately followed by a strong and protracted discussion by Harn and others of "Politics, Religion and Slavery." Harn was as much in his native element in a debate as the bird in the air. It was his daily diversion. And it was immaterial to him whether it was theology, religion, or politics. A debate reported in the early months of 1855, in the "neighborhood of Winfield, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, was between Harn and J. Weaver, who ten years later was elected a Bishop of the United Brethren Church, who for his Church "performed service with a degree of success and acceptability not surpassed in its history." Harn affirmed that "Immersion is the action ordained by Jesus Christ as the one only baptism." Weaver denied. Weaver affirmed that "Children of believing parents are proper subjects of baptism." Harn denied. J. W. West wrote: "The whole was a decided victory in favor of gospel truth, which has since been fully attested."

It was not often that ministers of the Church of God came in contact with ministers of the Protestant and Methodist Church, as their territory was largely along and below the southern borders of that of the Church of God. But in Maryland and the southern part of the territory of the West Pennsylvania Eldership fields somewhat overlapped. It was in this territory that Joseph Glenn, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, heard Rev. McCullough, of the Protestant Methodist Church, on a sacramental occasion, preach a sermon in which he "alluded to the humiliation of the Son of God, who condescended to wash his disciples' feet in accordance with an ancient custom." At the close of the services, as was then not uncommon, Glenn "challenged the proof of this statement." McCullough in return "demanded proof that washing feet is an ordinance in the Christian Church." Correspondence followed, and a debate was arranged. Neither was considered a debater, but Glenn was credited with having "discomfited his opponent."

The first public debate by A. Swartz was held at Mt. Joy, Pa., with T. Montgomery, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, beginning July 15, 1856. There were four propositions debated, to wit: Swartz affirmed "that the immersion in water of a proper subject, in the name of the Trinity, is the only action of Christian Baptism ordained by Jesus Christ." He also affirmed "that believers are the only subjects of Christian baptism." Montgomery affirmed "that sprinkling or pouring water on a suitable subject, in the name of the Trinity, is Christian or scriptural baptism." Also, "that the Scriptures teach that infants should be baptized." The brethren had complete confidence in Swartz's ability to defend successfully his propositions. He was an analytical reasoner of exceptional power. He could follow a line of deductive reasoning with equal facility. His arguments were cold logic, as he was apparently a man of largely undeveloped but nascent sensibilities. He had, too, that tremendous firmness of purpose never to be trifled with in an opponent. Winebrenner and other ministers of the Church were present and gave Swartz their moral support, and perhaps more, as Montgomery "charged his opponent with being surrounded with a concave of his brethren, who were counseling and sustaining him." Winebrenner said: "The debaters in this contest were pretty well matched," without any special commendation of Swartz beyond stating that "believer's baptism by immersion stands sure and safe." He did not approve of, and delight in, such "public discussions;" but he attended this one "for the purpose of reporting the outlines" for the columns of "The Church Advocate." Perhaps the best fruits of this debate was that it led Swartz to write his work, "The Trial of Mr. Pedit-baptist," of which Colder said that it "promises to be not only very interesting and readable, but also a very valuable help to all who are contending for the right ways of the Lord"; that it is "a storehouse of arguments for all our preachers and people."

Discussions between the ministers, with an occasional layman and one woman, also marked this period. It was in some things a transition period. The science and art of music were being more generally taught. This was somewhat of a specialty with H. L. and J. B. Soule, both ministers in the East Pennsylvania Eldership. They not only taught music, but gave "concerts of sacred music" and "musical festivals," and strongly urged more scientific singing at church services; but they favored the introduction of choirs and instrumental music. Colder, Winebrenner and other ministers were in sympathy with them, although Winebrenner deprecated "the tendency and fashion of the times as calculated to drive congregational singing from the house of God. Choirs and organs are becoming the order of the day, and people who attempt to comply with the instructions of Paul are regarded rude and unchaste. In fine, the tendency of the day is to elevate the choir to do all the singing." Even Bishop McIlvaine, Protestant Episcopal Church, in a pastoral letter spoke in similar vein. In this controversy, which continued for several years, Ellen Stewart, of Copley, Ohio, who also was a preacher, though unordained, took a conspicuous part, declaring that as under the Levitical dispensation "their worship was necessarily so much of the outward sort, they could employ musical instruments; but as our worship is so inward and spiritual, we have serious doubts whether we can worship acceptably in the use of them." In the churches this controversy often waxed quite warm and created a great deal of friction and bad feeling. The change which was impending was a revolution.

Ellen Stewart naturally figured in the revival of another controversy, which as yet had few to take the affirmative—the right of a woman to preach the gospel. She castigated some Methodist ministers through "The Church Advocate," who had treated her "with great respect as a private member," but when "under a strong impression of duty she asked permission to deliver an exhortation to the people, was repulsed with silent contempt." She argued her side of the question with a good measure of skill. She had an opponent in Maria E. Brown, but she had less of the argumentative faculty. As yet there was no disposition apparent among women to enter the ministry, and no one had been licensed by any Eldership. But women in the churches of God freely exercised the right to pray in public.

From 1856 to 1859, under initiative by Harn, who was irrepresible, the question of the use of the plural of "Church" in Eldership titles was agitated in print and on the floors of the different Elderships. It might be inferred that the Editor of "The Church Advocate," Winebrenner, was disinclined to open the columns of the paper for a discussion of the subject, as the Ohio Standing Committee in April, 1857, "urgently requested" him "to permit Bro. G. U. Harn to express his views on the Church title in the columns of the paper." His resolution to use the plural in the Constitution of the East Pennsylvania Eldership had been adopted in 1853, but rescinded in 1854. Whether in active opposition or not, Winebrenner's patient, silent influence was the one great obstacle which Harn could not conquer. Yet in no other trial of strength did he so nearly succeed as in this. It must always be assumed, however strong the temptation to the contrary, that the actions of disputants proceed from pure and honest and upright motives; and so, though ambition and rivalry might have been strong elements in his character, it is but just to Harn to credit him rather with having not a particle of respect for the opinions of any man or body of men, but homage solely for the truth itself as he perceived it. Strong men were on both sides in all the Elderships. But in this trial of strength Harn temporarily gained the victory. Colder, in the first volume of the paper under his control, spoke in the Preface of the "Mission of the Churches of God." By October, 1859, the West Ohio Eldership, the East Ohio Eldership, the Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership, the Iowa Eldership, the Indiana Eldership, the Illinois Eldership and the Michigan Eldership used the plural title. Yet in 1860, when the Amended Constitution of the General Eldership was under consideration, and Harn offered his amendment "to use the plural form of the word 'Church,'" the "amendment was lost."

From 1856 to 1859 the subject of ordination of ministers, and sometimes of lay-elders, by the imposition of hands was continued from the previous period. It was practiced in the local churches in some localities as early as 1831 and 1832, when they exercised the power to license men to preach the gospel. Winebrenner in his "Scriptural View of the Church of God," published in 1829, taught that after choosing men to fill the office of elder, including the two classes of elders, "there ought to be a public declaration and recognition of it. . . . either with or without the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." He was never an advocate of the laying on of hands. "Justice" held that Heb. vi. 12 taught "that baptism and the laying on of hands are visible ordinances," and that "each of these is declared by the authority of the Holy Ghost to be a 'principle, or first principle of the doctrine of Christ.'" His conclusion was that we "are no more at liberty to reject the laying on of hands than we are to refuse repentance, baptism, the resurrection of the dead, or the final judgment." The discussion originated in a resolution of the General Eldership in 1854, which "referred the discussion of the subject to the columns of 'The Advocate.'" But the resolution affirmed that "ministers among us should be solemnly set apart by prayer and the imposition of hands by one or more of the bishops of the Church of God." In opposition to the doctrine of the resolution was A. Swartz, who unlike Irenæus as being all for peace, was generally ready for a debate. He could have waited for the advocates of the resolution to maintain its teaching, but they were silent. Harn, with a genius for controversy which was both good-natured and caustic, marshalled his arguments in support of the resolution; arguments of which he ingenuously said, "If they are capable of refutation, I confess I am inadequate to the task." E. H. Thomas, a calm, clear-headed reasoner, unpretentious, but convincing, so forcibly set forth the affirmative side of the question that Swartz concluded "he no doubt feels great security and hope of success," as "he signifies his position to be invulnerable." Winebrenner also entered the arena of debate, and declared that "Bro. Thomas is mistaken in his corollaries or consequent truths drawn, as he affirms, from this discussion." And he affirmed, "that our practice is apostolic, and, of course, in harmony with the New Testament." James Mackey, James Colder and a few others also participated in this protracted discussion. Only on the question of tithing did Winebrenner write at such length as he did on the laying on of hands, and he felt convinced that "by the strong array of arguments we have succeeded in showing, not only from the testimony and admissions of eminent writers on the other side of this question; but by strong and conclusive arguments drawn directly from Scripture and sound reason, that" our opponents are "evidently in error on this subject."

Somewhat edifying and instructive discussions of three or four other topics mark this period. Among these was the old question of Christian union, on which Mackey wrote a series of discriminating articles. The writers of the Church of God were always indisposed to advocate Church union, insisting that this is not the union taught in the New Testament.

The order of the ordinances provoked controversy, as it was reversed in practice in the German Eldership, and to some extent in the Indiana Eldership.

Harn, a persistent advocate of the Bible Union project of a new version of the Scriptures, started a discussion, in which he had Thomas as an antagonist, of the translation of ekklesia. He would reject the word "church," and substitute "congregation" or "assembly."

An animated discussion of "Creeds" occurred, as a few believed a declaration of what the Church of God believed would be proper and serviceable. Mackey, R. H. Bolton, H. L. Soule and S. M. Hoover were the principals in this discussion. As to Creeds, in the more common sense of the term, the avowed advocates were indisposed to show their hands. But there were signs of a tendency to be as our neighbors in that the phrase "our Church" had gained some currency, as also the prefix "Rev.," and the designation of the Church as a "denomination." It was also charged that a leaning toward "independency" which might threaten disintegration was fostered in various quarters. Ohio seemed to be the best soil at this time for such a growth, when it was charged by the leaders that there is "a prevalent opinion that the churches have a right to reject whom they please, and make their selection of any man from any field of labor."

Dependence for church upbuilding and enlargement up to this time was almost exclusively on revivals and camp-meetings. They considered these two methods of soul-saving closely connected. They were mutual outgrowths of each other, and as the latter became less fruitful in conversions, they were discontinued. It was still customary in many churches to have a day of fasting and prayer preceding a "revival meeting." For they were so accustomed to see sinners converted at their protracted meetings, which with them was a "revival," that they called them so in anticipation. But during 1855 and 1856 the revivals were not so numerous, and generally also fewer conversions. There were a few rather extraordinary exceptions, like that at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, Pa., where up to Feb. 21, 1856, "over one hundred had already professed conversion." It was not uncommon for reports to end much in the way Winebrenner ended his brief reference to the revival at Harrisburg: "From eight to twelve are nightly out at the altar; but not half as many converts as we should like to see." At some smaller and newer points proportionately better results were witnessed. In 1857 the country experienced one of the most general and disastrous financial panics in its history. It was recognized as a "crisis," and in many pulpits became a theme for sermons. It was presented as "a season of peculiar distress," and as a divine visitation as "a consequence of the sins of the people." Fasting and repentance were strongly urged. Whatever the philosophic relation of such events to the kingdom of grace, they are quite frequently followed, or accompanied with increased religious fervor. And so in this instance, more revivals were reported in the latter part of 1857 and the beginning of 1858 than for several preceding years. From all over the territory of the different Elderships came the same enthusiastic reports of meetings of unusual interest and results. Writing on the prevalence and power of these meetings on March 18, 1858, the Editor of "The Church Advocate," James Colder, said: "There is at present in progress in our country a revival of religion so extensive and glorious that it well deserves the name Great. Making its appearance in New York City, it has spread to hundreds of churches in other places, until now it is accomplishing its heavenly mission in about twenty-three States of the Union. So extensive has been the revival that it has been estimated that in one of the weeks recently passed fifty thousand persons professed to be converted." And reviewing this period on Jan. 26, 1860, the new Editor, E. H. Thomas, said: "The years 1857-58 will long be remembered, especially in the large cities of our own country, as seasons of great outpourings of the Spirit of God, under the influence of which tens of thousands were brought under the converting power of divine grace." But this marvelous "refreshing from the presence of the Lord" was followed in 1859 by "a great drought in revival news."

In 1855 camp-meetings seemed to languish; interest waned; criticism developed; ministers and even Standing Committees urged churches in the matter, and the indisposition to tent reduced the number of tenters to a minimum in some places. Yet there were eighteen camp-meetings held this year, to wit: In Iowa, two; in Illinois, two; in Indiana, two; in Ohio, five; in East Pennsylvania, six, and in Maryland, one. The results were discouraging, as less than one hundred conversions were witnessed.

In 1856, with the approach of the camp-meeting season, J. F. Weishampel, Jr., under the Department Head in "The Advocate" of "Baltimore Editorial Department," conducted by him, published a two-column article "Against Camp-meetings." His objections, however, were mainly against such gatherings near large towns, because "the evil committed overbalances the good that accrues." But the churches were not ready to accept this view, and hence vigorous replies to Weishampel's article by G. W. Wilson, of Ohio; and by "Augustus," were at once published. That the churches endorsed these sentiments is evidenced by the fact that twenty-four camp-meetings were held in 1856, distributed very much as in 1855. The results in the way of conversions were much more meager than in 1855.

Iowa in 1856 had increased the number of its camp-meetings to three. In 1857 an effort was made by the Standing Committee to increase the number; but instead only two were asked for, and so the Committee "earnestly urged the brethren and sisters of the churches of God in Iowa to take an interest in the camp-meeting enterprise." When the Ohio Standing Committee met to arrange for the camp-meetings for 1857 there "had been no applications." Ministers, however, took the matter up, and as a result, five camp-meetings were arranged for. East Pennsylvania and Maryland held fifteen; Iowa, two; Illinois, two; Indiana, one, and West Pennsylvania, one, making a total of twenty-six. The reported number of conversions was over one hundred, though not quite half the meetings were reported in "The Church Advocate."

In 1858 the number of camp-meetings was reduced to fourteen, of which four were in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, two in West Pennsylvania, four in Ohio, one in Indiana, one in Illinois and two in Iowa. At some of these meetings there were no conversions. At others "several" were reported. "Not much in the way of conversions," reported another pastor. Eighty-five is the total reported.

The total number of camp-meetings in 1859 was twenty, the increase being in East and West Pennsylvania Elderships. But fifty-six conversions were definitely reported, while other pastors reported "a few," "some," "small number," "not numerous," "fruits not so much as we could have wished."

But while results of camp-meetings were far below expectations, work through other means made gratifying progress. The first steps were taken to extend the territory West of the Missouri river. As early as 1847 H. Roop, of the Ohio Eldership, had removed to Missouri; but he remained only a short time. The section of the State eastward of the Missouri river and bordering on Iowa was the earliest to attract Church of God emigrants. In Clark county, in 1855, Henry Sherick and family located, and called for preaching. In 1857 George Thomas and family and Samuel Thomas and family, of Bedford county, Pa., removed to Greene county, Mo., in the southwestern part of the State. They invited ministers to visit them. In 1859 other families from Blair county, Pa., emigrated to the same section of the State. But up to this date no regular Church work was done in the State.

A mission was started in Nebraska in 1857. On Feb. 20th Winebrenner announced that it was the intention of the Board of Missions of East Pennsylvania Eldership to send a missionary to Nebraska and one to Kansas in the Spring, "if we can raise the funds." The inception of this project should be attributed to a "B. B. . . . ." (Dr. Becker), who on Dec. 16, 1856, reported from Wyoming City, "a new town situated in Nebraska Territory, at the mouth of Weeping-Water river, surveyed and platted in September, 1856," that "one lot will be given to the Church of God for a meeting-house and parsonage, and a piece of ground for a cemetery." On March 4, 1857, the Board of Missions appointed I. E. Boyer, of Mt. Joy, and "former missionary to Illinois," to Wyoming City, Neb. Ter., "promising to sustain him to the extent named in his letter to the Board." He spent nearly two months canvassing for funds, and then, on April 24th, he left for his mission via the P. R. R. to Pittsburg, and thence by boat down the Ohio river to St. Louis, and up the Missouri to his destination, which he reached May 25th. Otoe county, Neb., in which Wyoming City was located, is on the Missouri river, the third county North of Kansas. June 8th Boyer reported that Dr. Becker "has arrived, and is going to make good his promise." Accordingly, Boyer selected "in block 33, lots 5 and 6, donated by the town company . . . secured by obligation, and deeded to us when built upon." By October 27th there was quite a change in the outlook, when "times are dull, banks are closed, money scarce, and not much to do in any way." The projector of this mission enterprise, Dr. Becker, had "gone East, and it is not likely that he will return again. He did not give me any lots at all." The Board failed to secure funds beyond the $160 in hand when Boyer left Pennsylvania, and so he concluded to leave the mission, and on October 29th started for Illinois, holding protracted meetings during the Winter in Iowa. In a letter dated December 9, 1858, "To whom it may Concern," he says: "Nebraska Mission. That is an entire failure." His advice is: "Abolish the Board of Missions." Meanwhile the Illinois Eldership had passed "a vote of censure" on Boyer, "for leaving the Nebraska Mission."

I. E. Boyer, a native of Lancaster county, Pa., was licensed originally by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1852. He had been attending the Shippensburg Institute, taking a short course preparatory to entering the ministry. While there he contributed his first article to "The Advocate" on "Christ our Example." In the Spring of 1853 he went to Illinois to enter the field as a missionary. Of too limited means to pay his fare, brethren at Mt. Joy, Elizabethtown and Orrstown gave him some assistance; but this he had to supplement on the way by stopping off at several points to earn money to reach his destination. By the last of May, 1853, he had reached the eastern part of his work, and met Sandoe, with whom he held his first meeting in the neighborhood of G. Schroll's. By June 20th he was at Decatur, where he made his headquarters. His mission field extended to Jacob Bear's, three miles from Decatur; another point four miles north-west from Decatur; one six miles north-east and the other six miles due South. In September, 1853, he urged young men from the East to come to Illinois and enter that inviting field of mission labors. Support to some extent was guaranteed by brethren agreeing to pay six per cent. for five years on amounts varying from $25.00 upward. He engaged in more general missionary work in 1854, his tours taking him through Moultrie, Coles, Cumberland, Jasper, Crawford and Cook counties, Illinois, and Vigo and Parks counties, Indiana. Later in the year he also extended his labors into Christian, Sangamon, Morgan, Scott and Pike counties. In 1857 he was back in Pennsylvania, and agreed to go as the first missionary to Nebraska. A town was laid out in the south-eastern corner of the State, and lots offered free for a church and parsonage. The East Pennsylvania Eldership sent him there to open a mission. This proved a failure, and Boyer came eastward into Iowa, and later to Illinois. He was a good preacher of the gospel; was self-sacrificing and faithful, and was honored by the Illinois Eldership by elections to different official positions, among them Speaker and delegate to the General Eldership.

Iowa received two accessions to its ministerial ranks in 1855. At the East Pennsylvania Eldership the previous year P. Shaw and A. J. Fenton were appointed to the "Iowa Mission," and on January 11, 1855, it was published they will leave for their field "next Spring." Already on January 1, 1855, the Iowa Standing Committee had appointed Fenton on "the Northern circuit," North of North Bend, and Shaw to the territory "extending South of North Bend," Johnson county. They left Harrisburg March 25th, and reached their destination April 15th, so that by April 26th Shaw wrote that he is on his field, and "nearly around my circuit." In Cedar county, bordering on Johnson county on the East, an emigrant from West Newton, Pa., called for preaching, saying, "our house is open for ministers to preach in." Later a "revival of religion and the organization of a church of thirty members" was reported from said county. At Pleasant Valley, Johnson county, a revival was enjoyed under Lininger, in 1855, and a church formed. Scott county, second county east of Johnson, on the Mississippi, had received some emigrants from Cumberland county, Pa., as early as 1850, and these were visited by Hawk, and Fenton and Gill preached there in 1855, doing good work. Buchanan county, north-west of Johnson, also enjoyed a revival, and a church was organized at Pine Creek. It was in this county, at Pleasant Prairie, two and one-half miles East of Independence, that the second bethel in the State was built, and was dedicated December 9, 1855, A. Megrew, J. Lininger and D. Gill officiating. In Louisa, Des Moines and other counties the work was advancing, the churches in various places being strengthened by additions of families from the East. The church at Harmony, Des Moines county, built a meeting-house in 1859.

In October, 1855, Winebrenner wrote this prophecy: "In less than one generation from this time the States of Illinois and Iowa will embody the great central strength of the Church of God." The progress made in Illinois from 1855 to 1859 indicated the verification of this prediction. In 1855 what was called the Winchester Mission, Scott county, was assigned to George Sandoe; but because of ill-health he resigned, and I. E. Boyer was appointed. Scott county is the second county East of the Mississippi river, where several families of the Church had located. At Lamot Creek, Crawford county, on the Indiana State line, Boyer and Rupp organized a church of ten members February 11, 1856. April 22, 1855, Kyle and Sandoe "succeeded in organizing a church of God in Brother Ephraim Bear's neighborhood," near Decatur, Macon county. This is probably identical with "Brother Rife's neighborhood," where "the brethren built a very fine bethel" in 1857, which was to be dedicated "the last Sabbath in January," 1858; "but for certain reasons the dedicatory sermon was not preached until September 19, 1858." This was the first house of worship built in Illinois by the Church of God. It has since been known as the Boiling Spring church. From the date of the building of this bethel to 1886, one bethel a year, on an average, was built in Illinois. Considerable success attended the labors of D. S. Byers and D. Wertz in Joe Daviess, Carroll and Bureau counties, in the northern part of the State, during 1855. A church was organized at Rush Creek, Joe Daviess county. "Mt. Carroll Mission is enlarging her borders." After a successful revival at Troy Grove, La Salle county, increasing the church to thirty-six, arrangements were made in 1856 to build a parsonage. Here, in 1858, Kyle, the pastor, J. H. Hurley, Klein, Cain and Reed held a meeting in "a mammoth tent put up for the accommodation of the people," which "was attended with a mighty outpouring of the people from all quarters," coming "from a distance of from thirty to forty miles." In Livingston county, adjoining La Salle on the south-east, Andrew Wagoner organized "a church of a few members" in May, 1856, nine miles north-east of Pontiac. In August, 1857, D. S. Byers and D. Kyle held a "protracted meeting in Pontiac" and organized a church of six members. A church of six members was also laboring with some success at Ottawa, La Salle county, in 1857. A new mission field was formed in 1856, to which Rudolph White was appointed, called "Monmouth Mission," consisting of Warren, McDonough and Fulton counties, near the Mississippi. In December, 1857, a church was organized at Homer, Champaign county, composed of five members. A. J. Fenton, in April, 1857, organized the church of "about a dozen," in Decatur, Macon county, but they had "no house of worship;" but "the brethren think of building next Summer." And this dozen consecrated members had tenacity of purpose, and on September 9, 1858, published the dedication of "the new bethel built by the church of God in the city of Decatur," which then had a population of 9,000. The dedication services were held October 17, 1858. The preaching services up to this time had been mainly held in the Disciple house of worship. A church of twenty-two members, all heads of families, was organized by D. S. Byers at Eight Mile Grove, Henry county, toward Spring, in 1859.

The Michigan Eldership seemed to be in a hibernial sleep during this period, until in September, 1859, when it held its sixth annual session, having adjourned the fifth of October, 1853. Its territory was partly cultivated by ministers of the Indiana Eldership, as A. B. Slyter, the most active missionary in Michigan had again united with the Indiana Eldership, and was appointed to the Thornapple circuit. J. B. White, who called himself "a young preacher," was licensed by the Ohio Eldership in 1853, and lived in Genessee county, Mich., the fourth county north of the Ohio line. In 1855 he reported the church at Flushing, his home, "much discouraged because they have not more preaching." "Our trials and persecutions are almost more than we can endure." But the light soon broke through the lowering clouds, for in 1856, in the month of June, he had a successful meeting in Montrose township, Genessee county, and organized a church of twelve members. Two brothers, Moses and Ezekiel Kelly, also licensed by the Ohio Eldership, in 1855, removed to Hillsdale county, Mich., bordering on Ohio. This was a new locality for Church work, but this same year they had a revival, and organized a church of twenty members in Allen Township. Success also crowned their labors near Jonesville, same county, and a church was organized. In the Indiana Eldership, through the energetic labors of T. Hickernell, D. Keplinger, David Neidig, F. Komp, A. L. Nye and others quite cheering progress was made. At least twenty-four new churches were formed, and conversions aggregating not less than from one hundred to two hundred and thirty souls were reported by the pastors. A few houses of worship were erected, but as yet a majority of the churches held their services in school-houses. The territory traveled over by the ministers and missionaries of the Eldership extended into not less than sixteen counties of the State, and several counties in Ohio. They reached La Porte county, in the north-western part of the State; a group of ten counties in the north-eastern part of the State; established a few churches in Wayne and Henry counties, in the south-east, and reached within eight miles of Terre Haute, Vigo county, and organized a church there, and crossed Clay, south-eastward, into Greene county, both counties lying in the south-western part of the State. This territory in the south-west was so far removed from the work in the north-eastern section of the State that late in this period a new Eldership was projected.

In Ohio it is only needful to go over the list of counties, of not less than twenty-eight, in which the most of the successful Church extension-work was done between 1855 and 1860, to be impressed with the fact that the center of Church population in the State was rapidly moving westward. In the south-eastern corner were Athens and Meigs counties, and adjoining Beaver county, Pa., west of Pittsburg, was Columbiana county, measurably neglected between the two Elderships, and the work was slowly dying. Around Wayne county, the original Ohio mission field, were the older circuits in Stark, Tuscarawas, Holmes, Summit, Coshockton and Knox counties. From here the work spread westward and northward across the center line North and South of the State, into Richland, Crawford, Wyandot, Marion, Logan, Hancock, Seneca, Wood, Auglaize and Shelby counties, until reaching the Indiana State line, Williams in the extreme north-west corner, and Defiance, Paulding, Van Wert, Mercer, Darke and Preble, every county in succession on the Indiana line except the two most southern counties, had more or less preaching by Church of God ministers. Belmont county in the south-east was occupied by the West Pennsylvania Eldership. It was but reasonable under these conditions that the Ohio Eldership should desire a division of its rapidly expanding territory, and have two Elderships organized, and also have the State line between Ohio and Indiana made the boundary on the West. The initial steps were taken in 1855, and the division was harmoniously accomplished in 1857, after favorable action by the General Eldership. This new Eldership led the way in requiring ministers to go to their new fields in the Fall. During the five years from October, 1854, to October, 1859, there were notable accessions to the ministry of the Church in Ohio. Harn went to Wooster, under appointment by the East Pennsylvania Eldership made in October, 1855, under whose labors the church realized that "a murky atmosphere does not quench the stars." With their new Bethel, which had been dedicated August 5, 1855, and a man of Harn's personality, they received new inspiration. In the Spring of 1859 Harn was elected "Mayor of Wooster City." Also L. B. Hartman, a young man of some culture, who became a leader among them; M. Beck, a Boanerges, and his brother, B. F. Beck, a man of great natural refinement and conscientiousness, the first minister of the Church to reverse the order by going to East Pennsylvania, in 1858, to make it his permanent home; W. H. Oliver, a hard-working revivalist; R. H. Bolton, evangelist, missionary and collector on a more extensive scale than any other minister of the Church;

J. W. Aukerman, a man who always spoke with the conviction of one who has given sufficient thought to his subject to know that he is speaking the truth; W. P. Small, mild, firm, and who would convince men by the simple truth rather than discursive reasoning, and James George and James Wilson, each, with James, the Lord's brother, "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." Altogether the ministry in Ohio was a strong force at this time, going everywhere preaching the word as the power of God to save, redeem, elevate and ennoble men. They knew nothing of any other means or measures to reform and improve society, and would scorn the more recent systems of eugenics as co-operative agencies with the gospel in the moral and religious regeneration of the race. While the work accomplished is but partially on record, it is known that churches were formed at a number of places, several in Hancock county, and others in Seneca, Williams, Defiance, Paulding, Stark, Wyandot and Crawford counties. At least a dozen new houses of worship were dedicated, besides the one at Wooster. Among these was one at Blanchard Road, six miles below Findlay; one in Venice township, Seneca county; one five miles West of Shelby, Crawford county. Some of the circuits had grown very large, as the Attica circuit, which in 1858 had fourteen appointments. Two regular missions were established, in addition to the extension of fields already occupied. In answer to an application by E. Logue, in 1855, "a mission was given him in Stark and Tuscarawas counties, to be called the Canton Mission." Canton is one of the four points named. Another one was known as the Akron Mission, in Summit county, which had ten appointments in 1856, and "the prospects as far as I can judge at present are flattering," said the pastor, M. Beck.

Progress in the West Pennsylvania Eldership during this period was limited. While there were revivals and accessions on nearly all the old fields, only a few newly organized churches are reported. The work in Virginia "had gone down," and the Marshall county circuit "was broken down." One church was reduced from seventy to six members, "after we had used the old Jerusalem broom," as the pastor described the process. But revivals were enjoyed at nearly all points in that section, and in Greene county, Pa., and Belmont county, Ohio. The latter belonged to the Wheeling Mission, and at Harrisville a small organization was prepared for by giving the hand of fellowship to some converts. At Pleasant Grove, three miles nearer Wheeling, a church of seven members was formed in 1855. On Wheeling Creek, Greene county, Pa., a church numbering seven was formed the same year. Another at Bowman's, in 1857, composed of nineteen members. One in Marshall county, W. Va., with a small membership. In Somerset county fair progress was made. A meeting-house was built in 1855 in Upper Turkey Foot Valley. In 1858 J. A. Plowman went into the town of Somerset, county town of Somerset county, and held a meeting in the Town Hall, and succeeded in organizing a church of twelve members. Armstrong county called for preaching, but West Pennsylvania lacked men. In 1858 J. M. Domer and A. C. Raysor were in McKean county, on the New York State line, and organized a church at Bradford. The first movement for the opening of a mission in Clearfield county, then part of the West Pennsylvania Eldership territory, was in 1856. Clearfield lies across the summit of the Alleghenies, adjoining Cambria county on the North, and Jefferson and Indiana counties on the East, in which work was being done by ministers of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. But the way was opened for East Pennsylvania to take the initiative by the removal from Lisburn to Clearfield of the family of J. H. Jones, at whose father's home at Lisburn Winebrenner, thirty years before, was often entertained. The Standing Committee in 1856 appointed J. F. Wieshampel to visit Clearfield. He did so, and opened the work, establishing twenty preaching places in school-houses within a radius of ten miles of the town of Clearfield. It is but about twenty-five miles from Clearfield, the county-town, to Cherry Tree, Cambria county, where there was an organized church. But West Pennsylvania had "no suitable man to send to Clearfield, and so the work was suspended for the time."

The work in the Virginia section of the East Pennsylvania territory was greatly neglected at this time. It was mainly limited to Berkeley county, but no permanent results followed. Four and five appointments were kept up part of the time by the missionary, when one was on the field.

Favorable indications attended the work in Maryland, in the counties of Washington, Frederick and Carroll, and in Baltimore City. Revivals attended the labors of George Sigler, H. L. Soule, T. Bean and other faithful ministers. Near Brownsville, Washington county, September 16, 1855, a church was organized by

Sigler, which by October numbered twenty. At Carrollton, in 1857, Jacob Wickert donated a lot to the church on which to build a bethel. The church, in October, resolved to erect a meeting-house on it. Work was resumed in Baltimore, by "our German brother," J. M. Busch, in 1855. They had no regular place of worship, the most serious drawback, he says. He preached at the Alms-house, and observed the three ordinances. As yet he had no license, but in the Fall of this year he received license from the German Eldership. In 1856 a church was organized, and they were encouraged to believe they "will increase very rapidly." One of the members and leaders, Presley T. Davis, applied through Winebrenner for membership in the East Pennsylvania Eldership. Another organization, known as the "Union Church of God," also existed in the City, and in 1859 expressed a desire to unite with the church Busch had organized. Winebrenner visited Baltimore this year, in May, and preached in German in the morning in the Otterbein United Brethren church, and "in Old Town for the 'Union Church of God' in the evening."

Within the State, the East Pennsylvania Eldership was devoting its energies quite largely to the substantial, permanent work of the churches. The building and auspicious dedication of Fourth Street Bethel, Harrisburg, gave added impulse to better the material environments of churches and pastors. More than a score of good meeting-houses were built in this semi-decade, and the wisdom, comfort and economy of having parsonages became more evident. The term "bethel" to designate houses of worship in various ways commended itself to the churches. But as from its use to designate the building it was transferred to the organization, a tendency originated to reverse this order, and call the house as well as the church "the church of God." In commenting on a notice of the dedication of the Fourth Street Bethel by the Harrisburg "Patriot," Winebrenner strongly disapproved of this practice. The "Patriot" said: "Last Sunday a week the new Church of God, on Fourth street, was dedicated with imposing ceremonies." Winebrenner said: "The notice here quoted requires a slight correction to make it right. Instead of saying 'the new Church of God,' they should have said the new Bethel (or Metropolitan Bethel) of the Church of God was dedicated." In some sections, as in Adams, Juniata, Lehigh and Berks counties the work was somewhat neglected, and was measurably declining. In others new churches were organized and general and healthy growth revealed. While the church on Broad Top mountain become extinct by removals, and their bethel fell into ruins, at the other end of the circuit as it then was, Simon Fleegal, in January 1855, reported the organization of a church at Fort Littleton, numbering twenty-six. In July, 1855, "a gracious revival broke out in the little village of Wormleysburg, on the opposite side of the river from Harrisburg." Up to a few months prior to this "no organized church" was there. There was "an old, dilapidated building there, belonging to the Methodists, and which a society of that denomination had formerly used." In this building McFadden preached, and later in the school-house. At the Eldership in the Fall McFadden reported "the organization of a church" at Wormleysburg. In York county J. Machlin organized a church at Cross Roads appointment, in 1856, and one at Maytown school-house. William Krieger in January, 1855, organized a church "about four miles from Shellsburg, in a school-house, at the foot of the Allegheny Mountains. J. M. Hebler in the Summer of this year began regular preaching in Pottsville, county-town of Schuylkill county, in a school-house rented for the purpose, and "there are prospects of soon raising a church of God in this place." There was regular preaching at many points, and protracted meetings held, at which no organizations of churches were reported. This was the case at Mt. Pleasant and at Mountville, Lancaster county; at Cumberland Furnaces and Milltown, seven miles South of Newville, Cumberland county; Thompsonstown, Juniata county; Forney's school-house, Dauphin county; Deer Lick, on the "Broad Top circuit," and very many other points. Some of these points had a sufficient membership to have ordinance meetings. At Mt. Nebo, Lebanon county, Dr. George Ross bought the right to preach in a union meeting-house. The "Matamoras and Juniata circuit" in 1858 had ten appointments. As on many other circuits, a majority of these were in school-houses, and had not the local strength to become permanent.

One of these school-house appointments in 1855, which grew into a strong, permanent church, was located at the "Forks of the Creek," or confluence of the Sidling Hill and Little Aukwick, Huntingdon county, later called Walnut Grove.

Here a bethel was built in 1855, dedicated by A. X. Shoemaker. Simon Fleegal was the pastor, who "with his own hands laid part of the foundation." At New Kingston, Cumberland county, the church in April, 1855, decided to build a meeting-house; completed it during the Summer, and held the dedicatory services November 30th. J. C. Owens was pastor, and Winebrenner preached the Sabbath morning sermon. The Adventists had an interest in this house, and J. Litch, one of their prominent ministers, officiated on Saturday and Sunday evenings. At Doubling Gap, same county, the brethren, under the supervision of a Building Committee composed of Peter Baker, Leonard Weast and Henry Snyder, began in May, 1855, to collect "funds for the building of a meeting-house for the use of the church of God" at that place. As appointee by the German Eldership, J. F. Welshampel, in April, 1855, went to Reading, Berks county, as a missionary. He "rented a large store-room on the corner of Eighth and Walnut streets which he fitted up so as to accommodate over a hundred people." This was "dedicated to the worship of God on Sabbath, May 13th. Winebrenner preached the dedicatory sermon in German, from Ezekiel xliii. 10, 11. In the afternoon Welshampel preached a German sermon, and in the evening Winebrenner preached an English sermon. In Schuylkill county, during the Summer of 1855, two houses of worship were built, one in Mahantango Valley and one in Deep Creek Valley, about three miles apart. These were dedicated late in the year, on successive Sundays, by Winebrenner and Keller. The latter is located in Welshampeltown, and the former on the land of Brother George Hepler." Two houses of worship were built in this county in 1856. One about a mile East of Valley View, in Lykens Valley, removed into the village in 1871. The other at Osmanstown, Lower Mahantango Valley, dedicated August 10th. On June 1, 1856, the corner-stone of "the new bethel in the neighborhood of John Miller and John Felty, Susquehanna township, Dauphin county," was laid. The dedication took place November 30th. Colder preached Saturday evening and Sabbath morning, and Keller, Sabbath evening. At Hummelstown, same county, the church worshiped in the Methodist house; but in December, when Winebrenner, J. Ross and Keller went there to hold a protracted meeting they were "shut out of their meeting-house." They held the services in the "Union Meeting-house." This prepared the way for "agitating the question of erecting a bethel for their own use." The church in Maytown worshiped in Martin Beck's meeting-house, a mile from town, before it was organized in the town by G. Sigler, May 24, 1858. The Beck house was built on Martin Beck's land, and principally by himself. It was dedicated by J. Litch, of Philadelphia, December 25, 1856. Under Sigler and A. H. Long the work in town was started, and in 1859 the building of a bethel was undertaken. The corner-stone was laid August 7th, and the house dedicated November 13th. S. Fleegal was then the pastor, and Winebrenner, Thomas and Long conducted the dedicatory services. In York county the church at Newberry built a bethel during the Summer of 1856, which was dedicated by Winebrenner February 1, 1857. C. Price was the pastor. Under Price's labors in the same county, during 1857, the church at Ball Hills built a bethel, which was dedicated August 2nd, Swartz and Ross officiating. August 9, 1857, under Price as pastor, the church at Goldsboro, York county, laid the corner-stone of their new bethel, with Winebrenner as minister. The house was dedicated on Whit Sunday, May 23, 1858. "The corner-stone of a new bethel now building in Fairview, York county," was laid by James Colder, August 23, 1857, J. Keller, pastor. The church at Oak Grove, Perry county, built a "new bethel" in 1858, which was dedicated by Colder, October 24th. The church at Newville, Cumberland county, began the building of its new house on the main street in the after part of the Summer of 1859, and laid the corner-stone on Saturday forenoon, September 20th, Thomas officiating. In Bedford county the church at Lafayetteville was reorganized at Bakersville in 1856. In 1858 they built a meeting-house, which was dedicated by A. H. Long, December 5th. Spruce Hollow, Blair county, were "making ready to build" in 1856, to dedicate in the Fall. They were delayed, and in January, 1858, formed a new resolution to build during the Summer, and actually began work in 1859. Welshampel regarded this place as "headquarters for the Allegheny circuit," lying between the "Cove" and the Allegheny Mountains.

At the Eldership held at Middletown, beginning November 4, 1857, the Baptist church at Chambersburg, county-seat of Franklin county, proposed to transfer their unfinished house of worship to the Eldership in consideration of "the payment of certain claims now held against the building." The Standing Committee and Board of Missions were "authorized forthwith to attend to the matter, and take such steps as will secure the property to this body." The house in its unfinished condition had cost the Baptist church $2,700. The committee appointed for the purpose bought it for $1,245. But the "Baptists released to us the surplus above the judgments, which was $425, thus making the actual cost of the property about $800." The house was finished, and the dedication services were held September 26, 1858. Winebrenner preached the sermon. Other ministers present and assisting were Mackey, Thomas, Owens and Laverty. The church was organized by Laverty December 19, 1858.

Work on the Montgomery county mission continued, with favorable results. Soule, Long, Keller and others labored there, and a number received Christ. A Sabbath-school of forty was organized at Kulpsville, with the intention of organizing a church. Preaching places had increased to ten.

Divisions in Churches occurred occasionally during this period. The Advent Christian Church, in 1855, grew out of a division "over immortality." They believe "the dead sleep in unconscious repose until Christ comes; that immortality is conditioned upon receiving Christ, and that the wicked will utterly perish." The efforts at union sometimes brought results. The United Presbyterian Church of North America was organized in 1858 by a union of the Associate and Associate Reformed Churches. But not all the local churches went into the union, and these formed the Associate Church of North America. The Free Methodists about this time effected a general organization. The ministers and churches of God received encouragement in their contention in favor of the washing of the saints' feet as a symbolical ordinance by learning the fact that in North Carolina and a few other States were churches which held this faith.

Credit is due J. F. Welshampel, whose prolific brain evolved various projects, for the suggestion made in 1853, that the General Eldership of the Church of God be represented in the Washington Monument, at Washington, D. C., by a block of marble with suitable inscription. The suggestion was intended for the General Eldership in 1854; but no action was taken. He had visited Washington in 1853, and saw the Monument, in course of erection, and noticed the marble blocks of various sizes and colors contributed by the different States, Societies, Churches and foreign Governments. The General Eldership having overlooked the matter, Welshampel renewed his suggestion to Mackey, Haileigh and Myers, Speaker and Clerks. He urged them to endorse his plan and urge contributions. He estimated the cost of a block of Pennsylvania marble, four feet long, two feet wide and one foot thick, at $100.00 delivered and ready to be placed in position. He also worded the Inscription, to wit:

"To God be all the Glory! Who raised up Washington, the American Moses, to lead this Nation out of British Bondage. Contributed by the General Eldership of the Church of God in the United States."

As his first appeal elicited no responses, Welshampel repeated it in February, 1855. He also published a "Circular Letter" to the churches, soliciting funds. Mackey on several occasions endorsed the enterprise. Harn strongly commended it; but with his congratulations he insisted that the word "Church" in the Inscription be changed to "Churches," which Welshampel refused. Harn threatened to oppose the project if the change were not made. The stone was to be delivered February 22, 1855, but there were then but $25.00 promised. By the latter part of 1856 work on the Monument was suspended. Interest in the matter of furnishing a block of marble by the Church had vanished. On February 22, 1859, Welshampel was again in Washington, and saw the unfinished shaft. Two hundred blocks were in position, with one hundred in the shed awaiting the progress of the work to be put in their respective places. Welshampel renewed his appeal, insisting that "the General Eldership must be represented," and declaring that he "would raise the money by the meeting of the body in 1860," and would have the "block ready to present to the General Eldership." For the time all was a kaleidoscopic vision. The Monument was completed December 6, 1844, a year and sixteen days after Welshampel had been gathered to the fathers.

Early in this period general activity in behalf of Prohibition continued in the Elderships, the churches of God, The Church Advocate, and by temperance people in the Northern States. Prohibitory laws were enacted, or Constitutions amended, so that the universal triumph of Prohibition appeared at hand. But the tide began to recede, and toward the end of this period Mackey editorially lamented that "not a word is heard on Prohibition," while most of the ground which had been gained was again lost, and Prohibition was pronounced dead.

The question of "healing the sick," according to James v. 14, 15, was somewhat agitated in 1856-7. Winebrenner regarded the texts as "a recognition of that power given to, and exercised by, the Apostles." And "if it was not the design of God to continue this power in the church, why did James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, thus write to the twelve tribes scattered abroad?"

The sentiment against Christians frequenting balls, theaters and like places of amusements was emphatic and general in the Church. The theatrical season was called "Satan's annual festival." No "heart renewed by grace can desire such carnality." The theater "is inconsistent with every Christian principle." To be there was "to be on the devil's ground." These sentiments are expressed on the editorial page, but it is not indicated whether Winebrenner, Mackey or Colder was their author. But Winebrenner did teach that only "mere professors, and not such as possess what they profess, visit these demoralizing places." And, "We hope that God's ministers and people will unite to pray and preach down all these abominations." To call theaters "Synagogues of Satan" was regarded as a happy appropriation of an expressive patronymic.

CHAPTER X.

THE period from 1860 to 1865 is the most momentous in the history of the United States, and at the same time it was a period of tribulation and trials and dissensions, in the Churches in the Northern States. The Church of God did not escape the vexations incident to the slavery controversy and the war for the preservation of the Union. For notwithstanding the radical deliverances of the General Eldership and the Annual Elderships, as well as of religious bodies of other Churches, there was a strong, if subdued, feeling in the North in favor of compromising with this relic of barbarism. For the nation, like another Laocoon, was entering upon the final struggle with the folds of the serpent of slavery, and stood face to face with disunion and death. In many places sentiment was divided, and there was a strong minority which had no sympathy with the anti-slavery propaganda, nor with any effort of a militant character to preserve the integrity of the Union and to eradicate slavery. Mr. Blaine says: "The Winter following the election of Lincoln was filled with deplorable events. In the whole history of the American people there is no epoch which recalls so much that is worthy of regret, and so little that gratifies pride." While Lincoln had an aggregate of 180 electoral votes, as against 123 of his opponents united, yet on the popular vote he received but 1,866,452, wholly from the free States; while, of his opponents, Douglas received 1,295,574; Breckenridge, 850,082, and Bell, 646,124, or a total of 2,787,780. Douglas's vote was mainly from the North. The questions at issue could not be kept out of the Churches. Especially in the border States, southern Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, there was much friction and heated passions. A correspondent at Glen Easton, West Virginia (then Virginia), states that "in this part of the Lord's vineyard the Church has had almost insurmountable trials from two sources, viz.: Sectarianism and slavery. As to the latter, a minister has not the liberty of speaking his mind on it; and as the Church of God is strictly anti-slavery, and known to be such, she meets with many sore trials from without, and I fear from within also." Conditions were not ameliorated to any appreciable extent when the secession of the Southern States became a fact, and the war was actually begun. Pulpits and religious newspapers generally aligned themselves very positively with the Government, and in favor of a relentless prosecution of the war for the suppression of the Rebellion. Spiritual declension followed almost everywhere, and the minds of the people became supremely engrossed with secular and military affairs. The lamentation over the condition of the Churches was quite general. "We have to bewail our leanness and want of spiritual life and vigor. Throughout most portions of the East Pennsylvania Eldership," wrote the Editor, Thomas, "this is most lamentably the case, and the consequence is, if we are not going backward, we are really making but slow progress." As the bloody years of the war dragged along, a large proportion of the men, and many ministers, enlisted in the army, or later were drafted. Of those on record in The Advocate were C. S. Bolton, A. Hollems, G. U. Harn, David Neldig, A. G. McCormick, J. R. Snavey, J. W. Hawkins, J. I. Cramer, A. Wilson, B. Dochterman, E. R. Linsley, F. F. Kiner, J. W. Neeley, D. Keplinger, W. L. Jones, K. D. Aller, J. S. Miller, J. W. Bloyd, J. C. Forncrook, J. M. Mullen, W. Selfriet, D. H. Mumma, S. S. Richmond, G. Sandoe, H. Whitaker, C. S. Wilson, O. J. Farling. There was a consequent insufficiency of preachers, and in some Elderships fields of labor were unsupplied and much of the ground was lying fallow. Church work was greatly hindered and finances were inadequate to do aggressive work. While the ministry was with few exceptions loyal to the Government, and the Elderships experienced little trouble from this source, there were occasional exceptions. Thus in the West Ohio Eldership Elders Dobson and Now came under suspicion of disloyalty during the notorious Vallandigham campaign, and were cited to appear in person and answer to the charges; and "Elder William Hammon, Indiana Eldership, was expelled because, after having enlisted to escape conviction of "flagrant crimes," he "deserted from the army." In some of the Elderships ministers were "examined as to their loyalty to the Government of our country." The brilliant and talented Harn laid down his life on the altar of his country. The house of worship at Chambersburg was laid in ashes with the burning of a great part of the town by General McCausland, July 30, 1864. The human mind is susceptible of most peculiar religious hallucinations. So sacred to many appeared the Union cause, and so of the nature of a religious sacrifice the heroism unto death of the soldiers who fought under the Stars and Stripes, that the question was mooted in many places, whether a loyal soldier killed in the army could be lost, or damned. Was it a case of human sympathy and reason against "the incontrovertible stand-point of the Bible?" The South held its cause to be equally sacred, and was confident that God would "remove far off from you the Northern army" because of the wickedness of its purposes. Religious fervor was intense, and fellowship with Churches in the North was repudiated. In 1861 the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America was organized to emphasize its abhorrent dissent from the Presbyterian Church, North. The only assigned reason for this course was the adoption by the Old School Assembly of a resolution which declared that it is "the duty of Presbyterians to support the Government and preserve the Union." For other reasons about this time there was a small secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church from which the Free Methodist Church was organized, between some of the leaders of which and ministers of the Church of God there was a bond of sympathy. In 1863 the General Synod of the Lutheran Church, South, was formed. And in 1864 the Christian Union Churches organized themselves into a body.

At the beginning of this period, and following, "the seasons of great outpourings of the Spirit of God in 1857-8," "there seemed to be a great drought in revivals." Then came the great revival in Ireland, where about one hundred thousand souls were converted. Gradually the churches in America became infused with more of a revival spirit, and during the Winter of 1860-1 there were some local revivals of much power. The Winters of 1862-3, and 1863-4 were the most fruitful of this period. The depressing effect of the war proved auxiliary to spiritual meditation. With Lincoln, people turned their thoughts toward God as the God of victory, and vowed to do righteousness, that the judgment of truth and peace might be realized. Lincoln, on Sept. 22, 1862, issued his preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, followed on Jan. 1, 1863, with the decree in which he "ordered and declared that all persons held as slaves within said designated States are and henceforth shall be free," and further "declaring and making known, that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the service of the United States." Later the same Winter the President issued a Proclamation, setting apart "a day of national humiliation and prayer," "to confess our national sins, and to pray for clemency and forgiveness." Appeals went out from many burdened hearts to ministers and churches, urging fasting, prayer, confession of sins and agonizing with God for the revival of genuine religion in the hearts of his people and the salvation of the lost. On a limited scale revivals among the churches of God were witnessed over all the territory of the General Eldership, and the waste places were refreshed and began to take on new life. Nearly every circuit and station in all the Elderships reported conversions and ingatherings.

At the time for announcing camp-meetings, in 1860, Thomas lamented the absence of the camp-meeting spirit. But while the churches were slow to move in the matter, fifteen were finally held. Of these eight were in the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership; five in Ohio, one in Illinois and one in Iowa. Only about fifty conversions were reported.

In 1861 Thomas again strongly urged the churches to hold camp-meetings. L. B. Hartman, Ohio, echoed the same sentiments. But the brotherhood was largely indifferent, and as a result but three such meetings were held in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and one in Ohio. The results were disappointing, and but one report was published, stating that "some were converted."

When camp-meetings are held with a view of saving the unconverted and edifying the churches, no amount of persuasion can induce the churches to expend time, labor and means where these results do not follow. The camp-meeting spirit still survived in the hearts of the pioneer preachers, and these, like Thomas, would exhort, and sometimes seek to chide, the churches into this form of Christian endeavor, with indifferent success. In July, 1862, Thomas regreted "exceedingly that the camp-meeting fires are so nearly extinguished among us as a people." The reasons given for this tendency to abandon camp-meetings he called "vain excuses and silly subterfuges," and "vain babbling." "If camp-meetings are out of date and are useless," his reason is, "that vital religion is out of date and has become useless with such objectors." But such reasoning did not prove persuasive, for this year there was only one camp-meeting held in East Pennsylvania, two in West Pennsylvania, one in Iowa, and the Standing Committee appointed three in Ohio, but there was but one reported. The results were so discouraging that but two were written up by the pastors in charge. In 1863 but one camp-meeting was announced, held "on the old camp-ground near Garman-town, Cambria county, Pa." Three ministers were in attendance, and seventeen souls were saved. Woods meetings were to some extent taking the place of camp-meetings. The Standing Committee of the East Ohio Eldership in 1864 appointed a Union Camp-meeting, "to continue ten days, the place to be located by J. S. McKee and L. B. Hartman," Chairman and Clerk of the Committee; but it does not appear that it was held. Plowman held one in Indiana county, Pa., at which there were seven conversions.

But if camp-meetings were gradually dying out as expensive and fruitless means of grace; and while this period was somewhat barren, some permanent results crowned the labors of the ministry and churches. Wertz, as General Missionary in Iowa, organized a church 16 miles north of Davenport, Scott county, with twenty-two members. Kiner organized one at Park school-house. H. Borgner, Feb. 26, 1860, gathered a church of fifteen members in Fishing Creek Valley, Dauphin county, Pa. J. Halfleigh succeeded in forming a church in Albany township, Berks Co., Pa., in 1863. A church was constituted in Ft. Wayne, Ind., June 28, 1861, with S. V. Sterner as pastor. Gillespie succeeded in effecting an organization of nine members on the St. Joseph circuit, Mich., in January, 1861. Small and Bolton about the same time held a successful revival in Union township, Mercer Co., Ohio, and organized a church of twenty-four members. Plowman, a man of good talents, as a missionary and organizer, did some good work in McKean county, Pa., called the "Northern Mission," in the early part of the Summer of 1861, and then came South into Somerset county, where, at Buckstown, "on the Allegheny Mountains," he effected a church organization. On March 20, 1862, the elders of the church at Pleasant Valley, Johnson Co., Iowa, exchanged fraternal letters with the churches at Palestine, Lone Tree and Harrisburg, Iowa, which "have now been fully organized as local churches."

Four important new enterprises were inaugurated in 1863. At Altoona, Blair county, Pa., S. K. Boyer, of the Martinsburg charge, began preaching in private houses, principally in the home of Sister Alloway. In January, 1863, the Armory on Ninth street was rented, in which to hold a protracted meeting. This resulted in the organization of a church of twenty-five members. S. S. Richmond became the first pastor.

Work was also resumed at Carlisle, Cumberland county, Pa., and a church organized in June, 1864, with B. F. Beck as pastor. Dr. George Ross, on Sept. 15, 1863, bought what was known as the "Old Seceder Church," originally built by the "Associated Reformed Presbyterian Church," or the "United Presbyterian Church," for $1,325.00. He expended $600.00 more in necessary repairs. Part of this money was collected, but Dr. Ross paid the most of it himself. On June 5, 1864, the remodeled house was dedicated. A. Swartz officiated in the morning, using I. Tim. iii. 15 for his text; J. Mackey, in the afternoon, and G. Sigler, in the evening. The ground on which this church was built was donated in 1799 by William Penn to the Associated Presbyterian Church, and they built the substantial stone house of worship, 36x46 feet, in the year 1802.

The proposition to start a mission in Philadelphia was canvassed at the Eldership in 1863. Thomas called attention to it in May, 1864, and urged it strongly, stating that "overtures have also been made to one of our most active and efficient preachers to take charge of the mission." At the Eldership in 1864, however, nothing was done; but the enterprise was not abandoned, and plans were being matured so that when the auspicious day should dawn everything would be in readiness.

The most stupendous mission enterprise hitherto conceived and inaugurated was that which A. X. Shoemaker, East Pennsylvania Eldership, suggested when on a preaching tour to Illinois, in the months of September and October, 1863. He visited Chicago, and from there, on October 8th, he wrote: "In this great, central city we have no church organization. The enlarged and almost unparalleled facilities of Chicago struck our mind most forcibly as being the place we should most certainly commence immediate missionary operations." He at once outlined a plan to secure funds, and stated that "if the Church at large, or the Board of Missions, furnished the money, we will find the man." Upon his return East, at the Eldership held at Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa., he brought the matter before that body on Saturday afternoon, October 31st, and before a missionary meeting on the evening of November 2nd. There were objections to the project based on the probable cost and the "deficiency now in efficient laborers for the work already opened." But Shoemaker had already succeeded in securing the endorsement of the Chicago Mission plan by the West Ohio Eldership, which he attended, and which resolved that "as an Eldership, as churches and as individuals we give our influence in favor of opening and sustaining said missionary enterprise by contributing our pro rata share to this laudable undertaking." He was also present at the session of the Illinois Eldership, and chairman of "the Special Committee on the Chicago Mission Project," which declared in favor of "taking steps immediately to establish a mission in Chicago." The East Ohio Eldership had also resolved to "encourage the enterprise with our means, our influence and our prayers." Accordingly the East Pennsylvania Eldership also approved the project, and directed the Board of Missions to "appropriate $300 annually for three years, provided the Board of Missions of the General Eldership conclude to establish said mission," and gave Shoemaker permission "to take personal subscriptions for the Chicago Mission project." Shoemaker was released from serving a charge in the Eldership. He at once began an active canvass for funds. General and deep interest was developed, which seemed prophetic of the financial success of the work. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership approved the project by correspondence and appointed Shoemaker to the Mission, with "an appropriation of $1,000 annually for three years." He reached Chicago with his family on June 20, 1864. Without delay he bought a plot of ground on the corner of Warren and Roby streets, 51x125 feet, for $1,600, and commenced the erection thereon of a bethel and parsonage. The building was completed soon after the holidays, and dedicated March 12, 1865. Shoemaker preached in the morning, and was assisted during the day by R. White, H. W. Conley and J. M. Klein, of Illinois, and D. Gill, of Iowa. The cost of the mission to this date was $8,000, of which $6,000 had been secured.

The ashes of the Chambersburg bethel were scarcely cold, after the destructive conflagration of July 30, 1864, until plans were being perfected by the Board of Incorporation, which owned the property, on Thursday, August 11th, "to rebuild as soon as there is a guarantee that rebel raids are over in that section of the country." The loss was estimated to be "fully $3,000. The lots, foundation and bricks are all that is left of a house which would cost $5,000 to build." As a result of these deliberations "the Board has appointed C. H. Forney, the pastor, to go abroad among the churches and communities to solicit aid for this purpose." In the work thus indicated the pastor visited every church in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, including Maryland and the German Eldership, and also by special invitation the churches in Westmoreland, Fayette, Allegheny, Beaver and Venango counties, West Pennsylvania Eldership, and some of the churches in Wayne, Stark, Wyandot, Richland and Seneca counties, Ohio. On May 11, 1865, a building committee was appointed, consisting of E. H. Thomas, J. Rife and C. H. Forney, "to receive proposals for the rebuilding of said church, and to take the work generally in hand."

In no period of the history of the Church was there such a large amount of money raised and expended for missions and church buildings and parsonages as from 1860 to 1865. In addition to the work at Chicago, at Carlisle, Chambersburg and Philadelphia, more than thirty church buildings were erected. It was an era of inflation. Prices were unusually high, but money was more than abundant. Early in January, 1861, John Snyder, ruling elder in the church known as the "Union Bethel," Indiana, started out through Ohio and into western Pennsylvania to collect funds to rebuild said bethel, destroyed by fire December 2, 1859. S. V. Sterner, pastor, made appeals for help for the church, "poor in this world's goods." A good, brick house was erected, 30x36 feet. A short time before this enterprise was started Mt. Vernon bethel, Indiana, was completed and dedicated. The house of worship built by the church at Milford, La Grange county, Ind., was dedicated January 1, 1865.

The church at Mt. Carroll, Carroll county, Ill., dedicated their "new bethel" on Sunday, April 26, 1863. D. Wertz preached the sermon; David Kyle was pastor. Two miles south of Buda, Bureau county, Ill., on land owned by John Berkstresser, father of W. Irving and Mary, ministers in later years in the Illinois Eldership, the church erected a bethel in the Summer of 1863, which was dedicated October 11th. A. X. Shoemaker preached in the morning, and J. H. Hurley, in the evening. The brethren at Troy Grove, La Salle county, Ill., "principally Germans, full of hospitality and in a good degree liberal," built "a beautiful house of worship" in the Summer of 1864, which was dedicated November 27th. The work was done under the leadership of J. M. Klein, pastor, who secured A. X. Shoemaker to officiate at the dedication.

Incidentally F. F. Kiner, of the Des Moines circuit, Iowa, reported on February 22, 1860, a "third protracted meeting at Bro. C. Landes's, at which time their meeting-house was dedicated. E. Logue preached the dedication sermon."

In Jefferson township, Williams county, Ohio, "the meeting-house built by the church of God" was ready for dedication in February, 1860, but was not dedicated until June 16, 1861. G. W. Wilson officiated. If not a dedication, it was as good an event for the future of the Wooster, Ohio, church, when in the early part of December, 1860, E. H. Thomas and Dr. George Ross, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, went to that city and saved the property, "their valued and beautiful church edifice," from "the Sheriff's hammer." Dr. Ross "stepped forward and at considerable trouble and pecuniary sacrifice rescued the property from the hands of the officers of the law." For some years Wooster church was under the care of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, which supplied it with pastors. On June 9, 1861, G. W. Wilson reported the dedication of the bethel east of Upper Sandusky, Wyandot county, Ohio, as having taken place. The observance of the ordinances "with the rest of the exercises gave the occasion a peculiar pleasantness." Midway between Dalton and West Lebanon, Wayne county, Ohio, W. H. Oliver and S. Lilley, pastors, a new house of worship was dedicated May 23, 1863.

The church at New Brighton, Beaver county, Pa., "worshiped in a room in the private dwelling house of Elder John Tintsman" until in the Winter of 1860, when the trustees, John F. Tintsman, Gottlieb Greib and George M. Nippert, M. D., purchased a house of worship for $850.00." Some $300 additional was spent in making repairs and improvements, aggregating a total cost of $1,100. After the dedication a debt of $750 had to be provided for, and in January, 1862, the pastor, J. A. Plowman, was "appointed our agent to travel through the different Eldership territories to collect moneys to pay off the debt." The dedication is somewhat memorable because of the inability of Winebrenner to preach the sermon, June 3, 1860, on his return trip from the General Eldership at Upper Sandusky, Ohio. E. H. Thomas took his place in the pulpit, assisted by J. Ross and Jesse Kennedy. J. M. Domer was the pastor in 1860. At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, held at Pittsburg, Pa., December 9, 1861, the report of the committee appointed by the Eldership "to solicit subscriptions and purchase the house known as the 'Old Asbury Chapel' in the city of Pittsburg, if they found it practicable" was taken up. This committee, consisting of Hickernell, Domer and Squire Cook, was enlarged by adding Loucks and Wm. Ober. The Standing Committee decided to buy Old Asbury Chapel, for $2,500, paying down $150 in confirmation of sale. The church in Pittsburg then numbered "some seventy members." Old Asbury Chapel was located on Towns-end street, between Colwell and Clark streets. Immediate possession was taken, and under the labors of Hickernell and Mrs. M. J. Beecher a revival followed and a church of seventy members was organized. The meeting-house known as Center Bethel, in East Huntingdon township, Westmoreland county, Pa., was built under the labors of P. Loucks and J. M. Domer, pastors, and was dedicated December 27, 1863. E. H. Thomas, of Lancaster, Pa., and A. X. Shoemaker, of Harrisburg, Pa., did the preaching. June 26, 1864, "the new bethel at Carrolltown, Cambria county, Pa., was dedicated and a church was organized, under the labors of J. A. Plowman. J. Hickernell and Martha J. Beecher officiated at the dedication. The three ordinances were observed during the day and evening.

Coming East of the Alleghenies where, as reported November 15, 1860, by J. C. Owens, Uniontown, Md., "our dedication meeting at Pleasant Ridge continued about ten days, during which time we had some precious seasons of reviving grace." "The bethel is located in a thickly settled country." December 25, 1859, "the new bethel at Siddonstown (Mt. Pleasant), York county, Pa., was dedicated to the worship of God." J. Mackey and J. Keller did the preaching. At New Grenada, Fulton county, Pa., the Building Committee, J. G. Cunningham and K. A. Moore, requested, on February 16, 1860, "the teaching elders, and all others interested, who have not forwarded their autographs for deposit in the corner-stone of the bethel under course of construction, to do so as soon as practicable. Remittances thankfully received." The house was dedicated November 25, 1860. The services were conducted by Simon Fleegal, "assisted by the Indian Preacher" (P. D. Collins). At Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., after "preaching in the old bethel on Saturday evening," the dedicatory services were held in the new bethel on Sunday, August 12, 1860. The house cost $1,800. W. G. Coulter was the pastor, and for the dedication he secured the services of Thomas, Mackey, Lavery and Snyder. The dedication of the bethel at Wornleysburg, Cumberland county, Pa., took place on November 11, 1860, with preaching by James Mackey, J. C. Owens and H. L. Soule. A. X. Shoemaker served the church as pastor in connection with Harrisburg. In Shaeffer's Valley, Perry county, Pa., "the brethren of the churches of God completed their new house of worship and had it ready for dedication December 30, 1860." Saturday evening Wm. Johnson "preached an appropriate discourse." Sabbath morning and evening E. H. Thomas preached. J. C. Seabrooks was the pastor, and he had secured the services of J. B. Soule to lead the singing. Thomas mentioned him as "worthy of all commendation, both for the cultivation of his own musical gifts, and for the deep interest he has always manifested in its cultivation in the churches." A "Union house," in which the church had an interest, was dedicated at Union Deposit, Dauphin county, Pa., July 27, 1862, by J. Keller and Miles, of the denomination which owned the other share in the property. P. D. Collins was the pastor. For sundry reasons the mission work at Altoona, Blair county, Pa., was hindered and crippled from 1860 to 1863; but early in the latter year some of the brethren began collecting funds, bought a lot and paid for it, and began in July to build the foundation. By the latter part of December the building was completed, and on January 17, 1864, it was "dedicated to the worship of God." E. H. Thomas, with the pastor, S. S. Richmond, conducted the services. Thomas regarded Altoona "to us as a Church a point of considerable importance, as it is the connecting link between the East and West Pennsylvania Elderships." Partly for this reason Hickernell and Domer, of the latter Eldership, were expected at the dedication. At Palmyra, Lebanon county, Pa., 15 miles east of Harrisburg, a "two days' meeting" was held by I. Brady and S. Crawford, August 29, 1863, at which arrangements were to be made to build a bethel. On October 22nd they bought a lot, and on Saturday, October 24th, the corner-stone was laid by Thomas. By February 18, 1864, the house was finished, and on March 13th, the dedicatory services were held. Thomas and George S. Petry did the preaching, with the pastor, I. Brady, also present. The house was built of brick, 34x46 feet, and lot and building cost $1,800, of which Dr. Ross paid about one-third. He was the most liberal and efficient layman of those years.

The Bill in equity which was filed in the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin county, Pa., the Hon. John J. Pearson, President Judge, against James Colder et al., April 11, 1859, praying for "a writ of injunction . . . commanding the said

James Colder that he absolutely desist and refrain from preaching, teaching, or in any manner officiating as pastor or minister in the said church edifice or bethel on Fourth street," was made "returnable the 2nd day of May next, and the Court fixes the 10th day of May next as the time for the appearance of the defendants to show cause why the preliminary injunction should not be granted as prayed in the Bill." On August 3, 1861, the Opinion of the Court was delivered, in which the contention of Colder et al., was overruled, to wit: that said Fourth Street Church having "been incorporated by Act of the Legislature was thereby granted the specific powers to sever its connection with, and make it independent of, the General or the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God in the United States." The Court therefore made "a decree dispossessing and removing these trustees, or elders, as prayed for in the Bill, and ordering and directing the election of new elders by the qualified members of the congregation." The Court also decreed "the restraining and perpetually enjoining James Colder from preaching, teaching, or in any wise officiating as pastor or minister in the church edifice of the church of God at Harrisburg." The Court said further: "We must also enjoin the defendants and this congregation from appointing any pastor to officiate in said church building who is not in regular standing and in full communion with the East Pennsylvania Eldership and Church of God in North America, regularly licensed thereby, and appointed as a pastor within the church of God at Harrisburg, according to the rules, principles, practices and usages of the General and East Pennsylvania Eldership." The Court declined to order "the defendants to render an account of any funds received by them." Also, the Court refused "to enjoin" the church "to receive the pastor attempted to be placed over them by the East Pennsylvania Eldership." This was a fatal weakness in the decree of the Court, and was so recognized in these words: "We are well aware that the effect of this decision is to close the church building against the whole congregation, as well the friends as the enemies of the present incumbent and the appointee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and thus render it a useless structure as to all." The decision was unsatisfactory to either party, and accordingly each appealed to the Supreme Court of the State. At the June term of said Court Chief Justice W. B. Lowrie handed down an Opinion and Decree, in which, as Thomas said, "The errors of the lower Court have been corrected, and the great principles for which we contended are fully confirmed and established." But neither Opinion required Colder and his adherents to "account for the large accumulation of debt upon the property, and show how certain lots and pieces of ground have been disposed of by them during the period of their illegal administration of the affairs of the church." The ownership of the church property having thus been determined "in favor of those members of the church adhering to the Eldership, and all the preliminary steps ordered by the Court having been taken," arrangements were made to rededicate the house to the worship of God on Sabbath, September 7, 1862. This reopening was rather more of a jubilation than a dedication. For nearly four years the Eldership and church were kept out of their own. After four years of contention, of deprivations, of trials, of patient waiting, as the doors of the bethel on Fourth street again swung open to admit the loyal pastor and his little flock, they gathered to have a devout celebration of the victory secured. For three years and six months Shoemaker had been excluded from the pulpit he was to occupy that delightful September morning. He "delivered a very interesting sermon on the character, obligations and responsibilities of the Christian ministry." The churches at Mechanicsburg, Middletown, Shiremanstown, Camp Hill and Lancaster were represented, with the choirs of the first two churches. Ministers present besides the pastor were W. McFadden, A. Swartz, D. A. L. Lavery, S. Crawford, J. T. Bender, C. H. Forney, J. S. Stamm, B. Mateer, D. R. Rockafellow and E. H. Thomas. The latter preached the evening sermon.

On this day of triumph and congratulations no one could forget that "the venerable Winebrenner was not there as at the first dedication." And Isaac Steese, whose name was joined with that of Winebrenner in the Bill in Equity, and as one of the Appellants and Appellees in the Supreme Court. Indeed this was a period rich in death's harvest. In the middle of March, 1860, Wm. Clay, licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1849, died at Homer, La Salle county, Ill. He "was a young man of genius." On March 26, 1860, Christian T. Forney, Dauphin county, Pa., "through the inscrutable providence of God" ended his useful career, at the age of 53 years, 6 months and 14 days; "a man of sterling worth, unflinching integrity and unmistakable piety, whose preaching, both in English and German, was very acceptable." On September 17, 1861, James F. Machlin ended his labors in the militant church. "He was a very useful man in his Master's cause, and had a great influence in his own neighborhood." John S. Hostetter, Mechanicsburg, Pa., died on May 6, 1862. He had for some time been a licensed minister, but was an efficient, well qualified school teacher, and for several years publisher and editor of a monthly paper for boys and girls called, "I Will Try," which he "conducted with marked ability." The "painful and melancholy duty to record the sudden and unexpected death of our venerable and beloved brother in Christ, Elder Jacob Flake" rested on Thomas, February 12, 1863, he having died on the 7th. He was licensed in 1834, and was a man universally beloved. His "style of preaching was easy, pleasant and affectionate; very plain and simple." March 26, 1863, Elder Joseph Ross, Middletown, Pa., in the fullest confidence "of getting to the kingdom of heaven," ended a very useful life, with the words on his lips: "Jesus is my friend, and I would rather be absent from the body, and present with the Lord." Ross was a merchant, but did a great deal of preaching, and was a man who enjoyed the esteem and confidence of all who knew him. On February 22, 1863, Elder Joseph Brenneman, one of Winebrenner's early converts, departed to a better country, at Springville, Lancaster county, Pa. He was a man "whose Christian virtues illumined the entire circle in which he moved." At Lancaster, Pa., September 2, 1863, Elder Samuel Crawford ended his eminently useful career, aged 68 years. "His preaching was plain, pointed, practical and pre-eminently evangelical." In addition to Harn, David Neidig sacrificed his life on the altar of his country, as did Joseph Ross Snavelly. The former died at Memphis, Tenn., July 3, 1863; the latter, with shattered health, returned to die at his mother's home, Johnson county, Iowa. Neidig was licensed by the Ohio Eldership in 1844, and preached principally in western Ohio and Indiana. Snavelly was a member of the Iowa Eldership, licensed in 1859. At Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Pa., March 20, 1864, Elder William Hinney closed "a long and useful life." He was mainly a local minister, one of the oldest members of the Eldership. January 30, 1864, the life-long, personal friend and associate of Winebrenner, and also one of the Plaintiffs in the suit against James Colder et al., William McFadden, "fell asleep in Jesus." He was aged 57 years, 8 months and 27 days. A man of rare physical courage, a warm and affectionate temperament, a well-balanced but untrained intellect, gifted in song and speech, he braved dangers, wrought mightily for God, conquered obstacles and always cultivated a spirit "of industry and earnestness which evinced the sincerity of his heart." In the outside world brilliant stars were eclipsed by death. On June 3, 1861, Stephen A. Douglas, member of Congress, United States Senator, three times candidate for the Presidency, in 1860 against Lincoln, ended his illustrious career. The English poetess, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, died in 1861. December 24, 1863, died the lecturer, poet and novelist, William M. Thackeray. His was a successful literary career. The author of "The House of the Seven Gables," Nathaniel Hawthorne, died May 19, 1864.

If all internecine strifes and contentions are supposed to be at least adjourned when the gates of the Temple of Janus are open, this was not verified among the ministers and churches of God during the Civil War. While there was war without, there were not only fears, but contentions almost incessantly, within. Whence come these "wars and fightings among you?" asks James. Origins are sometimes difficult to trace. Perhaps the departure of the great leader and arbiter of doctrine gave new license to the spirit of contention. Possibly the slumbering jealousies and schemes of ambitious aspirants to leadership had been restrained, as the second-rate heroes of ancient days postponed their contest for the armor of Achilles until the last honors had been paid to the memory of the illustrious departed. A score or more trials of strength in debate, written or oral, engrossed attention between 1860 and 1865. One of these was transmitted from the former period. This was the question, of an almost purely academic character, of the best translation in the Scriptures of ekklesia, which the General Eldership declined to discuss, but relegated it to The Advocate. Harn contended that the word "church" as a translation should be exchanged for "congregation." But he was not in haste to open the debate, and so Thomas, after "a little fireside controversy with Bro. Harn" at Wooster, virtually challenged Harn to submit his arguments, facetiously remarking that "we think our arguments are unanswered, and we refer to this little incident merely to call out our brother, if he sees proper, in the columns of The Advocate, in defense, not of a new translation, but of that particular word—"congregation." Harn was, however, in no mood for precipitate action. He waited from July, 1859, to January, 1860, before he took up the gauntlet. In six consecutive issues of the paper he set forth his views with unusual clearness and force, maintaining that "'church' is a very dark, unfair and equivocal translation of ekkleesia." He would prefer transliteration of the word rather than the authorized translation. He insisted that this "equivocal character of the word 'church' was the potent motive for James I. to demand its retention by his translators, and to forbid them rendering ekkleesia in the New Testament by 'congregation,' as they had done in the Old." Indeed the use and translation of ekkleesia in the Old Testament was the keystone of his argument. Thomas made an elaborate reply to Harn's arguments, and with that perspicuity of statement peculiar to his style vigorously defended the retention of "the word 'church' in our common version as the better translation of ekkleesia, according to our usages of these words."

Infant Depravity and Infant Regeneration, not wholly speculative doctrines, were brought under argumentative review by A. Swartz, as against Dr. C. P. Wing, of the Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa. The latter had published a pamphlet on "The Relation of Baptized Children to the Church." In analysis Swartz had no superiors in his day, and in a most trenchant series of articles he maintained the position that infants are depraved, and that they must be regenerated, which does not take place at their so-called baptism, which Wing taught is "the only door of admission into the visible church which the New Testament, or our Directory for Worship recognizes."

Of more direct and vital interest to the Church of God was the kindred subject of "total depravity." Elder C. Now brought this subject forward by a question addressed to the Editor: "Does the Bible teach the commonly taught doctrine of total depravity?" Thomas answered briefly, that "If the brother means by the commonly taught doctrine of depravity the doctrine taught by the Church in all ages on that subject, my conviction is that it does. That is, that depravity is both universal and total." Winebrenner gave "the faith of the Church of God" on this subject in these words: "She believes in the fall and depravity of man." Long, Soule, Bolton and others were drawn into this discussion, some contending that depravity is natural, universal and total; others in more or less modified forms denying each of these three predicates.

About the first open tendency to discontinue the Itinerancy was revealed in the action of the Iowa Eldership in 1859, "establishing the congregational system." And while this action was rescinded in 1860, and the Eldership resolved to "resume our former and established plan;" yet in the minds of men like Thomas even this movement created anxiety. He was the persistent, inveterate and unyielding opponent of the congregational system. He accordingly took up and discussed "The Itinerancy" in The Advocate, August 30, 1860. H. L. Soule replied to Thomas, and the discussion continued for nearly six months. Personalities marked this discussion; but this was habitual. Thomas had the Elderships and the brotherhood with him.

The first oral debate transpired in "the beautiful grove of S. K. Moyer," at Auburn, Schuylkill county, Pa., June 28, 1860, on "The Ordinance of Feet-washing," between Rev. M. Stetzel, of the Evangelical Association, and Elder J. K. Moyer, of the Church of God. Stetzel was one of those disputants which are disposed to vaunt and overvalue what they are, and so he entered the arena of debate "boasting that he had vanquished an advocate of Feet-washing in Lebanon county." Moyer was a man of limited acquirements; but he was of that strong stalwart, positive, self-reliant type of character then so often seen among the Pennsylvania Germans. He was a "farmer divine," while Stetzel made a profession of scholarship. "Each disputant spoke three times, three-quarters of an hour at a time." Both sides claimed the victory.

June 5, 1861, at 10 a. m., began a debate which was long remembered, at Old Harmony, Butler county, Pa., between G. U. Harn, of the Church of God, and Rev. D. P. Mitchell, of Johnstown, Pa. Harn affirmed that "Immersion is the only action called baptism in the Bible." Mitchell affirmed that "Infant children are Scriptural subjects of baptism."

A practical question arose at this time, and was discussed for more than a year, touching the publication of the Journals of the Elderships in The Advocate. It was proposed either to exclude them altogether, or to publish abridgements. As always, there were many readers of the paper sufficiently interested in the Journals to desire them published in full. The bond of personal union was then much stronger by reason of personal acquaintance of ministers and lay members over the whole territory. In place of the uniform practice up to this time it was proposed to publish all the Journals separately at The Advocate office, or to publish them annually all together in uniform volumes. The old style prevailed.

By this time, too, opposition to the mourners' bench began to manifest itself. Apparently ministers were in the lead in this opposition, and were warned by others to "take heed how they interfere with such things." "Let the sinner believe while we preach," was their plea. Conviction, penitence and prayer for pardon were to be ignored. Opposers were characterized as lacking religion themselves. "Moderation" was severe on advocates of the easier way. J. Myers declared that "the mourners' bench system is unscriptural." This was the main argument. J. F. Weishampel discussed the question quite fully, defending the mourners' bench as essentially scriptural. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this discussion was the reproduction in The Advocate of a brief article addressed to the editor of the "Lutheran Observer," and the editor's reply. The article quoted from another one in the same paper a paragraph on "Inquiry meetings," in which it is suggested that these meetings be "held either in the lecture room, the pastor's study or at the residence of the convicted ones," and that "without any theatrical or startling expedient, without recourse to 'mourners' seats' or 'anxious benches,' or any such human devices." The editor approves giving advice and "instruction to awakened sinners;" but he does not see "why the pastor's study, or a private house should be deemed a more appropriate place for the performance of such a duty than the house of God; or why the one should be approved as right, and the other proscribed as a 'human device.'" And he thought "it as scriptural to do so in the house of God at the front seats as in the pastor's study, or at private houses." Evidently a modification of the highly exciting services at revivals was felt to be desirable, and hence Geo. Sigler later followed the more clearly antagonistic views before expressed with an article on "Abuses of the Mourners' Bench System."

In the Spring of 1861, G. W. Wilson, of the Ohio Eldership, had a debate with Rev. Butler, Adventist, Gilboa, Ohio, on the Seventh-day Sabbath. It became largely a wrangle about the word "Sabbatoon," and Wilson's opponent lost his temper, and converted an honorable debate into sheer logomachy.

The soul-sleeping heresy in 1861 began to secure converts in some of the western churches, and found several ministers of the Church in quiet sympathy with it. It was not openly defended or advocated by them, but to reclaim them and to fortify the churches against its inroads, the doctrine was vigorously attacked by R. H. Bolton, Thomas and others. Bolton reproduced Alexander Campbell's exhaustive arguments on the subject. It was a doctrine which had survived as a residuum after the second Advent excitement.

The ministry of the Church was always Arminian in theology. While very few had studied systematic theology, they read Arminianism in their Bibles. Calvinism they abhorred. Hence, when in 1861-2, "judging from sermons lately preached, some of our brethren have been unsuspectingly inveigled into the turbulent meshes of the long-exploded dogma of Calvinism," it created more than interest. It surprised, pained, irritated, almost horrified many of the ministry and churches. The applause Calvinistic Presbyterians gave such ministers as ventured to teach Calvinistic dogmas vexed and mortified. These preachers, very few in number, labeled the doctrine "Bibleism;" but that did not make it more palatable. They were challenged to "come out in The Advocate with this new-fangled ism, and let us look at it." "Bobeshala," who thus threw down the gauntlet, aimed his weapon at "East Ohio Preachers," and was answered by "Montgomery," who defended what he "preached on Monday night at the Eldership." He preached, "first, that man must be born again." "Second, that man is born but twice, once into the natural world, and but once spiritually." As many another shallow reasoner, there is where he tripped on an analogy, and there is where he was "ensnared by the bewitching enchantment of the goddess" of error. The discussion hinged principally on "the can't fall doctrine." It was participated in by Thomas, the Editor, who uncovered and revealed this "Bibleism" as "the Calvinistic doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints," with all its logical implications. These five editorials for the time silenced the advocates of "unconditional perseverance." An unusual addendum to this discussion followed in October, 1864, when B. F. Beck preached the Opening Sermon at the East Pennsylvania Eldership on the theme, "The Saints' Perseverance," which was soundly Calvinistic. Thomas as a watchful guardian of the theology of the Church at once denounced the doctrine thus preached by a representative of the Eldership, and in caustic terms upbraided the course of the preacher.

On November 8 and 9, 1860, L. B. Hartman, of the East Ohio Eldership, and A. B. Way, of the "Disciple" Church, debated the proposition affirmed by Hartman, that "the washing of the saints' feet, as practiced and enjoined by Christ, is a positive ordinance in the church of God, and devolving upon all Christians." "The debate passed off very pleasantly between all parties," says J. S. McKee; although Hartman called some of Way's arguments "trash and diction concerning our Savior," and "is profanation and open blasphemy, and needed no reply." After a lapse of two years, on August 5, 1862, Hartman had another debate, with J. J. Excell, of the Reformed Church, when the proposition affirmed by him was thus stated: "Is feet-washing an ordinance of the church of Christ, instituted by him, observed by the Apostles as such, and as equally binding upon us as an ordinance as the Lord's Supper and Baptism are?"

For some inscrutable reason almost simultaneously with these debates on feet-washing the question of the private observance of the ordinance became mooted among ministers and churches. The open discussion of this question was started by J. H. Hurley, Illinois Eldership, who asked, and answered in the negative, the question, "Did Christ ever intend it as an ordinance to be observed in the presence of the world?" He conceded that "here I probably differ from nearly all my brethren." Long, Hartman, Bolton and Mackey wrote strongly, the latter rather sadly, against Hurley's position; "Alpha" alone came to Hurley's defense, while Thomas took for him the very unusual course of indifference, believing that the place, time and circumstances were not essential. He rather seemed to think with Fichte, that "there is always harm in placing accidentals on a level with essentials."

For many years churches and ministers were super-sensitive on the question of a Creed. Ministers of other bodies were accustomed to listen with incredulity to their vehement onslaughts on these symbols, and then would refer them to Winebrenner's "View of the Formation, Government and Discipline of the Church of God," and his statement of "The Faith and Practice of the Church of God," in which there are twenty-seven Articles of Faith. For this reason it was impossible to induce the General Eldership to republish the "View of the Church," or to reproduce in separate form "The Faith and Practice of the Church of God." It would be a grave inconsistency, and so these publications were condemned rather than commended. To send forth authorized editions would look like organized hypocrisy, and so also their original publication was deplored. But by 1860 to 1866 broader views began to prevail, and many read with some satisfaction H. L. Soule's plea for some formal statement of what the Church believes. Thomas, while antagonizing Soule, declared, "Give us Winebrenner by authority." Not so a majority up to this time. Yet at the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1862 a resolution was adopted instructing the delegates to the General Eldership in 1863 to urge upon said body the propriety of writing out and publishing in some form a statement of the things more commonly believed by the Church of God. This resolution was discussed in a series of four articles in The Advocate, by C. H. Forney, in the Spring of 1863, in which he strongly pressed the propriety of publishing what he called a "Doctrinal Compendium." Levi Kauffman and others endorsed and approved the views set forth, while no opposition was manifested.

The right of women to be ordained to the ministry received some attention at this time, as it had earlier, but was not regularly discussed in The Advocate. The occasion was the reception of Mrs. M. J. Beecher into the West Pennsylvania Eldership as "a coworker in the gospel" and "recommending her to all with whom she may labor in word and doctrine," and the reputation she gained by her preaching in Pittsburg and other large towns. She, however, took the offensive on the subject more to meet private criticism than open antagonism. About the same time a Miss Johnson was licensed by the Michigan Eldership, and the Indiana Eldership licensed Mrs. Elizabeth McColley. Mrs. Beecher while co-pastor in Pittsburg in 1864 made a tour among the churches in her Eldership and delivered a "Lecture on Female Preaching." "Tickets of admission 25 cents, and all moneys collected will be applied to paying the debt yet remaining on the Pittsburg bethel." Thomas seemed disposed to discountenance any thing that "may be said against Sister Beecher's preaching, or of females as a class preaching. As long as God makes her useful in the good work, we feel with our whole heart to say amen."

In stating the Faith of the Church Winebrenner said: "She believes in the immortality of the soul." In 1864 there was a more active effort to inculcate contrary views on this subject. "Men of talent and learning," said Thomas; "men of great research," were connected with this propagandism. Hence, "some of our own brethren are in danger of yielding to, if not embracing, the error above alluded to." In a series of five editorials he submitted proofs and arguments that "man is immortal as to his spiritual nature." What did he mean by this? "We use the term 'immortal' in its usual acceptation; that is, perpetuity of existence; indestructible." On this he did find that "some of our brethren had already embraced the error he combated." That the soul is conditionally immortal; that there is good ground for accepting annihilation as to the finally impenitent—these were tenets a few ministers had accepted, and were now defending as against Thomas.

Nothing seemed capable of suppressing or dissuading the advocates of a change in Eldership titles. If beaten to-day, they were ready to resume the battle to-morrow. Apparently victorious one year, they lost their vantage ground the next. At annual Elderships and in The Advocate the discussion was resumed at different times between 1861 and 1863, and later. The most exhaustive and prolonged discussion of this subject was conducted by Harn, Swartz, Thomas and Forney, the last two on one side and the first two on the other side. In 1862 seven of the ten Annual Elderships changed their titles, and adopted "churches of God," leaving but three which adhered to this "old landmark." In 1864 the discussion was again resumed, participated in by Weishampel, Hartman, Thomas, Forney, Swartz and Bolton. Possibly as a result of this review of the whole question there was a remarkable change in the Annual Elderships, and so a reversal of majorities. They now stood eight for the singular, Eldership of the Church of God, and three for the plural.

April 21, 1864, "the elders and brethren of the church of God at Lancaster, Pa.," announced "a general convocation of the saints on Witsuntide," to which they invited the "ministerial brethren and the brethren and sisters in general" throughout the Eldership. They expressed the hope that "the ministers will close their houses and come, bringing with them as many of their flocks as they can." The Church had in its earlier years paid little heed to holidays, remembering their origin. It was hence rather an innovation to seek to have "a general convocation on this Church festival day, commemorating the descent of the Holy Spirit. The idea wholly originated with the Lancaster church, but it was endorsed by Thomas, who said: "The idea to inaugurate such a meeting to be perpetuated from year to year, changing the place of holding it, is certainly a good one." One object of the proposed meeting was to cultivate the spirit of fellowship and brotherhood. The meeting was to begin on Saturday and close on Monday evening. It had no specific name, but was announced as "An Old-fashioned Meeting." Thomas compared the meeting to annual gatherings of "the Dunkards, the Quakers and some other religious bodies," and represented "the annual convocation of the brotherhood of the Church of God throughout the United States as certainly a grand and glorious one in conception." In reporting the meeting he for the first time called it "the Pentecost Meeting," and by this name these gatherings were thereafter known. In attendance from outside of Lancaster there was disappointment; yet so much was the church encouraged that the belief was expressed that "thus was inaugurated what we have no doubt will become a permanent institution in the Church of God, an annual Pentecostal Festival." It was suggested that "all the Elderships of the Church of God in North America" will adopt "the great yearly feast begun at Lancaster." And Thomas was so exultant over it that he wrote: "We prophesy that in after years the record of the introduction of the Pentecostal Festival will be viewed as one of the brightest pages of the Church's history!" In the Fall of 1864 the Eldership took charge of the Pentecostal Meeting, fixing the time and place. Other Elderships soon followed, until nearly all had their annual gatherings of this character.

CHAPTER XI.

JOHN WINEBRENNER—HIS CHARACTER AND WORKS.

JOHN WINEBRENNER was born March 25, 1797; died September 12, 1860. He was ordained September 24, 1820, and preached his first sermon as pastor of Salem Reformed church, Harrisburg, Pa., October 22, 1820. From this date to the date of his death he was a citizen of Harrisburg. From the date of the organization of the Eldership of the Church of God, by which act a new body of people was formed, for thirty years he stood in the calcium light before the world as did no other minister of the Church of God. Thus the psychological observer of human character has been able to see the man as he really was in the varied relations of minister of the gospel, preacher, evangelist, author, leader in a great reformation, citizen and business man, and to discern the real type and quality of the man in more legible lines as he has followed the relation of the conspicuous acts of his life than he could in any biography which might be written. Yet biography has its eminent mission; and this work were incomplete without a monograph of this character. Biography itself is a species of history peculiarly interesting and useful. Few pages of the Volume of Inspiration are better calculated for our learning than those which delineate character to the very life, the writers fearing no displeasure, concealing no imperfections, sparing no censures. None the less do they prove their wisdom and prudence than they thus give evidence of their impartiality. They knew not the art of flattery. Against the flatterer there is always the general outcry voiced by Sir Richard Steele, but perhaps not with his reason, that is, "that there are so very few good ones." In writing the Character and Works of Winebrenner no fair-spoken words of the charmer, no over-wrought eulogium of the servile courtier, are needed in order to paint a portrait that will challenge admiration. When the time came in the dispensation of a wise providence to speak the man's real worth many were ready to elevate him to the position and relation he had richly earned.

His life was short. Thirty years had run their course from the formation of an independent religious body of which he was the authoritative head to the day when he was called to a higher sphere of divine ministry. Most men restrain their thoughts as they contemplate the brief span of human life. Inspiration has so chastened our spirits that the believer needs no erudite theodicy to inspire him to sing with Lowell:

"All is of God!
Angels of life and death alike are His;
Without His leave they pass no threshold o'er;
Who then would wish or dare, believing this,
Against His messengers to shut the door?"

Theophrastus, naturalist and philosopher, may "think it extremely hard to die at ninety, and to go out of the world when he had just learned to live in it." Or Aristotle, his predecessor as teacher in the Lyceum, may find "fault with nature for treating man in this respect worse than several other animals." But not so thought the greater philosopher, Paul. Nor the sainted and immortal Winebrenner. They would have answered, that to think such thoughts is to presume that the system of the universe would have been more wisely contrived if creatures of our low rank among intellectual natures had been called to the councils of the Most High; or, that the Creator ought to mend his work by the advice of his creatures.

Winebrenner did not come to his early end without premonitions. Those who heard him preach in the Winter of 1858-9 knew that the foundations of the house made with hands were undermined. He was passing through an ordeal from 1858 to 1860 which many knew he was not likely to survive, so that his death on September 12, 1860, was not the unexpected lowering to half-mast at midnight of "the flag which had floated so proudly at the mast head" in the morning, as in the case of Lincoln, the martyr. In the Autumn of 1859, at the session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, he was attacked "with a new and alarming disease, which resulted in a protracted illness, from which he only measurably recovered, in answer to the united prayers of God's people." Remarks he addressed to Thomas, Richmond, Snyder and Shoemaker as they were leaving him during this illness reveal much of the spiritual character of the man: "Brethren, don't forget to remember me in your prayers. I don't know what the Lord is going to do with me. If he raises me up, I intend to spend the residue of my days in the ministry. I have nothing in view but the interest of the cause, and it is the one thing for which I live. I have had great pleasure in preaching the gospel. Brethren, 'preach the word;' make full proof of your ministry. I have committed my little all into the hands of the Lord; he will make the necessary provision and arrange all things according to his pleasure." But while his life was spared, he never fully recovered. Though somewhat weak and emaciated, he attended the General Eldership at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, May 28, 1860, where, on Sabbath morning he preached his last sermon. Of this sermon and the preacher, R. H. Bolton wrote, June 31, 1860, as follows: He "favored us with a solemn, plain, systematic, sympathetic, soul-melting and most evangelical sermon. His text was Jer. xxxi. 18-20. Theme—'God's Compassion to the True Penitent.' He possesses in a high degree natural and easy eloquence, and for plainness and comprehensiveness of speech I never heard him surpassed. For fervor and pathos when reading the hymn, prayer and sermon, I never heard him equalled. The sermon was full of life and power, and moved the audience as if electrified by a discharge from heaven's battery, and loud 'Amens,' 'Glory to God,' etc., went up from many present. I acknowledge that the character and conduct of true penitents, and God's great compassion and mercy for them, were clearer and plainer revealed to me than I ever heard." On his way home from the General Eldership, in company with Thomas, Dr. Ross and Kennedy, he stopped off at New Brighton, Beaver county, Pa., to fulfill a previous engagement to preach the dedicatory sermon of the new house of worship, on June 3rd. But he was suddenly taken sick on Saturday, and "was not able to be out of bed from Saturday afternoon until Monday forenoon." "He returned home in a very enfeebled state of health." "On the morning of July 3rd, on retiring from the breakfast table, without eating a bite, he fainted, and was quickly borne by his wife and son, John A., to the sofa in the parlor, fearing he was in the agonies of death. But in a few minutes he sufficiently revived to retire to his room, only to be borne back to the same place on the morning of September 12th, by the hands of Elder Wm. McFadden and myself [A. X. Shoemaker], after the spirit of the reformer, the evangelist, the husband, the father, the brother had fled." He died at No. 262 North street, Harrisburg, Pa. A few weeks before his death he answered a question touching his past life and ministry in these words: "There are things in my life which I have to regret; but, upon the whole, I have lived with a conscience void of offense toward God and man. And if I had my life to live over again, I do not know that I would change it in any particular, except some little things in which I may have erred in judgment. I have never felt free to waste my time and talents, and sometimes I have thought I taxed my mind more than my body was able to bear. None of my troubles through life at any time disturbed my sleep, or destroyed my appetite. I have not been without my temptations to ease and comfort; but I have withstood them all, and find it is the best to go without the gates and wage war against the devil. And the great comfort of my life is to know, feeble as the effort has been, God has blest it." Within half an hour before the spirit took its departure he spoke touchingly of his family and children, and then of "friendship," exclaiming: "Oh, how much I appreciate friendship!" Being assured that he had very many friends, he replied: "Yes, and I have many, many enemies, and false brethren;" and then added his final message: "In the event I depart, preach Jesus. O, the glory of preaching Jesus! I have never seen the necessity of preaching Jesus in the days of health as I have seen it since I have been sick. Preach Jesus in the days of your health. Tell the brethren to stick together!" Release had come! The final battle had been fought! He had paid the debt of nature! On Friday, September 14th, the funeral services were held in the Methodist church, on Locust street, the bethel for whose erection he had spent many anxious days being in possession of the opposition. E. H. Thomas preached a very appropriate sermon, from Heb. xi. 4. Addresses were also delivered by James Mackey, Joseph Ross and A. X. Shoemaker. The choirs of the churches at Mechanicsburg and Middletown did the singing. "It was a most solemn, feeling and weeping time."

The last resting place of the remains of this truly great man is near the intersection of Poplar and East avenues, in the beautiful necropolis north of the corner of State and Thirteenth streets, Harrisburg, Pa. A monument was erected over his grave on September 23, 1868, with the contributions of churches and friends. It is of hexagonal form, thirteen feet high, and surmounted with an urn entwined with a wreath of oak leaves. On one of the tablets is this inscription:

"Erected by the Church of God to the memory of John Winebrenner, born in Frederick county, Md., March 25, 1797, Died in Harrisburg, Pa., September 12, 1860." On another tablet is the following:

"An able minister of the New Testament—earnest and signally blest, in his efforts to save his fellow men. He has perpetuated his own memory, not on tables of stone, but on fleshy tables of the heart: 'They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever.' A successful reformer, he labored to build up the Church of God, she having one name, one faith, one baptism and one mission. This: To gather together in one all the children of God that are scattered abroad."

Winebrenner had his critics; he also had his cynical detractors. He had his faults, as he was human. But it clearly is less than charitable to accept his own view of these as "errors in judgment." For criticism there is always room; for detraction and defamation there is no apology. Some scars he bore were those of wounds received in the house of his friends. He had a constitutional weakness which led him to see future things in too large proportions. He was often too sanguine as to the efficiency of means to reach results. He was not so much a chimerical theorist, or lacked in practicalness and want of prevision; but his executive powers were disproportioned to his faith in results. Hence, some of his enterprises may seem utopian. In the light of experience this seems true of the constant hope he held out of the money-making power of The Gospel Publisher, through which relatively so much was lost. Also in the Texas Mission project he so earnestly advocated, and which in the end created such bitter antagonism. Or the incipient Nebraska Mission. Or even the more unfortunate morus multicaulis dream. But who that has had his heart aflame in behalf of the Church and the kingdom of Christ as Winebrenner had is in a position to cast the first stone? He who does things makes mistakes. Yet through these errors of judgment, and the busy tongue of "Sir Benjamin Backbite," his fame on several occasions suffered a partial eclipse. Was he more maligned than was Daniel Webster, Henry Clay,

Abraham Lincoln, George Washington? But as is so often the common lot of great men, it was rather after his death that the public estimate of Winebrenner did him justice. In reasonable time that estimate became measurably correct and moderately appreciative.

Winebrenner was the incarnation of integrity and honor. He was accustomed to perform, and to insist on others performing, every part of social justice. Fidelity to every trust and contract; tenacious of every promise; disdaining to dissemble or prevaricate, and regarding every act of injustice as a meanness to which he would scorn to stoop—these were ingredients in his character. Integrity was to him only entireness of one's moral being in unison with moral law. When he stood up to address the people, or the Eldership, in his closing years he could have been introduced as Lamartine did De la Eue to the riotous populace, saying: "Listen, citizens! It is sixty years of a pure life that is about to address you." He was ever faithful to his word. He would have thought himself as much undone by breaking his word as if it were to be followed by bankruptcy. Hence, against an almost solid opposition he insisted on paying the Texas missionaries what was promised them after they had opened the door of the Church to slaveholders. Nor did he pride himself in this or any other virtue. He knew not what pride is. Yet there is no affection of the human nature so much blended with better traits, or so wrought into our very being, as this vice through which the evil angels lost their first estate. Had it been otherwise he might have yielded to the tempter when the thought was more or less seriously entertained to make him Bishop of the Church. There could not be in such a nature the least tendency to affectation, nor to dissimulation. These are only manifestations of lack of truth, which had no place in Winebrenner's moral make-up. Even in business relations he was too sincere and honest to accept Chesterfield's dictum; that "dissimulation, to a certain degree, is as necessary in business as clothes are in the common intercourse of life." He was never known to be resentful. If he found no other and nobler way to deal with injuries received willfully from others, he dismissed them, like Samuel Johnson, "with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise." His friendships were not tainted with partiality, and rarely were the shafts of criticism met with sallies of anger. And yet there was enough of the combative element in him, though graciously restrained not quietly to put up with what he might deem unprovoked insult. He was free from self-interest, or what is properly regarded as the expectation of particular rewards, distinct from the general good which would result from one's labors and pains. Taking out this alloy from the gold in his character, it might be said that if the blaze of some other reformers is brighter, of Winebrenner's the heat is more regular and constant. If others as their characters and works are studied surpass expectation, Winebrenner never falls below it.

Winebrenner was superior to prejudice. There were no barriers between him and the poor or the rich, the cultured or the illiterate, the white or the black, the children of toll or the elite. He was in all these relations like Barnabas and the Gentile converts. When the first purely heathen converts were brought in to the church by the nameless men of Cyprus and Cyrene, they leaped the barrier which seemed impassable to the church at Jerusalem, and solved the problem over which Apostles were hesitating. But Barnabas crucified his prejudices, and, like a true man, he yielded to facts and widened his theory to suit them. All such problems raised by artificial and natural distinctions were to Winebrenner solved in Christ. For ye are all brethren. In Christ is neither Jew nor Gentile, rich or poor, white or black. Necessarily, if unusual, he was a man of great catholicity of spirit. Perhaps circumstances, as well as divine grace, helped to develop this trait. In an age of limited mental attainments, he was a man of culture, and had the advantage of good training. Raised in a rural home, he yet walked and communed with the refined and educated. A native of a slave State, his life was spent among anti-slavery people. The qualities he loved and cultivated, he admired and intuitively recognized in others. He was modest, and without any jealousy in his nature. He was not disposed to assert any superiority, but was content to yield the precedence to another, and to walk loyally and lovingly by his side. Thus he was unobservant of the immaturity, the weaknesses, the foibles and failures of the young men who without preparation entered the ministry. If he erred in these things it was on the generous side. He was clothed with, and delivered his message in, genuine humility. "Boast! but how can I boast? I am an empty vessel in myself; whatever good there is in me was put in me by God; I merely received it, and not by any right, or purchase, or power of mine, but as a gift," one can easily imagine he hears him say. He learned from Paul the answer to the question, "Who maketh thee to differ? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive?"

Leaders often lack tenderness. Even in the apostolic leaders in the church this characteristic does not appear in all. There was one, however, who was called the "son of consolation." Perhaps on this account he enjoyed almost beyond any others the confidence of the early church. We find him sent on almost every difficult and delicate mission. Nor was Winebrenner opinionated. That he held tenaciously to the views and doctrines he conscientiously received is only to say they were honest convictions. But he did not unduly adhere to his opinions, nor was he indisposed to listen to, and weigh, the opinions of others. And thus in controversy he was considerate of the views and convictions of opponents. Broad of intellect, he was patient and courteous in debate, rarely losing his dignity or his temper. He was self-sacrificing and indefatigable in his labors. He subordinated his own and material good to the demands of the Church. He sought to render the highest and best service to the Church, and the law of perfect service is always the law of self-sacrifice. It makes, as it did in his case, the whole life of a Christian minister and Church leader a life of ministration to the Church. Spirituality and moral goodness were harmoniously wedded in his life. He was full of faith, and was not a lover of this world; but he found in religion and the Church the absorbing business and the delight of his life. He zealously endeavored to make other men religious and to minister to their spiritual necessities. As Mackenzie says of Barnabas: "He was a good man, good in all the relationships of social and domestic life; good in his influence and fulfillment of public duties; good in the diffusive benevolence of his spirit and his social bearing—he was 'a good man.'" In nothing was his spirituality more clearly evident than in his tests of regeneration. He always insisted on "the evidence within." Evidence there must be, but it is not in the dialects and metaphysics of Paul; but in the simple love of John. The evidences, the proof, the satisfaction must be within the human breast.

Winebrenner was remarkable as a man of prayer. Often on special occasions, revivals, dedications, or critical times at Elderships, while others slept he prayed. Like Cornelius, "his were no morning and evening orisons hurried over in a few minutes, as though the least important part of the work of the whole day, and accompanied by no desire for heartfelt communion with God." Like another Jacob when "there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of day," "And the man said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Here was the hiding of his power as a preacher and a leader. True, naturally speaking his singular talent for government and leadership was founded also and equally on his temper and capacity. God filled the vessel he had made. Endowed with a great command over himself, he obtained in the earlier years an almost uncontrolled ascendancy over the people identified with him. He was sufficiently tolerant of dissent not to seek to force his opinions on administrative matters on others, wherein lies the true secret of managing religious factions. And so his qualities as a religious leader, with no considerable exceptions, were the object of undisputed applause and approbation. And so to the very end of his illustrious career nothing seriously diminished for any length of time the luster of his character. His life was altogether a serious one. With sincerity, candor and fairness he faced and dealt with every problem and every man. Firm, and yet gentle in a singular degree, he impressed every one with the thought that the business of his life was sacred and serious. There never was any indication that he lacked moral courage. That he was non-combative, indisposed to disputation, was not because of any element of cowardice in his nature. "The best hearts are ever the bravest," says Lawrence Sterne. He was undaunted in face of failure, of disappointment and of difficulties.

Winebrenner's life was a very busy one. The record of his work is mainly written in tangible deeds and on human hearts. Little note was made of this by the world. His friends did not sing and shout his praises, as falls to the lot of some. But when he was laid to rest

"Beneath the lone green tent Whose curtains never outward swing," many pens recorded and many voices spoke his praise, and never with a shadow of variance in their appreciation of his character and work. He was most of his years from 1825 a "preacher at large." In 1830 and 1831 no appointments were made. But from a statement made in a report to the Eldership about 1845, he evidently preached in Harrisburg, and occasionally for the churches around the town. In 1832 he was stationed at Harrisburg and Middletown. From 1833 to 1840 he had no charge. It was during these years that he started and edited and published The Gospel Publisher. In 1840 he was pastor at Harrisburg, Middletown and Lisburn. In 1841 he was stationed at Lancaster. In 1842 to 1845 he acted, under appointment, as General Missionary, Agent for The Gospel Publisher, and Agent for the Missionary Cause. His last charge was Lisburn, in 1846. From 1847 to 1851 he was "preaching at large," or as General Missionary, as he was in 1859. But no regular provision was made for his support, so that he was often thrown largely on his own resources. He devoted part of his time to various business enterprises, and also to his own publications, from which he probably derived considerable of an income. On May 1, 1846, he revived The Gospel Publisher under the name of The Church Advocate, of which the editorial and business management remained in his hands until May 1, 1857.

As a preacher Winebrenner was systematic, methodical, perspicuous and forceful. His theological views were definite and comprehensive, and were expressed in a didactic style. While logical in conception and outline, they were not argumentative. The faculty of stating truth in such a manner as to carry on the face of it its own proof was characteristic. Many of his written sermons were fine specimens of homiletical literature. He was at home in different kinds of sermons, though nearly all his published sermons are textual-topical, with a strong practical and experimental trend. As a Reformed minister he wrote his sermons often at full length; but later he seldom depended on manuscript. He was a fine extemporizer. Self-possessed, with a ready and expressive vocabulary, he could preach with Bible in hand with boldness, accuracy, fervency and precision. There was unction and fervor and pathos in his preaching which were at times irresistible. The fervor and severity tempered with sweetness were of such an order as to excite the emotions of piety and devotion. He was never accused with being brilliant, or oratorical. He had a great message of truth to bring to the people, and he was more absorbed in this than in the vehicle which conveyed it. Indeed few men have stood before dying men with a message from heaven that seemed so utterly unconscious of self as did John Winebrenner. Henry once said of himself and brother preachers: "We should be in gospel worship as the angels, who are seraphim—burners." So Winebrenner was in the pulpit. No trifling word, or sinister thought, or puerile act marked his ministrations in the pulpit. His style in prayer and sermon was reverent; humble, serious, simple and devout. He wrote and spoke in English and in German with equal precision and fluency. He had cultivated the art of writing to such a degree of accuracy and legibility that his manuscript was as if it were script. "A long poem," says Edgar Allen Poe, "is a paradox." In no sense can this be true of a sermon. Winebrenner is remembered by those yet living as a preacher of interminable sermons—"long-winded." Not so. The length of sermons is determined by conditions. His regular sermons were of the usual length. But no man preaches short sermons on special occasions, or special subjects. In his prime, sermons of two hours were no rare exceptions on such occasions. The length of a sermon is not determined by the clock.

Winebrenner's private character and domestic relations are of interest to the Church. The cardinal virtues, the temper and behavior of this good man in private life were such as to adorn his memory with an added halo. It were easy to enlarge on the devotion, the affection and the tenderness with which he filled up the relations of husband and father if the subject were not of too delicate a nature to admit of a particular detail. It is sufficient to submit a few facts, and to say, that his behavior in them was founded on the same excellent principles which influenced the rest of his conduct, and discovered in a high degree that sweetness and benevolence of temper for which he was remarkable. He kindly interested himself in the concerns of his wife and their home. And in the education and training of his children he endeavored to act upon the advices which he recommended to others in his sermons on that subject. Winebrenner was married October 10, 1822, by Rev. James R. Reiley, to Charlotte M. Reutter, of Harrisburg, Pa. To them were born six children, of which four died in infancy. Two daughters grew to womanhood and were married respectively to James Colder and J. C. Cassel. Mrs. Winebrenner died May 20, 1834. He was married the second time by Elder James Mackey, on Thursday, November 2, 1837, to Mary Hamilton Mitchell, of Harrisburg, Pa., but a native of Norristown, Montgomery county, Pa., who survived him, dying at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, Pa., May 22, 1888. To them were born Emma C., married to E. L. Christman, of Washington, Washington county, Pa., and John A., Albert M., and Marshall H. The mantle of the father as a preacher has not fallen on either of the sons.

Winebrenner's labors were not limited to preaching and editing The Gospel Publisher and Church Advocate, during the sixteen years he was connected with these periodicals. He was foremost in every project and enterprise of the Church, abounding in every good word and work. His own publications, beginning in 1822, and continuing at intervals to the close of his life, required much time and often quite an amount of research and labor. But in the Church he was active in every movement. He early advocated the need of an institution of learning, and took a leading part in the earliest project of that character—the building of "Bethel College," or the "Swatara Collegiate Institute," to be located at Middletown, Pa. He matured the idea of a co-operative body called "the General Eldership," afterwards the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The present General Eldership was the creature of his brain, and he personally managed the preliminary campaign which resulted in its organization in 1845. If a more opinionated man had been the leader indications point to the probable wreck of this institution before it was four years old. He was active in the anti-slavery movement, and in several temperance campaigns delivered political speeches. The industrial improvements interested him to such an extent that for several years he was much devoted to silk culture and the introduction of machinery of a labor-saving character. Being so much of his time in the saddle, and other means of conveyance, he knew the hardships of those methods of transportation, and hence delighted in the prospect of railroad lines being built over all the country, and editorially enlisted the good will and sympathies of those whom he could reach with his pen. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his somewhat amusing contrast of the lawyer, the doctor and the minister, insists that the duties of the latter "do not tend to make them sympathetic," even if he comes "next to the lawyer in point of talent." But Winebrenner, living apparently a somewhat sub-conscious life, was intensely and broadly sympathetic.

Descriptions of Winebrenner's physique are naturally limited. Why, up to the time of his death, describe his physical appearance when nearly every reader of the Church's publication knew him personally? So the earliest attempt on record to draw a pen portrait of his physical person was in 1860, a short time before his death. R. H. Bolton, with the other delegates to the General Eldership of 1860, saw him on the floor and heard him deliver his last sermon. In "Notes By the Way," published July 12, 1860, reporting the General Eldership as Correspondent, he says: "He is sixty-odd years old. And the silver threads appear amid his hair, and especially in his beard [worn only the last few years of his life]. He is tall and rather sparsely built. His personal appearance is commanding, his address graceful and winning, his gestures accomplished; his voice is full, soft, flowing; his delivery free, unaffected, energetic, animated."

Samuel Hinney, who knew Winebrenner and attended his preaching in "Peace Church," also known as "Salem Church," or the "Stone Church," near Shiremans-town, between 1820 and 1825, in 1864 gave this description of him as he then saw him: "I well recollect seeing him, coming up the road on horseback, a tall, lean, young man, with a modest, unassuming, humble and meek appearance."

George Garner, who heard him in Maryland when he was yet a Reformed minister gave his recollection of Winebrenner about the same time. Garner lived only a few miles from the old Winebrenner home. He says: "When Winebrenner was a Reformed minister he would come over to visit his friends, and would preach for the minister in the big house in town. He was tall and portly, well dressed and of a commanding appearance, but not proud. He was the most priestly looking man I ever saw, very pious."

Samuel Boyer remembered Winebrenner in 1824, and heard him preach in Maryland. In 1880 he wrote about him as follows: "Well do I remember Winebrenner. When he would shake his finger at the congregation sinners would tremble, as his whole slender frame would do."

In 1861 Elder Jacob Flake, Philadelphia, Pa., wrote some "Recollections of Rev. Brother Winebrenner," beginning with their first meeting of each other. He says: "The first time I met with Bro. Winebrenner was in the Summer of 1834 or '35. I had heard of him, but had not seen him. He called to see me in Philadelphia, where I was sojourning at the time, having returned from a five years' service in the West. He was tall and slim, wearing a straw hat; plain in person, and manners, and dress. His conversation and deportment were serious and gentlemanly, very much like a Christian of the olden times."

In his "Biography of Elder John Winebrenner," published in 1880, Dr. George Ross thus describes his personal appearance: "He was tall and slender, about six feet high, and very erect, whether walking or standing, or in the pulpit; with high forehead, and rather long, thin face, bluish eyes inclining to gray. His hair was smooth and of light chestnut color when younger, but later in life it was slightly mixed with gray, and which he wore rather long. Dignity and solemnity were prominent features in his countenance; and it was impossible to be in his company without feeling that you were in the presence of a great and good man. Yet there was little stiffness in his manner, so that a little child could readily approach him with confidence."

While there are men of decidedly good judgment who believe in "undersized geniuses," who have gone so far as "to declare that great height and genius are incompatible." They can cite in confirmation of their views such celebrities as Napoleon the First, Alexander the Great, Edgar Allen Poe, Alexander Pope. And it may be admitted that the list of men of undoubted genius who have been short of stature, some indeed almost dwarfs, is long. But it is not so difficult a task to overthrow the theory that great minds and short statures are closely allied. Cranium and brains after all count more than bones and muscles. Among the long list of very distinguished men in America are some of large stature, such as Charles Sumner, Jefferson, Jackson, Samuel Adams, George Washington, Lincoln, Beecher, Choate, O'Connell, some of which were considerably over six feet. The testimonials to Winebrenner's greatness are numerous, and from men who had a long and intimate association with him. These men pronounced most enthusiastic eulogies upon the character, abilities and gifts of the immortal dead both as they were assembled in annual convocations, and in published memorials. They found in him treasures of heart and of intellect which in their deliberate judgment entitled him, now sleeping in the "dwellings of the dead," to a real superiority among his cotemporaries in the American pulpit, and which made an enduring place for him in the gratitude and remembrance of posterity. They had seen him and heard him and associated with him during the weary years of his arduous labors, and many of his marvelous, pungent and spirit-stirring sermons and speeches they could never forget. To few of them was he known except as the great preacher; a preacher whose sermons, "like pollen-dust, usually penetrated to the consciousness it was to fertilize and bring to flower and fruit." They found it hard to speak of his sermons so as not to do them injustice, and still more to do them justice. In the sermon Thomas preached at his funeral he characterized him as a preacher, a theologian and a writer. In general, looking back to the time when the inexperienced theologian entered the Reformed pulpit in Harrisburg, he said: "We hesitate not to say, without being convicted of boasting above our measure, that Winebrenner, under the blessing of God, did more during the first ten years of his ministry to dispel the moral darkness and to infuse a new life into organized and unorganized Christianity in and around Harrisburg than any living man of to-day." He spoke of his ability "to pour forth those higher strains of pulpit oratory which bring all hearts under their control and power, yet many years ago he discarded for conscience's sake, as he told me, all that was mere display, tinsel and show in his pulpit efforts, and confined himself to preaching the word with all plainness, simplicity and point. And that in which he most excelled was the clear, lucid manner in which he expounded the word of God, and the point and power with which he applied the truth to the hearts and consciences of his hearers." "As a writer he was strong, vigorous, clear and methodical." "His works prove that as a theologian he was no mere novice, either in the doctrinal or practical." Thomas enumerates "the qualities for which Winebrenner was most distinguished as: 1. Great zeal and perseverance in his Master's cause. 2. Great decision of character. 3. Great Christian charity. 4. Unbounded benevolence. 5. A self-sacrificing spirit."

Dr. Ross in his memoir says of Winebrenner: "His preaching was generally methodical, and so logical that his positions were almost irresistible. His delivery was easy and deliberate. And while he was mild and affectionate to inquiring penitents, his reproofs to rebellious sinners were often terrible in their character.

He used his index finger with telling effect in his gestures." "His sermons had great power in convincing men of sin, and through his splendid reasoning his hearers yielded willingly to the power of the gospel. His language was so plain that every one understood him, and his reasoning so strong that people listened with attention, and before they were aware of it were convinced." "Seldom using notes in his labors, he would preach, exhort and sing for hours at a time in apparent forgetfulness of everything else."

In 1880 G. W. Wilson, of Ohio, wrote of Winebrenner, that he "was a ripe scholar, a fine Christian gentleman, a sound theologian and an eloquent and entertaining preacher, and a humble, zealous and devoted servant of the Church."

R. H. Bolton wrote in December, 1860, that "Winebrenner as a gospel preacher had few equals. His personal appearance was commanding, his address graceful and winning, his gestures accomplished, his ideas clear and well arranged. All these, with other good qualities, combined with deep, fervent piety and the high sense of the imperishable majesty and glory of his calling, and the glorious results of his labors, place him among the best speakers of his age." Bolton named twelve of Winebrenner's traits: 1. Strong faith. 2. Strong hope. 3. Very sanguine. 4. Courageous. 5. Plain and pointed. 6. Bold and uncompromising. 7. Never entered into sectarianism. 8. Great zeal. 9. Untiring perseverance. 10. A good man. 11. An earnest man. 12. Relied on the truth of the gospel.

J. Hinkle, of Mechanicsburg, Pa., thus bore testimony to Winebrenner's noble qualities: "We wonder at various matters respecting the departure of our brother, which will doubtless not cease while we have our dwelling among men. We contemplate his instrumentality in the hands of the Supreme Ruler of the universe and mighty Arbiter of nations in bringing sinners to Christ, and wonder why he is no more. We view his high intellectual endowments, and the respectable literary acquirements with which these natural talents were adorned, and our amazement is only increased why his life is over. We look at the special and superior meekness which qualified him for the exalted office of the ministry, and we gaze with remembered delight upon the halo of glory which often encircled the congregations of the Lord whilst he preached the unsearchable riches of Christ, and we inquire, Why has the mighty fallen? We wonder why so eminent a man reached no higher number of days on earth, while thousands of his inferiors had, and many now have, reached quite beyond the length of his sojourn. In his fall a bright star has been thrust from its orbit in the moral heavens."

J. C. Owens, then at Uniontown, Md., March 13, 1861, spoke thus of his first acquaintance with Winebrenner and the impressions received in social conversation: "I soon found that I had met with a gentleman, and as such few could excel him. In company he was polite, and remarkably agreeable. No one could remain long with him, or be in his company, without learning something profitable. He was free from trifling in conversation, or with the feelings of those with whom he associated. His tone of voice, his pleasant countenance and his dignified physical structure gave weight and influence to his character upon the minds of those who heard him. I also learned that he was not only a workman of no ordinary skill, and as well a gentleman; but a clear and well qualified debater. In these respects he had but few equals in the Church or in the nation."

One of his erstwhile friends, and alleged detractors, suggested at the time of his death that a common funeral dirge be chanted at all the Elderships, whose sessions were approaching. There would have been an impressiveness about such an epicedium which would have appealed strongly to the imagination; but it could not be arranged for. But what approached it at least in spirit was the spontaneous symposium of sentiment developed and revealed at the sessions of quite nearly all the Elderships. Yet there was no concert of action, as the first Eldership met eighteen days after Winebrenner fell asleep. It was the East Ohio. On the second day, in the afternoon, a motion prevailed, that "Elder G. U. Harn be requested to deliver before this body this evening a discourse on the life, labors and death of our esteemed and venerable Bro. Winebrenner." This he did, using Acts viii. 2 as his text, to a "congregation large, attentive, solemn and weeping." In the resolutions the Eldership spoke of "the vast circle of devoted friends" from the midst of which Winebrenner was called; of "his ministerial career as a reformer, evangelist and Christian," in which capacities he "has ever shone as a star in the clerical constellation of his age with unsurpassed brilliancy and luster." It was recommended that a funeral sermon be preached in every church of the Eldership.

The West Ohio Eldership met on Wednesday, October 15th, and on Tuesday afternoon appointed Thomas Hickernell "to preach to-night on the death of Elder Winebrenner." He "preached a solemn and impressive sermon from II. Tim. iv. 7. The Eldership spoke sadly of "the mysterious providence which removed our venerable and beloved Bro. Winebrenner;" that "a great man has fallen; one who possessed a strong, deep, clear, original and well-cultivated mind, and a graceful, generous and noble spirit. In preaching, his style, arrangement and manner of delivery were peculiarly his own. His easy, unaffected manner, always accompanied with great simplicity, and his warm, gushing heart, overflowing with kind feeling, did not fail to secure the love of those by whom he was surrounded."

The Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership met October 22nd. It expressed the deep sense of the loss sustained by "the death of our beloved and much esteemed Bro. John Winebrenner," and "deeply sympathize with the brotherhood in our common bereavement."

On the 29th of October the Indiana Eldership convened. John Martin was "appointed to preach a sermon on the death of Elder J. Winebrenner, and delivered an impressive discourse from Gen. xlix. 53." In resolutions the Eldership commended Winebrenner's "labors, so untiring and successful," which "will ever be cherished in the memory of multitudes."

By a regrettable oversight, the Illinois Eldership, which convened October 3rd, had "not a line, or a sentence, or a syllable; no, not so much as even an allusion in the remotest degree," in its Journal, of the venerable and lamented Elder John Winebrenner. But the omission was explained as entirely undesigned; that the Eldership was in no sense "insensible to the great and irreparable loss the Church has sustained," and that it was the intention to take "suitable action with regard to a subject of so much moment to the Church as that of the death of our much lamented Father Winebrenner." "It was certainly the intention, as well as the expectation, of the Eldership to have added their testimony to the well-known virtues and high moral and religious worth to which our lamented brother attained in this life."

In the morning session of the first day, October 23rd, the West Pennsylvania Eldership appointed S. S. Richmond "to deliver a funeral discourse on the life and death of Elder Winebrenner." This was done on Friday evening, from Rev. xiv. 13. In resolutions adopted after the sermon, Winebrenner is characterized as "our venerable and much beloved brother and father in Israel," in whose death "the Church has lost an able counsellor, the Bible a faithful advocate, the world a great reformer and the community a worthy man."

The East Pennsylvania Eldership held its session at Bainbridge, beginning on Wednesday a. m., November 8th. The preaching of the opening sermon fell to the lot of the life long friend and associate of Winebrenner, William McFadden, in place of Winebrenner, appointed to that office by resolution in 1859. The Eldership was orphaned, and sat in mourning. A special committee on obituaries was appointed, consisting of Swartz, Thomas and Mackey, than whom none knew Winebrenner better, nor appreciated him more highly. The Committee feelingly spoke of "our much honored and venerated brother, Elder John Winebrenner; that in this afflicted bereavement the Church of God of the East Pennsylvania Eldership has lost the most honored and useful instrument in the hands of God in the organization and establishment of said Church; that by the sterling character and success of his ministry he has associated his name with the most noted and acknowledged reformers of modern times." Mackey preached an extempore sermon, from Luke ii. 29, 30, on Winebrenner, which, by request of the Eldership, was written out and published in The Advocate. He testified that "few knew Winebrenner better in life than myself, and then added: "And throughout this long acquaintance of over thirty years, I may truly say, I know not one solitary act of his which in my estimation deprived me of confidence in his Christian character. He was a close, impressive, sound reasoner, generally methodical yet spiritual in his ministrations; great solemnity pervaded his efforts, and as a consequence deep and lasting impressions were made upon the audiences he addressed."

The Iowa Eldership, immediately after organization on the third Monday morning of October, "appointed A. Megrew, A. McCormick and J. Huff a committee to draft resolutions expressive of the sympathy of this body relative to the death of Elder John Winebrenner." The Committee thereupon reported, speaking of the deceased as "one who has long adorned the doctrine of his profession as a faithful minister, a reformer and as a devoted Christian, ever laboring with an untiring zeal to vindicate and spread the principles of the Bible, and was the humble and highly honored instrument under God in the conversion of many; believing him to have been one among the brightest stars that has ever adorned the ministerial constellation of his day."

The grave holds his mortal tenement of clay till the resurrection of the just. But he being dead yet speaketh. There is a glorification through death! Le Sage was right when he said: "Their deeds alone can praise them." And no other praise is of good effect where great names are concerned. And it needs but the simple story of his deeds, faithfully recorded, to sustain the glory of John Winebrenner.

CHAPTER XII.

THE first year of this period has ever been regarded as one of the most memorable years of American history. The events which give it this distinction were of a character deeply to concern the Churches and Christian people, and can not be separated from their corporate life. "General Sherman's march of three hundred miles directly through an insurgent country," "the most remarkable feature in the military operations of the year," says Lincoln, had culminated at Savannah, Georgia, with entire success, and "with an eclat indeed which startled Europe as well as America." He was marching northward, driving the Confederate army before him. Grant was meanwhile tightening his hold on Richmond and on the army of General Lee. In the southwest the military power of the Confederacy had been effectually destroyed by General Thomas. The country was excited to breathless expectation, and the Christian people who for four years had not ceased to pray for the triumph of right and justice began at last to see the foregleams of a complete answer to their prayers. On April 9, 1865, E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, announced the surrender of Lee, and ordered a "salute of two hundred guns in commemoration" thereof. The surrender of Johnston speedily followed. In large head-lines even The Church Advocate proclaimed, "The War Over!" "Thanks be to God!" In many and various ways the end of the war affected the Churches.

While events of the most momentous character were thus transpiring on the bloody fields of war, other scenes of equal significance were enacting in the halls of legislation. Maryland had taken the matter of the solution of the slavery question, which had agitated and rent Churches for years, under her own control, and deliberately abolished the institution. President Lincoln knew that in the Confederate States and some other Border States its abolition depended upon the validity of his Proclamation of Emancipation. He would never retract or modify said document; but what the Supreme Court might do was an unsolved problem. In his Message to Congress he made an effective plea for the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution. January 6, 1865, this Amendment was brought before the House of Representatives, and on January 31st it was adopted by a vote of 119 yeas and 56 nays. Having been adopted by the Senate, it was at once submitted to the States, and in less than eleven months after Congress had spoken the Secretary of State announced that the Amendment had been ratified by the Legislatures of twenty-seven States, and was a part of the Constitution. Slavery in the United States was dead!

April 15, 1865, "a crime without a name" was perpetrated in Washington, D. C. Lincoln was a martyr! The idol of the Christian people and Churches of the loyal States was shattered by the assassin's bullet. It was startling and terrible news to the country, as it was to the world. If hero-worship is not approved by the enlightened Christian conscience, the apotheosis of Lincoln is an exception. President Johnson directed that Thursday, June 1st, "be observed as a day of humiliation and mourning." At the Eldership in the Fall of 1865, instead of resolutions on the war and slavery, eloquent tributes of praise were recorded with earnest unanimity, recognizing in the martyred President "the worthy type of the characteristic virtues that should distinguish the Ruler of a free people, and that we shall ever cherish his memory and embalm his name in the warmest affections of our hearts as a special gift of Providence to the Nation in the darkest period of its eventful history." Looking back over the year 1865, on December 28th, Thomas said editorially: "O, what a year was 1865! How big with interest! How momentous in fixing the destiny of our own, and perhaps all the nations of the earth! The year 1865 has been a glorious, as well as a sad, year." And the "New York Observer": "While the present generation lives, and in the traditions of generations yet to come, the year now closing will be Annus Memorabilis, the memorable year of our country's history."

But while the material of war, the swords and the spears, were being converted into the implements of husbandry, and "wars without" ceased, and in the Church and Eldershops there was much controversy. Psychological reasons there doubtless are why contentions and disputations in Churches are both cause and effect; but in this case it is a question the answer to which may be held in suspense. But to contend earnestly for the faith delivered to a Church, even in public debate, while perhaps not profitable, may indicate a condition of vigorous health and delicious harmony in the body. This is illustrated in the champion disputant of the "Disciples of Christ," A. Campbell, who died on March 4, 1866. He held five public debates from 1820 to 1843, in which he defended the faith of the "Christian Church." He was Winebrenner's senior by eleven years, and out-lived him six years. B. Ober, however, had a number more public debates than Campbell. One at Proctor, in West Virginia, in 1851, has already been noticed. In Texas he had several of a semi-political character, but somewhat informal. His second debate of a religious nature was in 1865, with a Mr. Polly, of the Disciple Church, on Feet-washing; Title of the Church, and Design of Baptism, all three specialties with the ministers of the Disciple Church. This was held in Fannin county, Texas. Sometime later he discussed the same subjects with Clark Braden, a trained disputant, in Hunt county, Texas. In 1884, after his removal to Arkansas he encountered a Mr. Randolph, also of the Disciple Church, and debated the same questions, at Uniontown, Ark. Returning to Hunt county, Texas, in 1884, he joined issue the same year with a Methodist minister by the name of Landreth, on the same subjects. In McKinney county, Texas, in 1884, he tried conclusions with another minister of the Disciple Church on the old issues. But at Paris, Texas, in a debate with Mr. Porter, Methodist, infant baptism and immersion were the propositions.

"The bright day long seen afar, sublime, Bent now from heaven in final, full-orbed peace,"

Had a discussion of Feet-washing as a divine ordinance, in The Advocate, by J. S. Stamm, in 1866, and between Stamm and C. H. Forney the same year, been taken at its full value as proof that Stamm had renounced the ordinance, possibly the history of Centralia College could be differently written. When Principal of said institution he came out more positively against the ordinance, and finally resigned his position and membership in the Church.

A pleasant and interesting debate was held in Franklin Hall, Mechanicsburg, Pa., between A. Swartz, of the Church of God, and Rev. Dudley Downs, of the Christian Church. The proposition, which Downs affirmed and Swartz denied, was: "Baptism is essential to the remission of sins." Each disputant made four speeches. "A pretty full report of the speeches was furnished for the columns of The Advocate by the Junior Editor." The two evenings of May 7 and 8, 1867, were devoted to the discussion. In strong, deliberate, logical arguments Swartz dissected the positions attempted to be maintained by his opponent. The burden of proof rested not with him, and so Swartz had less opportunity to exercise his special talent for analytical discussion. Yet he realized that before a popular assembly he could not, for the sake of his cause, limit himself to the negative; and so he also advanced eight arguments in proof of the correlative to the proposition under discussion, which Downs did not undertake to meet. Of the published report of the debate Mr. Downs said: "The report I take to be a fair and honest one."

August 18 and 19, 1869, a public debate was held at Wesley, Venango county, Pa., between Elder J. M. Domer, of the Church of God, and Rev. Thomas Graham, of the M. E. Church. The proposition submitted by Graham and accepted by Domer was in the form of a question: "Did Christ institute feet-washing as a permanent ordinance of the New Testament Church?" Domer was comparatively a young man, aged about thirty-eight years. His opponent was his senior by not less than twenty years. Domer had been in the ministry some twelve years; Graham probably forty. Domer in his manner was very deliberate, calm and grave; Graham was of an excitable temperament. Domer's language was eminently chaste, smooth and aptly expressive, delivered with a well-modulated voice; Graham, as a result of over-taxing his voice in preaching, spoke in more rasping tones, and in a rather high key. Domer was a good, logical reasoner; Graham, though reasonably well versed in logical forms and terminology, was often seriously at fault in his reasoning processes. This was the first debate in which "humility" as an element in the ordinance of feet-washing was discarded, and "humiliation" substituted. Domer gave these elements: 1. Divine origin. 2. Recognized subjects. 3. Object or design. 4. Must relate to the worship of God. Graham gave the elements somewhat differently, specifically insisting that every ordinance must be "commemorative," in proof of which he cited Winebrenner. And that the thing commemorated must be a historical fact, like the death of Christ.

A. Swartz.

It was a critical point in the debate; but when Domer caught the full significance of the flank movement he turned his guns with tremendous force against Graham. Accepting Graham's elements, he portrayed in eloquent terms the historic fact of the "humiliation" of Christ, as significant and essential as his death, and declared that to be the monumental fact which we insist is commemorated in the washing of the saints' feet. Graham failed to reform his lines after this masterly stroke of dialectic strategy. Besides "the Junior Editor," who published a full report of the debate, there were present of the ministers of the Church of God, P. Loucks, A. C. Raysor and Henry Barkey. The conduct of some of Graham's friends in repeatedly leaving the house during Domer's speeches indicated lack of refinement in manners and charity of spirit. But their deportment was better than when years before, in the same locality, a debate was conducted between G. U. Harn and Rev. Keller, also of the M. E. Church.

In view of the radical antagonism between the Christian Church and the Church of God on the design of baptism, as developed in the Ober, Swartz and other debates, and in many published articles, the futility of efforts at union between the two bodies is self-evident. Yet "A Disciple" in December, 1865, addressed a letter through The Advocate to the Church of God, in which he "asked and desired to have answered the following important question: "What is to hinder the union of the people known as the Church of God and those known as Disciples of Christ?" He gave five points of agreement. But the proposition seemed so clearly inadmissible as a practical question, that though "A Disciple" suggested that delegates attend the next General Eldership to discuss it, it had not vitality enough to survive the Winter.

A spirit of disputation was rather widespread at this time. A large number and variety of theological and practical questions were discussed on both sides in The Advocate. Objection manifested itself at times in strong terms, perhaps not so much to the proper elaboration by arguments of the subjects treated of, as to the discursive, diffuse, non-consequential character of many of the articles. And yet more, to the absence of that restraint which holds disputants in check in a public discussion. Personalities revealing an ungracious and virulent spirit were not uncommon. As has been frankly said: "We have seen many on their getting warm becoming rude and shooting one another," instead of contending for or against propositions. Good humor is the best lubricator in a debate, as it is a strong preservative of peace and tranquillity. Not only was the spirit of the controversial articles distasteful, but the effect was feared. "What is the use of preaching union when we are not united ourselves?" "Can not brethren hold in with their peculiar notions?" "Must everything be given to the public in which we are divided?" "I am actually ashamed sometimes to let our sectarian neighbors see and read The Advocate." Such were the sentiments expressed relative to these controversies.

But some of these contentions scarcely concealed impending schisms, and also helped to widen them. This is true relative to questions of co-operation which were matters both of discussion and of official action. Will Winebrenner's dying message lose its charm—"Tell the brethren to stick together"? Radical differences of opinion developed from 1865 to 1870 on matters of Church Polity. They centered on two points—The Itinerancy; and, the Authority of Elderships. A few ministers serving stations, both East and West, contended not only on abandoning the itinerancy, but replacing it with the call system. Several churches carried this theory to the extent of refusing to receive ministers not previously called by them. The act of appointing them by the Eldership was only a ratification, not only in form but in fact, of the previous choice by the church. The discussion at several points threatened to end in insubordination and church independency. The claim to the right to discipline a church on account of any want of co-operation was treated with disrespect. "To your tents, O Israel!" was heard from a few places, the significance of which could not be misunderstood. Men held their breath, wondering how soon the rumblings of the earthquake would be heard! The discussion widened, taking in the relations of churches to the Eldership, church autonomy, and all the kindred issues. Official censure was resorted to by Standing Committees and Elderships, which in the severity of their terms and the extreme authority assumed served rather still further to inflame the already overwrought passions than to restore quietude and foster a spirit of submission. But the equivocal action of the General Eldership in 1869 gave evidence that so far as the Itinerancy being fundamental to our plan of co-operation, it was not generally so accepted when it included the time-limit. Strong men like Thomas, Swartz and scores of others with pen and voice defended the Polity of the Church, the authority of Elderships, the right of government and the principle of subordination of the less to the greater, until we reach the corporate unity of the Church in the General Eldership. Yet in some respects the discussion resulted in changing the tendencies toward irresponsible power and undue centralization. It also cleared the atmosphere in that the principles of co-operative action were set forth in clearer light. But it was characterized with considerable rancor and virulence, which are seeds never yielding good fruit. If, like the Methodist Church, the Church of God did not have lay representation this agitation could have been turned to good account to secure it. But where laymen, representatives of the churches, have equal rights in the deliberative assemblies, all questions of administration should be more easy of satisfactory settlement. The danger to a small body of people in such a spirit of revolt and reform is seen in the schisms, or secessions, in the Methodist Episcopal Church during its history. It was after long and at times acrimonious discussion and agitation that in 1869 the victory for lay representation was won. But the power of the episcopacy was not diminished, so far at least as the form is concerned. Meanwhile five protesting parties withdrew from the Church and organized independent denominations. The "Republican Methodists," because of the power of the Bishops in appointing preachers. The "Methodist Protestant Church," because of "the unlimited legislative, executive and judicial power vested in the episcopacy and the ministry, to the exclusion of the lay members." The "Wesleyan Methodist Connection," to form "a republican form of government, in which a majority should rule and the laity have equal rights." The "Free Methodist Church," whose fundamental principle was that "laymen on credentials of proper election, including women, shall be admitted to the District, Annual and General Conferences." And the "Congregational Methodist Church," which insisted on a more democratic government, to the elimination of the episcopacy and the itinerancy. And as a sixth and later movement of like character, the "New Congregational Methodist Church," whose main object was to secure the entire parity of the ministry and the exclusion of the episcopacy. In the Church of God the form of the protest differed; the principle was similar; and, if not wisely controlled, could have been disastrous.

Discussions were often started by the asking of questions. In this wise the question of the observance of the Jewish Sabbath was introduced in February, 1865, and was continued until December, 1866, participated in by A. W. Reeder, who inquired by what authority and by whom the day was changed. Oliver Hoffer answered by denying that there was any scriptural authority for the change, and hence Christians should observe the seventh-day Sabbath. A. Swartz replied, and was in turn antagonized by R. H. Bolton and Oliver. Swartz contended that the Jewish Sabbath was local; that it passed away with the coming in of the gospel dispensation, which is general, and that object and design of the two institutions were different. The discussion was in good spirit, but Thomas nevertheless put up the bars in order to end the controversy. The Church being so generally committed to the Lord's day, there was some impatience over a long drawn out discussion which was not likely to change a single mind, and so the Editor thought it was doing "injustice to our readers" to permit its continuance.

Beginning in April, 1865, and ending in December, 1866, the question of the relation of baptism to salvation was almost continuously debated. After it had been in progress for three months, and himself being one of the leading disputants, Thomas somewhat apologetically stated that "it has not been introduced into our columns by our own choice or election, and both have assumed proportions, in words at least and repetitions, that make us rather regret that we have suffered them in at all," including "the discussion on the Sabbath question." Like the latter, the debate on baptism in its relation to salvation was begun by a question submitted by W. P. — to the Editor: "Does the Church teach that baptism is essential to salvation?" Thomas answered in a guarded, qualified manner, after a careful definition of "essential," that the Church did not teach thus. "Veritas" affirmed in opposition that "baptism is for the remission of the sins of a penitent believer." A bad name fastened upon a doctrine is with many a strong argument against it. Thomas was not a stranger to the arts of a controversialist, and he at once headed his reply to "Veritas," "Baptismal Regeneration," and adhered to it to the end. For some four months these two disputants entertained the readers with long articles antagonistic to each other. In December, 1866, R. H. Bolton struck at the heart of the question as argued from the Disciple view-point, and inquired through The Advocate of C. H. Forney, the Assistant Editor, whether "the preposition 'for' in Matt. xxvi. 28 and Acts ii. 38, means the same in both cases." The answer was wholly philological, and the conclusion drawn was against the position that baptism in any sense is the cause or condition of the remission of sins, or that remission of sins is the effect or result of baptism. In 1868 the subject was again brought forward by a question to the Editor by P. Curtis, in which his position as against admitting persons to church fellowship before baptism was revealed. Thomas at once turned this question so as to give it a clear allusion to the former question, and so answered at length, that "baptism is neither a condition of salvation, nor of church membership." To this answer J. L. Cramer objected by quoting the old texts which he claimed teach that "baptism in every case is connected with remission of sins." This reiteration of what to Thomas was an exploded theory made him impatient, and he replied somewhat hotly, that "no one but a perverted disciple of A. Campbell would assume that the texts quoted mean baptismal remission of sins, or baptismal regeneration." These earlier controversies were frequently besprinkled with lancinating terms; but would it not be an indignity to such noble souls to assume that these things proceeded from other than pure and upright motives and a holy jealousy for the truth?

Though Thomas disclaimed all intentions of "invoking or provoking a controversy on the subject of Calvinism," an editorial on "Calvinism" in June, 1865, did that very thing. There was a revelation of some contention on the subject, "especially in the bounds of the East Ohio Eldership;" a statement that letters on the subject had been received, and a hint touching the zeal of new converts to a faith. Indeed already in May the spark which can start a conflagration was dropped by "Quilibet," in referring to the reasons why there "was no revival at Sugar Creek, Ohio, during the last meeting," and wondered whether it was not "too much Calvinism in the pulpit." At once J. F. Shock, Illinois, took up the Calvinistic point of final perseverance. H. L. Soule entered the arena of debate in a series of controversial questions addressed to A. H. Long, intended to affirm the doctrine Shock had advanced. But this socratic method seldom misleads the experienced theologian, and Long calmly replied in denial of the conclusions Soule meant to force on him. But the most elaborate defense of this doctrine was undertaken by B. F. Beck in his opening sermon at the East Pennsylvania Eldership in October, 1864, but withheld from publication until September 28, 1865. Thomas stated that "for prudential reasons this sermon was not published at the usual time, and we had hoped the good brother would have reserved it for his own private benefit, and not urge its publication in The Advocate." He further declares that "there were but few who heard the sermon but deeply deplored his [Beck's] imprudent and unwise course in stepping aside from the usual courtesies of the ministry, and preach a doctrine that he knew was repugnant to the feelings, and in opposition to the views, of nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine hundredths of his hearers, and this, too, as a representative sermon." He then in characteristic manner repudiated the doctrine of the sermon. He felt so chagrined that he declared he "shall propose and advocate hereafter a scrutiny of every Eldership sermon authorized to be delivered before the body prior to its publication." The East Ohio Eldership by resolutions condemned the preaching in its pulpits of "doctrines strongly tinged with Calvinism," and by name referred to Beck's sermon as "containing doctrine antagonistic to the teachings of the Bible and contrary to the principles of the Church of God."

Less prolix discussions were occupied with such doctrines as the divine call to the ministry, rebaptism, promiscuous sitting in the house of God, lay preaching and revival methods; but along with the support of the ministry, dancing and other amusements, pastoral visitation, reading sermons, the door into the church, close Communion, the second advent, non-resistance and other minor questions they took up in the aggregate considerable time and space. The doctrine of human depravity was more elaborately debated. R. H. Bolton began it in February, 1866, defining it as "corruption of nature," or a "vitiated state of the mind and heart," and as being "wholly corrupt in all the faculties of soul and body." It is "total and hereditary," involving the idea of original sin. This he controverted in several strong articles. With the issue containing the first one the Editor apologized, under the head "Apologetic," for publishing it "without considerably modifying it before it went out to the public," and characterized it thus: "Just before going to press we got hold of the proof, and detected our very orthodox brother riding over the gospel turf on an old heterodox horse, beautifully caparisoned with conjugated verbs, comparative and qualifying adjectives with hyperbole mountings shining in great splendor, but still discover the same old gray rode by Arians, Socinians, Unitarians, Universalists and errorists of almost every hue for many years and even centuries." Besides ordering, as did the colored preacher another errorist, to "get off that horse," there was but little in the way of argument in "Apologetic." After a delay of two months Bolton turned on Thomas, and renewed the discussion. He insisted that so far as the ministers of the Church were then concerned "a majority, together with nearly the entire brotherhood in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois dissent from your views." The discussion was thus begun afresh between these two disputants, and continued from April to October. Mackey agreed with Thomas, and contributed several clear and convincing articles, in which he "defended the scriptural view of the subject." G. W. Wilson came to the help of Bolton, while Swartz contributed a remarkable analysis of "Man's Natural Condition" which strongly favored the view taken by Thomas. It seemed to have been Thomas's prerogative to act, like Oliver Cromwell as "Lord Protector" of the faith, so that quite generally when a contributor advanced, or defended, views which he did not regard as in harmony with the orthodox sentiments of the Church the same issue, or the following one, would contain an editorial on the subject. In this way a discussion of the relation of metaphysics and theology began between the Editor (Thomas) and the Assistant Editor (Forney) in 1868. And yet in answer to a question by Soule, as to whether the Church teaches "that in the resurrection the material body shall be raised up," he said: "As long as Brother Soule and others are resolved that no published declaration by authority shall be made as to the faith of the Church, it is in vain to ask us, or any one else, what is the doctrine of the Church on the resurrection, or on any other subject." Thus originated the discussion of the question of Creeds, which for several years occasionally occupied considerable space. Thomas always insisted that "the Holy Scriptures are our guide," and so no one can "harmonize these two principles—the Bible is all-sufficient; human Creeds are essential." But it was not so much what is commonly called a Creed that was advocated, as a compilation of doctrines the Church taught. To ascertain on what points of doctrine the East Pennsylvania Eldership had declared itself, a committee, consisting of Thomas, Swartz and Forney, was appointed in October, 1867, "to examine all the records of this body, and report" the same. This report was published in May, 1868, but most of the "points" reported are not strictly doctrinal.

In July, 1865, C. C. Marston, Iowa, started a discussion of Sanctification by asking publicly A. Swartz: "1. Can man have the privilege of being wholly sanctified from sin? 2. When a man is sanctified is there any possibility of that man becoming a castaway?" Swartz was diplomatic, and confined himself to the etymological meaning of "sanctify," as a setting apart, which "does not imply moral quality," and that all moral states must be voluntary. But this was only the forerunner of a controversy which raged in revival Churches for several years. It had its origin in the Methodist bodies, where by 1868 it had developed such proportions that "Holiness Camp-meetings" were held and periodicals sprung into existence. Church members, like penitents, came to the altar, seeking "entire sanctification," and "the fulness of salvation," or "entire cleansing from sin." While the churches of God were less agitated with this doctrine, here and there a minister and some laymen accepted the theory and professed the experience.

It became a subject for discussion to a considerable extent in 1868-9. The "Holiness Camp-meeting" of the Methodist Church, held at Manheim, Lancaster county, Pa., furnished the text for an editorial by the Assistant Editor on "Methodist Sanctification," in which not the doctrine of sanctification, but the Methodist theory was entirely repudiated. It was followed by an editorial by the Editor a week later, in which the Methodist theory was declared not to be in accord with Scripture. These editorials reflected the prevailing faith of the Church. A. H. Long, P. Loucks, A. Swartz, and others wrote on the subject, expressing the same views. But while Swartz held views in opposition to the Methodistic sanctification, Thomas objected to his "fundamental principles," and so a discussion between these two strong men on a side issue continued two months. After the death of Editor Thomas, in December, Editor Forney resumed the discussion, in which he took the position that "essentially the work of sanctification takes place in conversion, or when a man is born again;" that "it is extended and intensified as life progresses," and that it is "perfected in the ratio of man's natural perfection of mind and spirit." Mackey was interrogated by Bolton, and asked what the Bible doctrine of Sanctification is. In his answer he endorsed Swartz and Forney, and further defined sanctification as "a dedication to God, and refers to a state, condition or employed vocation, and seldom, if ever, in the Old Testament to a special or particular moral quality."

The question of Eldership titles, or the singular or plural form of the word "Church," was more one of action during this period than of public discussion. There was a gradual falling back on the original title—"Eldership of the Church of God." Thus in 1865 four Elderships held to the new form—"Eldership of the Churches of God." But in 1867-1869, there was only one.

The introduction of choirs and instrumental music created considerable friction in churches, and brought this question to the front for more or less controversy. Weishampel, in February, 1868, defended both, insisting that there is nothing "unscriptural in church choirs in themselves;" but he would have "the main part of the choir, including the leader, to be true worshipers of God." And he could "find just as little Scripture argument against instrumental music. That there was both choir singing and instrumental music in the Temple at Jerusalem, by divine appointment, is evident." Swartz argued against instrumental music on the ground that it is not an ordinance under the New Testament dispensation, and that it is a dangerous principle to assume that it is right to do a thing because it is not forbidden; and that "instrumental music is not mentioned as being used in the primitive churches." He was followed by "Kay," who favored instrumental music on authority of the Old Testament. Forney recast Swartz's article, and made it an argument against building "houses of worship" by simply substituting "houses of worship" for "instrumental music," and thus republished the whole article. W. O. Owen made a direct attack on Swartz's position, that instrumental music should not be used on the ground that the New Testament is silent on the subject. Swartz replied to his two antagonists in vigorous terms. Mackey took the same position that Swartz had so ably defended. Thus the discussion continued for three months, when the Editor announced that "No reply . . . from any quarter will receive attention."

Among the last controversial editorials Thomas published was a defense of feet-washing as an ordinance against an attack upon it by the editor of the "Evangelical Messenger." But while thus defending the institution, the brethren were disputing between themselves on the matter of its private observance, separate from the Communion. A few advocated this practice, and the charge was made that "some of our influential brethren are advocating a separation of feet-washing from the Lord's Supper." But they did not do so publicly. The suggestion brought out strong opposition against such a practice, as it would put asunder that which Christ joined together, and that it would be only the first step toward the non-practice of the former ordinance.

"Do Souls Sleep?" was discussed by M. S. Newcomer in 1868, as against sundry persons who advocated this error in Illinois and one or two other Elderships. He attacked it as "a growing phase of popular error." Thomas ably defended the "conscious existence of the soul after death" as a dogma conclusively settled by the Savior. He also answered a question by "Methetes," as to whether belief in the unconscious state of the dead should not be made a bar to church membership, as well as ground for exclusion from the ministry. The answer was somewhat equivocal, as "a man's heart may be better than his head." Editor Forney, in December, 1869, was asked to decide whether the doctrine of soul-sleeping is not "a heresy," and its advocates "heretics according to the Bible meaning of the word." C. C. Marston attacked the soul-sleeping theory as "materialism," and charged that it militates seriously against true piety.

Minor sporadic discussions characterized this entire period. These were often a defense of old views and practices as against agitators who were vastly in the minority. It was thus insisted upon that the term "church of God" should not be applied to the house of worship, nor "bethel" to the church. The conversion of children became a live issue by reason of the work of E. M. Long among children, and the holding in a few instances of "Sunday-school protracted meetings." It developed that these dissenters were in many instances of the class which is composed of persons with an "ingrowing conscience," or who were righteous overmuch. It was with impatience that their views were discussed, sometimes the disputants developing intemperate heats of passion. The ministers who defended the "old landmarks" showed no lack of mental grasp, nor of courage in all their encounters with keen-witted and aggressive enemies in or out of the Church. Any thing new was viewed with suspicion, and a reluctant and partial hospitality of thought was granted its advocates.

It can not truthfully be inferred, however, that the period was throughout predominantly controversial, and without spiritual activity. It is true that after the war came the demoralizing influences incident to a post bellum period. "Gross immorality, crime, luxury, extravagance, reckless pecuniary ventures, intemperance, etc., characterized the period." Yet the war had taught some wholesome religious lessons. The conditions prevailing also forced on the attention of Churches the need of greater activity, which soon resulted in a new impulse of spiritual life and power in large areas. Revivals of religion became more common, and at times were conducted on larger scales than for a decade. Spirituality became better sustained and piety less spasmodic. The lay activity of the churches again began to grow, fostered and sustained by the Young Men's Christian Association introduced before the war. Reviewing the year preceding May 1, 1866, Editor Thomas says: "The aggressive movements of the Church have been more successful than perhaps in any former year. The revival news from all parts of our work published in this volume makes it a most invaluable record." And Mackey, in February, 1866, says, "the cheering news of the many revivals from various localities of the Church are truly encouraging." These revival meetings continued late into the Spring and began again early in the Fall of 1866. Reports of conversions and ingatherings came from every Eldership, and from a majority of the churches. Humiliation, fasting and special prayer, with supreme reliance on divine power, were urged as necessary to a true revival. Similar reports came in during the Winter of 1866-7, so that late in December, 1866, Thomas said: "The news from many fields of labor of our brethren is quite cheering. The Lord in great mercy still inclines his ear and accepts the feeble petitions of his children, and in answer thereto is pouring out the spirit of grace and supplication upon sinners and wanderers from home." And on January 10, 1867: "The news from various parts of our work at present is most gratifying and cheering. The revival influence in many of the churches of God is more than ordinarily prevalent." In various places these meetings were still in progress at the end of May. With some decrease in power the work continued during the Winters of 1867, 1868 and 1869.

With the approach of the camp-meeting season in 1865 Thomas said that "it would appear from the profound silence observed upon the subject that the old camp-meeting fervor and spirit have almost entirely died out among our brethren." Ross apprehended the same, and criticised camp-meetings as more recently conducted, attributing the want of results to the manner and spirit in which these meetings are being held. B. F. Beck, who had charge of one, sought in advance to meet the objections which were urged against them. But five camp-meetings were announced, one in Ohio, one in Maryland and three in East Pennsylvania and German Elderships. The results so far as conversions were concerned were quite disappointing.

In 1866 there were two camp-meetings held in Ohio, one in West Pennsylvania, one in Maryland, five in East Pennsylvania and one in the German Eldership. Few conversions were reported. In 1867 one camp-meeting was held in Iowa, one in Ohio, one in West Pennsylvania, one in Maryland, one in the German Eldership and six in East Pennsylvania. In 1867 Children's meetings were freequently held at a number of the camp-meetings, at which addresses were made and songs sung by the children.

The importance of holding camp-meetings was again strongly urged in 1868 by Thomas, both as a sign of spiritual vitality and as a means of growth and progress in the divine life. In Ohio Oliver made a strenuous effort to awaken interest in these meetings. An "Eldership camp-meeting" was projected in East Pennsylvania, but was only partly successful. Iowa held one; Ohio, one; Maryland, one; German Eldership, one, and East Pennsylvania, four. But four of these were reported, at which there were twenty-seven conversions. Camp-meetings had undergone a radical change. Originally the sole design was spiritual. As a rule they began on Monday and ended on Saturday. Conversions were numerous, and quite often the revival influence spread as the people returned to their different circuits, and the results were seen in the enlargement of the churches. Five camp-meetings were held in 1869. One of these was held in Louisa county, Iowa. It had been appointed by the Eldership in 1868 to be held in Benton county, and reapportioned at the Extra Session, but was changed. It was earnestly commended to the ministers and churches by C. W. Evans, pastor. The Ohio Standing Committee recommended that "one or two camp-meetings be held," but none was announced. One was held in West Pennsylvania; one in Maryland; one in East Pennsylvania. The disinclination to hold camp-meetings manifested itself among the Methodists, the United Brethren and the Evangelicals.

At their inception Pentecostal meetings were considered of such merit as to become a permanent institution. They were of such an excellent spirit that not only the local churches, but the Eldership, manifested eager interest in them. They encountered difficulties and obstacles. Could they survive them? In 1865 the Ohio Standing Committee appointed three; but only one was later announced and reported. One was held in East Pennsylvania. But in 1866 six were held, one each in Maryland, East Pennsylvania, Iowa and Ohio, and two in Indiana. But in 1867 only one was held, in East Pennsylvania. In 1868 East Pennsylvania held one; Ohio, three, and Illinois, one. Strong appeals were addressed by ministers in the East to Elderships and churches West to hold these meetings. In 1869, two were held in Ohio; two, in Illinois; one, in Iowa, and one, in East Pennsylvania.

The present period was not only somewhat noted for academic and practical discussions, but as well for constructive Church Extension work. The first suggestion to organize a Church Extension Society was made near the close of this period, by A. G. McCormick, then of St. Louis, Mo. He advocated the starting of missions in that city, in New Orleans, San Francisco, as well as in Chicago and Philadelphia. The object of such a Society in the General Eldership he outlined "to be to set out the land and pre-occupy the ground in all our important towns on all our railroads, and there establish churches that may be radiating points into the interior." These extravagant dreams were inspired by the glamour of the Chicago Mission. No one could then realize the difficulties it was to encounter, or the slow and costly progress, much less its final failure. All the energies and available resources of the Church were at its service. A year after the dedication of the Bethel, at the Decatur General Eldership, 1866, Shoemaker was reapportioned to Chicago. As expenses were increasing and a Sunday-school organized, continued and earnest appeals were made for funds. It was also proposed to build "tenement-houses" on the vacant lots as an investment. The mission was pronounced by some who went to Chicago after the General Eldership as "certainly a success." Families from other points in Illinois, and from Ohio and East Pennsylvania removed to Chicago, and thus formed the nucleus of a good church. Yet by December, 1866, some opposition developed, and some doubts and fears found expression, which, however, were rebuked in resolutions adopted by several Elderships. By the middle of July, 1867, Shoemaker conceded how difficult his work will prove, as "to build a church [in a city like Chicago] is not the work of a day; but, on the contrary, that of years, requiring patience, faithfulness, toil, time, money and prayer." This had a dampening effect on the zeal of the brotherhood. And withal it would prove a blow to the itinerant system, as no one could step into Shoemaker's place and carry on the work. Yet by January, 1868, a church of about thirty members had been gathered, with good congregations and a good Sabbath-school, and the third anniversary was successfully observed on March 11, 1868. In 1869, at the General Eldership, the Board of Missions reapportioned Shoemaker to Chicago, under instructions from the Eldership, after an effort to transfer it to the Illinois Eldership had failed. His report showed "whole amount received, $15,074.85. Expended, $15,305.86." But as the salary was not paid in full, there was due him $1,052.51. Mutterings of discontent began to be heard in the Summer of 1869 because of apparent disparagement of work elsewhere in the West. To secure the property at Chicago to the Church, it was ordered that it be deeded to the General Eldership. That there was a feeling of discouragement arising is evident from an editorial by Thomas, the subject of which was stated to be an inquiry "whether there is any real cause for discouragement, or real cause for the Church to slacken its hand in the support of the Mission." But the sentiment this editorial was intended to mitigate was somewhat persistent, as the editorial seemed to foreshadow what it denied. However, the Annual Elderships in October repeated their endorsements of the Mission. Removals late in this year weakened the Mission, and Shoemaker realized that "there is a weariness in this good work on the part of the contributors, and who think the mission ought now to be self-sustaining."

The mission enterprise in Philadelphia, under contemplation for several years, took definite shape when at the Eldership in 1865, D. A. L. Laverty was appointed missionary there, to take charge in April, 1866. He was also appointed General Collector to canvass the churches for funds to pay for the mission property bought by the Board of Incorporation of the Eldership. A. H. Shott, formerly of the church at Middletown, Pa., but who had united with a Baptist church in Philadelphia, several years before had started a mission Sunday-school and erected a mission building on Diamond street, near Sixth, about 3 miles North of Market street. This the Board of Incorporation bought for $1,900.00, of which $400.00 was on ground rent. With the property the Sunday-school, of two hundred and forty members, was turned over to the little church of twenty members when, on April 1, 1866, possession was given. Most of these members had removed to the city from churches in Lancaster, Dauphin and Schuylkill counties. Success attended this enterprise, and larger quarters were needed. On November 14, 1866, the Board of Incorporation decided to sell this property and buy the Cohocksink Presbyterian church on Germantown avenue and Berks street. The former was sold to the Mennonite people for $1,950, and the latter was bought for $10,000, to get possession April 1, 1867. This house was re-dedicated March 24, 1867, the services being in charge of Laverty, assisted by Owens, Hartman and J. S. Stamm. This mission was dear to the heart of Thomas, and he lamented his physical inability to be present at the re-dedication. He wrote an editorial on the Philadelphia Mission shortly before his death, in August, 1869, in which he rejoiced over the success of the project. On February 18, 1868, the German Eldership Standing Committee appointed A. W. Stouffer missionary to labor among the German people in Philadelphia. The German Eldership also opened the West Penn and New Albany Mission in 1867, in Berks and Schuylkill counties. At New Albany a church was organized in the Winter of 1867-8. It appointed two German ministers as missionaries in Baltimore, Md.

The Board of Incorporation, through its Committee and Agent, completed the rebuilding of the Bethel in Chambersburg, Franklin county, Pa., prior to March 1, 1867, and the dedication took place on March 10th. The Agent had collected $4,394.21, outside of Chambersburg, of which sum $370.00 were contributed by members of the Legislature of the State. The dedicatory sermon was preached by C. H. Forney, from Luke vii. 5.

At the Pentecostal meeting held at Lancaster, Pa., June, 1865, resolutions offered by C. H. Forney, proposing that a meeting of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership be called at Pittsburg, Pa., to perfect plans to open a mission among the Freedmen of the South, were unanimously adopted. In October following the East Pennsylvania Eldership approved the suggestion. The matter was further urged upon the General Eldership, to meet in May, 1869, by J. F. Weishampel, who enlarged the project so as "to send the gospel South by missionaries;" "the next project should be a Southern Extension Mission." At the Lancaster General Eldership in 1869, the matter was referred to the Board of Missions, which appointed "E. H. Thomas and Dr. George Ross to inquire into the practicability of the same, after it had "created four missions. . . . one among the Freedmen." It also urged the "church at Harrisburg to open a mission in West Harrisburg, which was done, and the establishment of All-workers, or Green Street church followed. It also recommended that "the East Pennsylvania Eldership open a mission in Reading, Berks county, Pa. The Board of Missions of said Eldership on July 21, 1869, began this work by appointing D. A. L. Lavery to canvass Reading for funds to erect a mission chapel. By September 10th, $1,800 had been secured. A lot was bought in December. By March, 1870, $954.00 had been secured. May 18th the corner-stone was laid, A. H. Long, missionary, in charge. The corner-stone was laid and address delivered by C. H. Forney. On November 24, 1870, the Mission Chapel was dedicated. Keller preached in the morning; Lavery in the afternoon and evening. Another mission, known as the Berks County Mission, was also kept up during this period, I. Hay having charge of it in 1869, Amos Bowen having located with his family in Renovo, Clinton county, Pa., in 1869, and suggested mission work in that place and surrounding territory, with Lock Haven as a center. He at once began holding prayer-meeting, so often the beginning of permanent church work. In October the large-hearted, liberal Dr. Ross went to Renovo, "purchased three lots of ground which were paid for and deeded to the East Pennsylvania Eldership" for the proposed mission.

A few new churches were organized in East Pennsylvania during this period and a number of church houses built. In October, 1866, at a revival at Fox's school-house, Dauphin county, about forty persons were converted, under the labors of W. L. Jones, and a church was organized of thirty-two members. At Mercersburg, Franklin county, E. D. Aller conducted a successful revival in a building, owned by the Lutheran church, and on March 11, 1867, "organized a church of seven devoted members." May 5, 1869, George Sigler organized a church at Red Hill, near Boiling Spring, Cumberland county, composed of fourteen members. The dedication of the Pine Grove house of worship, in Perry county, took place on June 17, 1866, T. Still, pastor, assisted by J. M. Carvell. John Hunter did the preaching. On February 17, 1867, the Altoona church rededicated its "renewed house" with appropriate services, under the pastorate of P. D. Collins, E. H. Thomas officiating. December 20, 1868, Thomas and Lavery held the re-dedicatory services of "the thoroughly repaired and renewed bethel" at Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, Pa. On the same day "the newly refitted bethel at Washington, Lancaster county, Pa.," was rededicated. I. B. Hartman and J. Hunter did the preaching. The church at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, having built a new bethel, it was dedicated on September 20, 1868. C. Price preached on the previous evening, from Ps. lxxxiv. 1; C. H. Forney, on Sabbath morning, from Jer. xvii. 12; W. O. Owen, in the afternoon, from Rev. xxii. 18, 19, and in the evening, D. A. L. Lavery, from Gen. xxviii. 17. George Sigler was the pastor. Under the labors of J. W. Deshong a house of worship was built in Progress, Dauphin county, during the Summer and Fall of 1868. It was dedicated December 6th. C. H. Forney preached the sermon from John ii. 19-21, assisted during the day by the pastor and J. C. Owens, J. Halfleigh, and W. L. Jones. The rededication of the Milltown bethel, Cumberland county, occurred March 28, 1869, C. L. Amy being the pastor. Under his labors a house of worship was built in Marysville, Perry county, the corner-stone of which was laid September 19, 1869. The house was dedicated January 16, 1870, by C. H. Forney by a sermon based on II. Chron. vii. 5. George Sigler preached the evening sermon. The church had helped to build a "union house" some years before, but it became a house of strife, and they lost their interest in it. The church in Todd township, Huntingdon county, at a small village called Beavertown, built a bethel in the Summer of 1869, under the labors of Simon Fleegal, which was dedicated October 17th. Preaching Saturday evening, Sabbath morning and evening by C. H. Forney. Having remodeled and repaired their bethel at Landisville, Lancaster county, under the pastoral care of J. W. Miller, it was rededicated November 21, 1869. In the Summer of 1868, a lot of ground was donated by the gentleman who laid out the town of Donaldson, Schuylkill county, on which the church was to build a house of worship.

Considerable activity was manifested in Maryland between 1865 and 1870, and substantial work was done. On March 1, 1865, the movement which took shape at the Eldership in 1864, was definitely inaugurated to join the divided territory by establishing the Frederick County Mission, and S. Spurrier, missionary, moved on the field, locating at Creagerstown. He secured the school-house for preaching services, and also opened appointments at Oakdale and German town. J. Ross and W. P. Winbigler also served the mission during parts of this period, and added other points. At Creagerstown a bethel was erected in 1866, and dedicated December 25th, George Sigler and C. H. Forney conducting the services. At Carrollton, Carroll county, Md., a substantial stone bethel was built in the early Summer of 1866, C. L. Amy, pastor, and was dedicated July 8th. J. C. Owens officiated at the dedication. The cost of the property and building was $1,700.

In the German Eldership there was an effort made to do mission work in Baltimore, and a new mission was established in Dauphin and Northumberland counties, known as the Susquehanna Mission, to which J. M. Hepler was appointed, and a salary of $400 guaranteed. The bethel at Summit Station, Wayne township, Schuylkill county, was dedicated May 20, 1866, A. Snyder doing the preaching, from Ps. xxvi. 8. The internal troubles greatly interfered with successful work being done. On the Lebanon circuit the churches desired an East Pennsylvania preacher. Also in the Mahantango Valley some were dissatisfied. The Kimmel Will and other causes made trouble in that section. The Will was contested in court by the relatives; but it was upheld. Part of the Kimmel church withdrew. They were disciplined and declared no longer members. Being restored by the action of the General Eldership, the Kimmel church became an East Pennsylvania church, and an appointee from said Eldership served them. These troubles precipitated "a crisis in the history" of the German Eldership, and to aggravate matters drastic actions were taken by the Standing Committee, which resulted mainly in further alienating members and churches, and weakening the body.

Limited aggressive work was done in the West Pennsylvania Eldership during this period. Abraham Lasher, Jr., and J. A. Plowman, in 1865, "purchased a meeting-house six miles north of Kittanning, Armstrong county, which was later rededicated. A "Johnstown Mission" was recommended by Plowman in 1866. The meeting-house at Carrolltown, Cambria county, and at Fayetteville, Lawrence county, were sold, and some of the proceeds were used to build one at Paddytown, Somerset county. Pittsburg was always more or less unfortunate. In the Spring of 1867 "their bethel caught fire and was partly burned." Repairs having been made and the house reopened, it was encumbered with a debt of about $2,500. A new house of worship was erected in Irwin township, or Wesley, Venango county, and was dedicated on October 20, 1867. The dedicatory sermon was delivered by J. M. Domer. On the Perryopolis and Fayette City Mission, where Plowman began to labor April 1, 1867, good results were realized. The church at Fayette City increased to ninety-two. At Stickle Hollow on said Mission a church of fifteen members was organized. The Perryopolis church increased by the accession of seventy-three new members, and arrangements were completed to build a bethel. In the Winter of 1869 Plowman labored along the Allegheny River, north of Pittsburg. At Brackenridge twenty-three miles above the city he organized a church, having had a revival at which "many precious souls were converted." Antioch Bethel, Marshall county, W. Va., was dedicated by P. Loucks, December 6, 1868. W. J. Davis was the pastor.

Though conditions in the East Ohio Eldership were not so auspicious, an aggressive spirit prevailed in the body. In 1866 action was taken to "establish a mission in Canada West." J. L. Jenner was appointed the missionary, with $200 for an appropriation for the first year. Jenner had been a member of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Thence he went to the United Brethren Church, under whose direction he had labored, prior to 1866, for three years "as a missionary in Canada." To this territory he was appointed by the East Ohio Eldership said year, he having united with the Church of God and the Eldership the same year. He died March 7, 1874. He started for his Mission "in the northern land" November 25, 1866. A revival at Maryboro, Wellington county, C. W., in March, 1867, resulted in gathering a small church. A bethel was built and dedicated in 1866, at Milton, Wayne county, Ohio. Also one at West Lebanon, Wayne county, under the labors of M. Beck, which was dedicated October 27, 1867. In May, 1867, the church at Smithville, Wayne county, under the pastoral care of J. H. Besore, "decided to build a new bethel, and pushed the work with characteristic energy, so that by December 15th they were ready to dedicate. A. X. Shoemaker preached the dedicatory sermon, and was assisted in the services by M. Beck and D. Blakely. A new house of worship was dedicated at Vermillion, Ashland county, August 23, 1868. L. B. Hartman preached the dedicatory sermon. McKee, Beck, Selby, Devless, Oliver and Blakely took part in the services. "The corner-stone of a new church edifice in the village of Kirby, Wyandot county, was laid by J. W. Senseney

August 22, 1868. On November 28, 1869, the dedication of Sugar Creek Bethel, Holmes county, took place. The sermon was preached by G. W. Wilson. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership on June 2, 1869 "recommended the Ohio brethren to open a mission in Mansfield. But already in February, 1869, the "Mansfield and Shelby Mission" had been created, and in March, 1869, J. Myers had "urged the importance of sending a good missionary to that point." In December, 1869, in accordance with the instructions of the East Ohio Eldership, the Board of Missions of said Eldership paid a visit to Mansfield to establish a mission there." The bethel at Blooming Grove, Richland county, was dedicated January 9, 1870. B. F. Beck, of East Pennsylvania Eldership, delivered the dedicatory sermon from II. Sam. vii. 13. L. H. Selby, pastor; J. W. Senseney and J. Landis assisted in the services. W. P. Small organized a church at Fairview, and the other "in the settlement of Bro. C. Long," during the Winter of 1867-8, both in Mercer county. At the former place "they built a new house of worship," which was dedicated October 18, 1868. G. W. Wilson, T. Hickernell and W. P. Small were the ministers present, the former two doing the preaching. By action of the Standing Committee of the West Ohio Eldership, September 2, 1865, the church at Findlay, Hancock county, was "urged to persevere until the work is completed," and "brethren and churches were urged to contribute toward the accomplishment of this important work in Findlay." G. W. Wilson, pastor, made a public appeal for help, stating that "we must have help from abroad." In May, 1866, they commenced building a brick house, 40 by 50, and 17 feet high. It was completed during the Summer, and dedicated December 30, 1866.

The Indiana Eldership felt the inspiration of zeal and success which was reported from other Elderships. Churches enjoyed revivals, received accessions and planned new enterprises. Regular preaching, with special meetings, was arranged for in 1865 in Terre Haute City, Vigo county. Also at Indianapolis, the State capital, Marion county, both under the labors of the General Evangelists, R. H. and C. S. Bolton. One mile north of Roann, Pleasant township, Wabash county, a bethel was built in the Summer of 1865, and dedicated December 3rd, by A. X. Shoemaker, J. E. McColley being the pastor. C. Sands organized a new church at Ream's school-house, La Grange county, of twenty-six members, in the Spring of 1866, where he had "a glorious meeting in the midst of a Disciple community" against whose "theory of baptismal remission of sins" he had to contend. Up to April 10, 1866, he witnessed one hundred and one conversions on his field. There were still enough "German brethren within the bounds of the Indiana Eldership" to induce the Standing Committee to grant them the privilege of securing the services of a "minister from the East Pennsylvania Eldership" to preach for them. During the session of the Indiana Eldership at Syracuse, Kosciusko county, November, 1867, the new bethel, costing $3,000, was dedicated. The bethel built by the church at Zanesville, Wells county, was consecrated on October 18, 1868, during the session of the Indiana Eldership, R. H. Bolton officiating, E. Bryan being the pastor. In the same county, "the newly erected bethel near Beaver Dam Lake was dedicated to the worship of God November 29, 1868, R. H. Bolton preaching the dedicatory sermon. The Eldership appointed Bryan General Evangelist in 1868, and authorized special collections where he would preach, but amounts thus "paid to him should not lessen the support of the circuit preachers." November 29, 1868, "the newly erected bethel at Yellow Lake, Kosciusko county," was dedicated. J. Martin preached the morning sermon in German, from I. Kings vi. 12, and R. H. Bolton "spoke from the same chapter in English in the afternoon." Eight miles southeast of Columbia City, Whitley county, "in the Brandenburg community," a bethel was built in the Summer of 1869, and dedicated on September 12th. "It was christened Evergreen Bethel." Bolton preached the morning sermon from Dan. ii. 44, 45. E. B. Bell was pastor, who with Hahn, Smith and Callison, participated in the services during the day. Prior to the Spring of 1869 the Indiana Eldership had been "agitating the propriety of inaugurating a mission in Ft. Wayne," and was strongly urged by outside influence to undertake the work. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership in June, 1869, recommended "that the Indiana Eldership open a mission, and that Ft. Wayne be the center." The General Evangelist began preaching in said place during the Summer of 1869.

Internal troubles in the Illinois Eldership during part, at least, of this period militated against the interests of the churches. At Decatur, the pastor, D. Kyle, "withdrew church privileges from J. H. Hurley," and an appeal was taken to the Eldership, and charges and counter charges were preferred, until the greater part of the Eldership became involved. A temporary settlement was effected by the Standing Committee in November, 1868, but the virus to some extent continued to work, finally resulting in more severe acts of discipline. One dedication was announced in the State, being that of a new bethel in Clark county, called the "Wabash Bethel," within the territory of the Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership. The dedicatory services were held March 24, 1867, R. H. Bolton officiating. German preaching was still in demand at several points, principally at Troy Grove, La Salle county. The Board of Missions, April 29, 1867, stated that "we propose making special efforts to open a mission in Springfield," capital of the State; but the enterprise was deferred. H. L. Soule, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, having become pastor of the church at Mt. Carroll, April 1, 1866, he was dissatisfied with the location of the bethel, and succeeded in inducing the church to remove it to a more eligible location. After extensive repairs, it was rededicated October 21, 1866. "The outsiders" offered to buy and pay for the lot. A. X. Shoemaker preached at the dedication.

Iowa churches and ministers were quite active during these five years, and success crowned their labors. In the Spring of 1866 the church at Cairo, Louisa county, completed their "fine bethel," and dedicated it on May 27th. F. F. Kiner was minister in charge. The Standing Committee planned large things, and set about "raising a large missionary fund for the purpose of sending out missionaries on new territory and opening missions in some of the principal towns in Iowa." The "sum of not less than $5,000 for the present year [1866-7] is expected to be raised." A. Wilson was appointed General Missionary to raise the money. He had been licensed in 1861, but labored largely in a local capacity for several years. He was a missionary a good part of his time. In 1867 he was on the Eddyville Mission, Klein on the Marshall Mission, and D. Gillon on the London Mission. At Grundy Center, J. M. Klein, after a successful revival in February, 1868, organized a church of twenty-three members. At North Bend, Johnson county, in the Summer of 1868, "they built a large 'house of worship,' but it is not called a bethel." It replaced the bethel built in 1853. The old house was 30x35 feet; the new one was 38x56 feet, and 60 to 70 feet to the top of the belfry. D. Wertz and Mrs. Wertz were the pastors. The house was dedicated October 18th, during the session of the Eldership. H. L. Soule preached the morning sermon, from II. Chron. vi. 18; A. X. Shoemaker, at night. At this dedication "between seven and eight hundred dollars were pledged for the Marshall Mission." On October 25th, the bethel in "the Garner neighborhood" was dedicated by H. L. Soule, who preached from Isa. v. 1-7, Shoemaker assisting. Nine miles northeast of Tipton, Cedar county, a house of worship was built called "Fairview Union Bethel," which was dedicated October 25, 1868. At Washington, Washington county, a new bethel was dedicated, under the labors of F. F. Kiner, June 27, 1869. H. L. Soule officiated at the dedication. On Sunday evening the ordinances were administered. September 12, 1869, the dedication of "the newly erected bethel at Victor, Iowa," was held; C. L. Wilson, pastor. The Southwestern Iowa Mission was established by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1869, with George Thomas as missionary. The mission was located in Page county, Iowa, and the adjoining county of Nodaway in Missouri. Work was also being done in that section of Missouri by the Konkle brothers. Two organizations had been formed on the mission by the last of December, 1869. In January, 1870, another church of sixteen members was organized, at the Montgomery school-house, Mo. The first suggestion of a mission on the Pacific was made at a missionary meeting held at the Iowa Eldership in 1868. J. A. Sallinger, in July, 1868, writing from Woodbridge, Cal., had expressed the hope that "emigration of Church of God men and women would come right along here, and settle down and build up the Church."

Considerable work was done in Missouri from 1866 to 1870. The General Eldership's Board of Mission in 1866 advised opening a mission in St. Louis. Elder A. G. McCormick had moved to the city from Iowa, and was working for the United States Christian Commission, but in August, 1866, contemplated going to work for the St. Louis City Missionary Society. But in January, 1867, he had begun work to open a mission for the Church. But, except in Nodaway county, the first systematic effort to begin mission work was by the Indiana Eldership, when D. Keplinger decided to remove to Cass county, Mo., and the Eldership commended him to the people of Missouri. He reached Pleasant Hill, Cass county, October 25th. He was duly appointed later as missionary by the Indiana Board of Missions, and reported as such in March, 1867. He preached in Cass and Jackson counties, from Kansas City southward. Eld. J. E. Cunningham had emigrated from Texas to Cass county, Mo. Keplinger also visited brethren in Bates county. These three counties border on Kansas. He organized the first church in Jackson county prior to March, 1867, composed of thirteen members. Another one was organized later the same year at Smith's school-house, Cass county, of eleven members. On July 28th one was organized at Harrisonville, Cass county. In November, 1867, Keplinger extended his labors two counties northward, into Caldwell county, where he succeeded in organizing a church of six members. The Texas Eldership in 1867 recommended Cunningham, in Cass county, to organize an Eldership, and in June, 1868, Keplinger expressed the opinion that "no doubt an Eldership can and will be organized." Keplinger also visited Morgan county, to which place Wm. Berkstresser and others had emigrated in 1868. This county is the fourth east of Cass county. On October 20, 1868, D. Blakely, of West Pennsylvania, reached Benton county, second county east and south of Keplinger's home, and began mission work under the direction and support of his Eldership. He visited Morgan county, and also preached in Hickory county adjoining Benton on the south. Daniel Gross, of Decatur, Ill., removed to Lawrence county, near the southwestern corner of the State, April, 1869, and called for the missionaries to visit that section. In the Winter of 1869-70, S. V. Sterner emigrated to the same section and began mission work. Blakely organized a church about this time at Shiloh school-house, Alexandria township, Benton county. Clarke county is in the northeastern corner of the State, a short distance from the Iowa work. At Peakesville in this county R. H. Bolton "held a series of meetings, resulting in conversions and the organization of a church of about thirty members."

George Thomas, missionary in Page county, Iowa, and G. E. Ewing were the first ministers to emigrate to Kansas, in 1865, locating at Centralia, Nemaha county, the two counties being less than thirty miles apart. The provisions of the Homestead Act drew hundreds of families. C. S. Bolton followed in September, 1866. He later went to Marshall county, adjoining Nemaha on the West. Other Church families which located in those counties were H. Cary and son, Eli Hawk and Daniel Utsey. These two counties are on the line between Kansas and Nebraska. When in 1866 the General Eldership secured Centralia College, J. S. Stamm, East Pennsylvania Eldership, was sent there as Principal and preacher. P. K. Shoemaker, also of said Eldership, accompanied him, in the Spring of 1867. Elders P. Clippinger and P. Shaw also located at Centralia. Under Stamm's labors a Sunday-school was organized at Centralia, April 28, 1867. The same year a church was organized of forty members. Shoemaker opened appointments at various places in Nemaha and Marshall counties. One of these was at Seneca, the county seat of Nemaha county. One at Barrett, Marshall county, where in the Winter of 1867-8 he had a successful meeting and organized a church of eighteen members. He also visited Clay Center, Clay county, where A. W. Reeder and family lived.

In 1869 Shoemaker was appointed to the Kansas and Nebraska Mission, as Church families were moving into the lower tier of counties bordering on Kansas. Among these were the Moore brothers from near New Grenada, Fulton county, Pa. K. A. Moore reached the Moore Settlement in September, 1868, in Lancaster county. These lower counties in the State were part of Shoemaker's mission field. Already in 1867, William Ensminger, who emigrated to Lancaster county, Neb., in 1865, secured three lots as a gift in Lincoln City after it was made the State capital, upon which to erect a house of worship for the Church of God.

Ober, Texas missionary, considering conditions much more favorable in that State in 1866, and "prospects flattering, came North to secure aid for the work," and if possible induce some ministers to go there and take his place, and that of E. Marple. The latter also strongly urged a change of missionaries. T. A. Perkins, Chairman of the Standing Committee made an offer of $550 a year, and twenty acres of good land. But there was opposition. The Texas Eldership had never been recognized by the General Eldership, and bitter feeling still prevailed North and South during the Reconstruction period, so that nothing was done.

In 1866 some families from Southern Indiana emigrated to Anoka county, Minn., about 130 miles north of the Iowa line, on the Mississippi River, with Anoka as their post-office. They at once called for a missionary. Sandoe, Bolton, Ross and Wilson urged the matter, and a subscription was opened in The Advocate to raise the funds. It was considered a good field, and Sandoe strongly emphasized the importance of following such families of the Church in every direction: "We must follow them with missionaries." On April 29, 1867, the Standing Committee of the Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership licensed J. L. Fasig, one of the emigrants to Anoka; constituted the Anoka Mission, and appointed Fasig the missionary. Fasig proved recreant to the trust, and in August of the same year left the work and united with the M. E. Church. G. W. Wilson had offered to go to Minnesota as missionary, and so the Southern Illinois and Indiana Standing Committee dismissed Fasig and recommended that Wilson be appointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership.

It was also proposed to start a mission in Richland county, Wis., the third county north of Jo Daviess county, Ill., whither some families had removed from Southern Indiana in 1867.

At the Michigan Eldership in 1869 three hundred and eighteen members were reported, but "many of the churches have not been heard from." In 1867 R. H. Bolton removed to Berrien county, Mich., and entered upon the work in said county. A Bethel was built near St. Joseph, and was dedicated December 6, 1868, by A. X. Shoemaker. Seifried was doing good work in Barry county. Work was done on four missions, besides the four circuits. Ten ministers were serving these fields.

Inspired by the excellent Sunday-school institute held in Grace M. E. church, Harrisburg, Pa., in the early Spring of 1868, D. Shelley, C. H. Forney, L. Kauffman, J. A. Winebrenner and others planned to organize a "Sabbath-School Convention of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." The preliminary meeting was held at Harrisburg, May 15th; a call issued, and June 16-18, fixed as the date, and Mechanicsburg as the place. This was "the first Sabbath-school convention of the Church of God in East Pennsylvania—the first also in the history of the Church." Delegates were appointed by the different Sunday-schools in the Eldership. The attendance was large, interest deep and well-sustained, and the convention was pronounced "most successful and profitable." The temporary organization consisted of W. L. Jones, Chairman; J. Haiffeigh, Secretary; A. H. Long, Recording Secretary. C. H. Forney was elected Conductor, and the following were chosen permanent officers: Chairman, Daniel Shelley; Secretary, J. H. Redsecker; Recording Secretary, A. H. Long. On Tuesday evening, 16th, C. H. Forney spoke on "Sabbath-Schools and Sabbath-School Conventions," followed by Laverty and Jones. Wednesday morning Forney spoke on, "The Wants of the Convention," followed by German, Kolp, Jones, Kauffman and Alleman. G. Sigler discussed "Topical Lessons." He was followed by a general discussion of "The Importance of Sunday-School Music," in which fourteen brethren participated. This was followed by an address by D. Shelley on "Sunday-school Organization and Order." Next topic discussed by Forney, was: "The Blackboard in the Sunday-school." At 2.20 p. m., the Conductor opened the Question Drawer, read the questions submitted, which were answered by Laverty. The two questions: "What constitutes a good Teacher? How may good Teachers be secured?" were discussed by Forney, Sigler, Beck, Hannum, Keller, Shoemaker, Jones, Owens, Kauffman and German. Then followed Reports of Superintendents. Wednesday evening "The Antiquities of the Bible" was the subject of an address by Forney, followed by a discussion of "The use of the Blackboard," by Shelley. Thursday morning, after further reports from Superintendents, E. M. Long, a Children Evangelist of Philadelphia, spoke on "The Importance of the Conversion of Sabbath-school Scholars." A. H. Long spoke on "The Relation of the Pastor to the Sabbath-school." "Mission Work" was discussed by Shoemaker. In the afternoon J. H. Redsecker spoke on "Libraries and Sabbath-school Rooms;" E. D. Allen on "A Deeper Interest in our Work," and W. O. Owen on "The best means of awakening an interest in our Work." On Thursday evening John A. Winebrenner delivered an address on "The Geography of the Bible." The Secretary said: "The Convention was of unusual interest." The second Convention was held at Middletown, Dauphin county, May 18-20, 1869. A Constitution was adopted. C. H. Forney was the Conductor; D. Shelley, President; A. Hostetter, Vice President; J. H. Redsecker, Secretary; A. H. Long, Recording Secretary, Isaac Frazer, Treasurer. R. White, of the Illinois Eldership, and P. Loucks, West Pennsylvania Eldership, were present. A resolution was adopted for the appointment of a committee "to devise some plan by which at least three hundred dollars may be raised for missionary purposes." The Editor of The Advocate was requested "to set apart a portion of that paper for Sabbath-school matters."

The deaths of at least six prominent ministers occurred during this period. February 13, 1865, "Bishop" David Maxwell died, aged 74 years. He was one of the six ministers who organized the first Eldership. Elder James Charlton died July 5, 1865, "esteemed and beloved by all who knew him." Andrew Miller, member of the first Eldership, died March 22, 1865, aged nearly 80 years. He was a co-laborer in every interest with Winebrenner. On January 15, 1866, James George died seven miles west of Findlay, Ohio, aged 28 years. November 12, 1866, Elder George Kimmel died near Orwigsburg, Schuylkill county, Pa. Death in this instance "has pointed his javelin at a shining mark." He bequeathed most of his estate to the German Eldership. On Saturday, September 11, 1869, the Editor of The Church Advocate for seventeen years, ended his illustrious and successful career. To Winebrenner, Mooney and Crawford, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and to several members of western Elderships, the churches, like the ancient Angives, "looking upon them as among the best of men, caused statues of them to be made," or monuments to be erected. But to Thomas, the Elderships like the Athenians, directed public funeral service to be held and the highest honors to be paid. Among other great and renowned men who died during the period were Thaddeus Stevens, the Great Commoner; Fitzgreen Halleck, American poet; Henry Harbaugh, eminent Reformed divine and poet; and James Buchanan, ex-President of the United States, and Francis Wayland, celebrated Baptist minister, educator and philosophic writer. The silent language of these dead incited others to nobler deeds of Christian fidelity and heroism.

CHAPTER XIII.

"THE Outlook" in 1870 was portrayed in quite encouraging terms at the opening of this period by the Editor of The Advocate. The indications upon which the forecast was based are given as being the marked revival in Sabbath-school and missionary interests, fields considered both large and promising to "yield an ample harvest if properly cultivated." The introduction of better systems in selection of fields and the securing of funds is favorably mentioned. Then the movement to establish churches in the larger cities was taken as a good omen. The deeper and more general interest in the gathering of funds, and the zeal of lay members, and especially of the sisterhood, were emphasized as features in the forward movement of special significance. And the conditions of realizing these expectations were sought to be impressed on the churches and brotherhood, to wit: Faithfulness to our trust; preserving the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace; a persevering and aggressive spirit; boldness in entering every open door which Providence presents to the Church.

The dark shadows of death again fell upon the Church early in this period, as they had done in the two preceding periods, when two of its great leaders were stricken down. But by this time the Church had learned that the work can go on even if great leaders fall at their posts. The Eye which watches with deepest solicitude over the body of Christ, which is his church, slumbers not, and provision will be made to replenish the ranks and furnish the leaders. If some great light goes out in the greater light of the perfect day, another one will arise to the faithful Church. Five ministers laid down their armor during this period of whom special mention may be made. The first to do so was W. H. Mullenix, in Linn county, Iowa. He was licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1840. He labored with commendable zeal in several Elderships, and finally located in Iowa, where he was esteemed a "good man" and an able preacher of the word. He died March 15, 1872, not quite fifty-two years old.

Already the shadows were gathering which portended the death of J. M. Domer when at the General Eldership at Mt. Carroll, Ill., May 29, 1872, he was chosen to preside over that body, which he did with dignity and efficient impartiality. To reflect light on the gathering shadows the Eldership chose him to preach the opening sermon in 1875, and elected him Assistant Editor of The Church Advocate. He died at Barkeyville, Venango county, Pa., his natal county, November 15, 1872, at the early age of 41 years, 11 months and 1 day. He was converted under the labors of S. S. Richmond, and united with the Church of God, in which he was a shining light. He held a sanctuary in the hearts of the brotherhood wherever he was known. He was a strong defender of the faith of the Church of God, though brought up under the influence of the Evangelical Association, of which his parents and nearly all his relatives were members, two of his brothers being ministers in said body, and one in the M. E. Church. His long and intimate friend, P. Loucks, preached his funeral sermon, in which he spoke in most commendable terms of this great and good man. Others both East and West spoke in such endearing and eulogistic terms as gave unmistakable evidence of the high esteem in which he was held.

A still younger minister was called down from the walls of Zion March 2, 1873, in the person of Peter H. Clippinger, a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. He was a descendant of the Clippingers near Newburg, Cumberland county, Pa., staunch members of the Church; but he was converted among the United Brethren, and received his first license to preach from a Quarterly meeting of said Church. But being in full accord in faith and practice with the Church of God, he became a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1870. He was a young man of good promise. His age was 27 years, 6 months and 6 days.

But a short time after, Iowa was called to mourn the death of W. D. Bowker, a young minister of special promise, a faithful and zealous worker. He had been licensed in 1870, and so the dispensation of providence which recalled him so early seemed the more mysterious and the greater loss to the Eldership and the Church.

One of Winebrenner's early converts who entered the ministry was Jacob J. Miller, of Conewago township, York county, Pa. He was converted January 27, 1827, at Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa. Though there were no churches of God then in York county, he learned the faith of the Church, and was early moved to enter the ministry. Failing to do so then, he became negligent, and lost his spirituality. Removing to Cumberland county, and seeing his danger, he was revived and began to preach. In 1843 he was licensed by the Eldership. Nine years later he removed to West Pennsylvania, preaching in Indiana, Cambria, Somerset and other counties. Thence, in 1857, he emigrated to Iowa, where he ended his militant career at Epworth, Dubuque county, Iowa, July 5, 1874.

Other religious bodies, and the world of poetry, politics and science lost heavily during this period. Albert Barnes, born a little more than a year after Winebrenner, died December 24, 1870, a preacher and expounder of the word who secured a world-wide reputation. On December 7, 1873, Right Rev. W. E. Armitage died at New York. He was the Episcopal Bishop of Wisconsin. The great Baptist revivalist of America, Jacob Knapp, born in 1799, died December 7, 1874. Though reared in the Episcopal Church, he joined the Baptist Church when twenty-one years of age, and was ordained in 1822. The number of his converts is given at 100,000. February 12, 1871, died Alice Carey, author of "Lyra and Other Poems," "Snow Berries," "Lyrics and Hymns." The great American musical composer, Lowell Mason, born 1792, died in 1872. Several of America's greatest statesmen also joined the invisible host. Foremost stands Lincoln's Secretary of State, W. H. Seward, marked for death the same night his chief fell a martyr to the assassin's bullet. He died at Auburn, N. Y., October 10, 1872. Horace Greeley, broken-hearted aspirant to the Presidency, yielded up his life shortly after his memorable defeat, November 29, 1872. Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, the wizard of finance in the Lincoln Cabinet, died May 7, 1873, aged 66 years. The peerless orator and abolitionist and statesman, Charles Sumner, died at Washington, D. C., March 11, 1874. The conqueror of Lee at Gettysburg, Pa., Gen. George G. Meade, ended his illustrious career at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1872, but a few months before the nephew of the great military genius, Napoleon I., and ex-emperor of France, Louis Napoleon, terminated his unfortunate career. The thirteenth President of the United States, Millard Fillmore, died March 8, 1874. The pioneer abolitionist, Joshua Leavitt, died January 16, 1873. On August 11, 1873, Richard S. Storrs, who had officiated for sixty-two years in the same pulpit, ended his earthly ministrations. Thus one by one Winebrenner's cotemporaries joined the great majority.

It has been inferred that when James says: "Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth," that he referred to the "flame of discord and insubordination one man, by his persuasive tongue, may kindle among the common people"; but may it not be an aphorism of wider application? The suggestion by the newly elected Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1869, that unless the Board were given authority to do something it would better be discontinued proved the "little fire" which kindled the great missionary enterprises which were so energetically pushed forward during 1870-'75. Sometimes zeal was not guided by adequate knowledge; and promising enterprises proved abortive; but on the whole vast good relatively was done. Not only did the Board itself energetically devise and put into effect plans for enlarged frontier work; but it fostered mission enterprises by different Elderships, and inspired the organization of movements to bring the sisters of the Church into more immediate connection with mission projects, thus realizing more nearly than had yet been done the conception of the first General Eldership, in 1845, to make of the whole Church a missionary society.

Excellent and permanent work was accomplished in the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership between 1870 and 1875. Some projects, however, finally failed. This is true of the Renova mission, in Clinton county, where the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad Company had donated a lot and Dr. Ross had bought two additional lots for church purposes. Some Church families had removed to Renova from other sections. A committee, consisting of Lavery and Ross, visited the place in 1870, and reported quite favorably. Forney was directed to accompany the missionary, A. V. B. Orr, when he went there to take charge of the work, in 1871. But on February 12, 1873, the Standing Committee released Orr, and sent him to Christiana, Lancaster county, Pa., after a committee had visited the place and made a favorable report. A Hall was rented, and Orr was authorized to collect funds to build a house of worship. No success attended this project.

There had been preaching at Mt. Carmel, Northumberland county, Pa., some years before, but in the Spring of 1870 work began there in a school-house, under the preaching of A. Snyder. In the month of June a small church was organized.

The Eldership in the Fall of 1869 decided to establish a mission in Columbia, Lancaster county, where a church had existed many years before. W. L. Jones, pastor at Washington Borough, was placed in charge. He with the brethren at Columbia were urged to buy a lot and prepare to build, but the matter was delayed.

Harrisburg church in 1869 was named as one of the churches by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership which should undertake mission work. This was done in May, 1870, when two mission Sunday-schools were organized, one called the Broad Street Sunday-school, and the other the Vernon Street school. In February, 1872, another one was organized in South Harrisburg. The Broad Street school developed into the All-Workers' church, corner of Green and Calder streets, where a Bethel was built, which was dedicated May 21, 1871. The cost of this property was $3,200. Shoemaker preached the dedicatory sermon, and was assisted during the day by Owens and Lavery. The Vernon Street school was abandoned after being carried on successfully for several years. The South Harrisburg school grew into a church, and at the Eldership in 1873 Lavery was appointed missionary to build a church-house. He took charge April 1, 1874, and on November 5, 1874, the corner-stone of the new Bethel was laid. C. H. Forney delivered the address, assisted in the services by Seabrooks, Sigler and the pastor. The corner-stone had been the corner-stone of the Mulberry Street Bethel. The dedication took place on February 7, 1875. A. Swartz preached the morning sermon from Mark vi. 56; J. Cooper in the evening. The total cost of ground and house was $4,471.00.

York county was always territory for successful work when proper efforts, with the right kind of men, were made. In 1869 the Eldership decided to enlarge the work in said county, and during the Winter of 1869 and 1870, the Standing Committee mapped out the Lower York Mission, in the vicinity of the county seat, and appointed S. C. Stonesifer, a young man from Maryland "of excellent talents and commendable zeal and energy." He took charge April 1, 1870. He opened eight appointments, and in June he organized the first church, consisting of twenty members.

That the various mission enterprises might be supported, a Sunday-School Missionary Society was organized, which at first supported the Nagle Street mission, and planned to raise $1,000.00 a year through life memberships and the Sunday-schools. The Board of Missions also laid an assessment in 1870 on the churches aggregating a little over $3,000.00.

Clearfield county, on the northern slope of the Allegheny mountains, was in the territory of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and the first missionary work done there, after Weishampel had broken the ground, was by Plowman. Then

H. M. Lynn was appointed. Under his labors, a bethel was built at Paradise, one mile from the county town, Clearfield, and dedicated on November 7, 1870. Loucks, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, did the preaching. March 23, 1872, the East Pennsylvania Eldership Standing Committee directed its Secretary to write to the West Pennsylvania authorities, requesting the transfer of Clearfield county to the former Eldership. This was done about May 29, 1872. Work at Wallaceton, Clearfield mission, was in good condition in 1871. A union house had been built, but the majority party soon demanded rent from the church of God. T. M. Still was sent to the mission by the East Pennsylvania Eldership. He had a successful revival in the United Brethren house of worship in the Spring of 1873. The need of a bethel was keenly felt, and the project was strongly urged by H. A. Shimmel, who secured the gift of a lot for that purpose from the "land owners." At a meeting held in Laurel Run school-house it was finally decided to build. The house was finished and dedicated December 7, 1873. Sigler was the preacher, assisted by the pastor, T. M. Still.

The church at Shippensburg, with its energetic pastor, G. Sigler, decided in 1870 that they needed a new house of worship. They entered into a contract with a builder to erect a new bethel at a cost of $11,090.00 and the old building. It was ready for dedication by the time of the convening there of the Eldership, on November 13, 1870, when W. O. Owens preached an admirable dedicatory sermon from Hag. ii. 9. The building was of brick, two stories.

In Germany Valley, Perry county, under the labors of S. S. Richmond, a bethel was built in the Summer of 1870. It was dedicated November 27, 1870, by W. L. Jones, assisted by the pastor.

The church at Plainfield, Cumberland county, dedicated their new bethel October 16, 1870. Sigler officiated at the dedication.

At Churchville (now Oberlin), Dauphin county, the church joined the Hoffmannites, a small body which had seceded from the United Brethren Church, and erected a house of worship in the Summer of 1870. J. M. Carvell was pastor. Joint dedicatory services were held September 12, 1870. A minister of the Hoffmannite Church preached in German on Saturday evening. On Sabbath morning two sermons were preached, one in German by a Hoffmannite minister, and one in English by C. H. Forney. A German sermon was delivered in the evening.

Mechanicsburg rededicated its renovated and improved church building December 4, 1870, Sigler occupying the pulpit.

At Rohrertstown, where years before work had been done, the interest was revived under the diligent labors of J. A. MacDannald. On March 22, 1871, the matter of building a bethel was seriously discussed. The church was organized with twenty members on April 23, 1871. Considerable outside pressure was brought to bear on the little company and its earnest pastor not to defer the matter. But two years were permitted to elapse before the project took tangible form; meanwhile the church worshiped in the school-house and in private houses. S. C. Stonesifer succeeded MacDannald, and under his labors the building project was revived and work begun, so that on July 20, 1873, the corner-stone was laid, Forney, Brady and Weishampel, with the pastor, conducting the services. The house was finished and dedicated November 23, 1873, B. F. Beck preaching the dedicatory sermon, assisted during the day by A. Wiley.

At Ellwood, Schuylkill county, Pa., also called Port Mifflin, and Suedberg, I. Hay held an unusually successful revival in April, 1871. He reported eighty-five conversions, and the organization of a church of thirty-eight members, explaining that very many of the converts were members of the New Lutheran Church. During the year they matured plans to build a bethel, and began the work in the Spring of 1872, laying the corner-stone May 19, 1872. I. Brady and J. M. Carvell assisted Hay, the pastor. During the Summer the house was completed, and on November 17th it was solemnly set apart for divine worship. The ministers officiating were Carvell, Sigler and Hay.

Under the labors of D. Townsend the church at Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., repaired its house of worship, which was rededicated July 23, 1871, by Forney, Laverty, Sigler and J. Kennedy.

The church at Andersontown, York county, Pa., with W. L. Jones as pastor, rededicated its improved church building December 10, 1871. J. B. Soule officiated, assisted by R. White.

The rededication of the bethel at Fredericksburg, Lebanon county, Pa., under the labors of I. Hay, took place January 21, 1872. Brady, Laverty and S. Smith did the preaching, Laverty preaching in English and the others in German.

W. L. Jones having been transferred to Morrison's Cove, he succeeded in building a bethel at Fairplay, Bedford county, which was consecrated June 9, 1872, by R. White. Also at Waterside, Bedford county, he succeeded in the erection of a bethel. Here the church had been holding services in an old shop. J. Shoenfelt donated ground in 1873, on which a bethel was built, which was dedicated June 16, 1873. R. White and P. D. Collins preached the sermons.

An old landmark disappeared in Linglestown, when in the Winter and Spring of 1870 the original bethel built in 1827 gave place to a new, two-story building, projected under the labors of T. M. Still, who in April was succeeded by Simon Fleegal. The corner-stone had been laid on October 17, 1869. It was dedicated June 12, 1870, W. O. Owen preaching in the morning, and C. H. Forney in the evening, when the ordinances were observed.

At Donaldson, Schuylkill county, S. Smith, pastor, a church was organized, which built a substantial bethel in the village, which was dedicated on September 22, 1872. Laverty preached morning and evening in English, and I. Hay in the afternoon in German. They were assisted by W. G. Murdock, C. Noll, D. Shope and H. Borgner.

The rededication at Newburg, Cumberland county, took place October 27, 1872, under the pastorate of H. E. Reeve. Laverty officiated.

Under J. Cooper as pastor in the lower end of Perry county, the church at Duncannon worshiped in a school-house until the Summer of 1873, when they began to put into effect a resolve formed in November, 1872, to build a bethel. The house was finished and ready for dedication by January 25, 1874, when it was solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. Shoemaker, J. Hunter and G. W. Seilhammer did the preaching.

Roaring Spring, part of the Morrison's Cove circuit, at the time served by W. L. Jones, built a house of worship in the Summer of 1872, which was consecrated on December 29, 1872. J. R. Soule and R. White preached the sermons.

P. H. Clippinger, who soon thereafter ended his brief career, succeeded in repairing the old bethel at Rockville, Dauphin county, which was re-dedicated January 19, 1873.

The Woodbury, Bedford county, church built and dedicated its second bethel in 1873. The dedication took place January 11, 1874. Preaching by Laverty, assisted during the day by Simon Fleegal and the pastor, G. W. Seilhammer.

After J. A. MacDannald was transferred to the Fort Littleton circuit, Fulton county, seconded by the counsel and co-operation of J. G. Cunningham and the New Grenada church, he began mission work in Huntingdon, county-shire of Huntingdon county, and soon had plans in shape to build a bethel in the western part of the town. Dr. R. A. Miller agreed to donate a lot worth $200.00. A church of ten members was organized, and at least $400.00 secured in subscriptions. But they were not sufficiently encouraged to carry through a project so well begun and promising so much.

Up on the mountain the work succeeded better under MacDannald's labors. The mission, extending from Clearfield to Phillipsburg, Center county, prospered. And at the latter point he organized a church, June 28, 1874, of eight members.

At a point known as Mt. Zion, Lebanon county, there was an abandoned house of worship owned by the Methodist Church. It was on the Lebanon circuit, four miles north of Annville, within the circuit served by C. Noll. He had been preaching in the house, and a revival followed. Dr. Ross went out and bought the house, and had it repaired. It was dedicated May 3, 1874. The preaching on the occasion was by S. Smith and I. Hay in German, and John Price in English.

Work was begun in Stony Creek Valley, above Dauphin, in Dauphin county, the latter part of the Summer of 1874, in two school-houses, by B. Dochterman and O. J. Farling.

The church at Middletown, Dauphin county, under Sigler's pastorate, built a new, two-story, brick bethel in 1874, laying the corner-stone on July 8th. Sigler having been sent to Philadelphia, April, 1875, the house was finished under the labors of W. L. Jones, his successor. Slow progress was made, and the house was not ready for dedication until October 22, 1876. Price preached on Saturday evening, Sigler, on Sabbath morning, and Swartz, in the evening.

At Doubling Gap, Cumberland county, under the labors of J. M. Stouffer, a bethel was built during the Summer of 1874, and dedicated by D. A. L. Laverty, on September 27th.

W. P. Winbigler, on the West York circuit, succeeded in having the Fairview bethel removed to a new location, and rebuilt. The house was dedicated by G. Sigler on November 15th, assisted by the pastor.

At Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, with A. Wiley, pastor, the church, under the energetic efforts of J. Kennedy, in charge of the Soldiers' Orphan School, and a local preacher, built a fine new bethel in the center of the town, which was dedicated January 17, 1875. C. H. Forney preached in the morning, and G. Sigler, in the evening, assisted in the services by A. H. Long.

An awakened interest in church extension and mission work was also manifested in the Maryland part of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. Washington county afforded a good field for aggressive work. Fairplay was the first point at which substantial work was done. Spurrler, a hard-working, self-sacrificing minister, was the pastor. He enlisted the few families at Fairplay in the work of building a bethel, the corner-stone of which was laid by W. O. Owen, on September 3, 1870, assisted by D. Townsend. The house was finished and ready for dedication January 29, 1871, when Laverty officiated. The bethel in Zittlestown was built and dedicated in 1870.

At Brownsville, same county, J. E. Arnold began preaching in a school-house in August, 1870. Within a year a house of worship was built under his superintendence, which was dedicated May 28, 1871, under W. Palmer, preacher on the circuit, but J. E. Arnold preached the dedicatory sermon. Arnold had the missionary spirit, and as Fairplay and Brownsville are located within a comparatively short distance of Hagerstown, county seat, and Sharpsburg, he urged the extension of the work to these larger towns, where already a number of Church families resided. Accordingly it was ordered that work should be started there. The next pastor on this field, C. L. Amy, began to preach at both places. But the work was soon discontinued because Amy was found "guilty of misdemeanor unbecoming a minister of the gospel," and was suspended from the ministry, and finally expelled.

In Carroll county a mission was opened, called the Carroll County Mission, with P. D. Collins, missionary. He soon opened three additional points, with others calling for preaching. The prospects were most encouraging. He began his work in April, 1873, and by July the project of building a bethel at Warfieldsburg was practically decided. Soon after the work was begun, and on Lord's day, August 16, 1873, the corner-stone was laid by W. Palmer, assisted by Collins and D. Fuss. The new bethel was dedicated December 28, 1873, Palmer officiating, assisted by Fuss, Spurrler and the pastor. A great revival followed the dedication.

On December 21, 1873, the bethel at Samples Manor, Washington county, Md., was set apart for divine worship. P. Lookingbill was the pastor, and he secured P. D. Collins to preach the dedicatory sermon.

The South Mountain Mission, P. Lookingbill, missionary, promised encouraging results. It was in Frederick county, with Germantown as one of the principal points. At this point the school-house was used, but soon "the Lord put it into the hearts of the people to build a house of worship," and they pushed the work with such energy that on January 14, 1872, the house was ready for dedication. P. D. Collins preached the sermon.

This period promised much for the work in Virginia and that part of West Virginia belonging to the East Pennsylvania Eldership. Though an old slave State, the ministers of the Church found ready access to the people, but the Eldership did but little directly for the field. W. McElroy was the missionary, and he was unwearyed in his efforts to advance the cause. He labored in Berkeley and Jefferson counties, W. Va., and in Loudoun county, Va. These counties border on Maryland, south of Hagerstown. February 8, 1870, he reported the organization of a church between Mt. Hope and Gum Springs, in Loudoun county. "This is something new in these parts," said the "Washingtonian," published at Leesburg, Va. At "Bro. Davis's", four miles west of Hedgeville, Berkeley county, McElroy held a successful meeting in a school-house and organized a church, which "intends to build a bethel." In February, 1872, Spurrler went over to help to erect this house, he being a mason as well as a preacher, which was finally completed and dedicated September 13, 1874. Lookingbill officiated at the dedication. At Pipertown, Jefferson county, a church of sixteen members was organized in 1874. In 1874 C. L. Amy was sent to serve the Virginia Mission. He removed to Martinsburg, Berkeley county, W. Va., and began preaching there in April, in King Street Hall, where on December 6, 1874, he organized a church of "good substantial members, being the third organization in the State." He had six appointments.

Some progress was made in the work among the German churches in East Pennsylvania, although there was a growing tendency to return to the English Eldership. In 1870 there were two active ministers in the field, but in 1874 there were four. Snyder worked northward from the Mahantango Valley, Schuylkill county, and organized a church in Mt. Carmel, Northumberland county, the first church of God in said county. It was small, consisting of seven members. He opened four additional points during the year; Grim added three points to his field, and Eli Sowers, one. The total number of organized churches adhering to the German Eldership in 1870 was nine. In 1871 Snyder organized a new church at White Horse Station, on the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Railroad, near Pine Grove, Schuylkill county. The Kimmel Will was upheld by the Schuylkill county Court; appealed to the Supreme Court, and the decision of the lower court affirmed in 1874. This gave the German Eldership an estate estimated to be worth $16,000.

Apparently no more clearly providential and propitious opening for missionary work had yet presented itself to the East Pennsylvania Eldership than that in Maine and New Brunswick in 1871. There were three or four small Baptist bodies in Maine, which held doctrinal views almost identical with the faith of the Church of God. One of these, numbering from one to two thousand souls, had separated from the Free Will Baptist Church, which locally was known as the Star Baptists, patronizing the "Morning Star," and another the seceders, which were called Repository Baptists, as they patronized the "Repository" newspaper. Also the Primitive Free Will Baptists, as they held more closely to the "old landmarks." In 1871 H. Mills had organized a church which was called the "church of God." It was about 1847-8 when this division occurred, and separate organizations were maintained thereafter. In 1872 John Dennis, of Skowhegan, Somerset county, in the southwestern section of the State, learned of the Church of God and of its publications. He sent for The Advocate, and made himself better acquainted with the Church. He felt convinced that the "Repository Baptists," and possibly one or two other bodies, could be brought together under the more scriptural name of the Church of God. He called for a missionary to be sent by the East Pennsylvania Eldership. No man was more imbued with the missionary spirit and more alert for new openings for Church extension than Dr. George Ross. He at once planned a visit to Maine, and got the consent of G. Sigler to accompany him. It was a brief tour of inspection, made in an unpropitious season of the year. The Standing Committee, learning of Ross's purpose, appointed him and Sigler a Visiting Committee. They left Lebanon, Pa., on their tour of some 650 miles, to Skowhegan, Maine, on March 4, 1873, and were gone ten days. Sigler preached a number of sermons, setting forth the doctrine and practice of the Church, which seemed to be most cordially approved. Through the influence of Dr. Ross and J. H. Bodsecker, P. Loucks was induced to visit Maine in June, 1873. He spent most of his five or six weeks in Kennebec county, immediately south of Somerset, though he made excursions into Somerset county. More at large he preached the faith of the Church and its views on Christian union, which called out hearty responses of "Amen" and "truth." He preached these views at two of their Quarterly Meetings. On September 24th he made a second trip to Maine at the earnest solicitation of Dr. Ross, and attended a Yearly Meeting. Meanwhile the sentiments of the Church were being more and more widely disseminated, and a demand made for a missionary familiar with the views and principles of the Church to be sent among them. Accordingly the Standing Committee appointed J. W. Felix, who started April 1, 1874, for his distant mission field. He located in Kennebec county. But his stay was short, as he was released from the appointment by the Standing Committee August 26, 1874. But by this time sentiment had sufficiently crystallized to warrant bringing the brotherhood in Kennebec and Somerset counties into an organic form, and accordingly under the leadership of Mills, on September 19, 1874, the first Annual Eldership was held at Palmyra, in the south-eastern corner of Somerset county. A loud call for help issued from the meeting, as "doors are opening in every direction for labor, and Church of God principles are gaining ground."

The West Pennsylvania Eldership, including West Virginia and several counties in South-eastern Ohio, was not favorably located as to territory for Church extension work. The territory was not contiguous, but widely scattered, with long distances between fields of labor. It also invited limited emigration. But it always had a few earnest, persevering missionaries, although its ranks were often depleted by their emigration to western States, and two to Texas. West Virginia was good territory to work in after the Disciple influence began to decline. On the Irish Creek circuit a remarkable revival occurred at Windy Gap, Greene county, Pa., but under a West Virginia pastor, at which one hundred and seventy-four conversions were reported. The building of a bethel followed under the labors of James S. Marple, and was dedicated November 5, 1871, W. J. Davis, Joseph Grimm and P. Loucks officiating. There were estimated to be at this time six hundred members in West Virginia, and twelve organized churches. Being far distant from the Pennsylvania territory of the Eldership, except the counties in the extreme southwest, it was thought a wise thing to organize an Eldership in West Virginia. The work was also being extended southward, and the prospects were reported very encouraging. At Sugar Grove a bethel was built "by the citizens," under the pastoral labors of G. J. Bartlebaugh, in 1872. Another one was erected at Stull's Run, under the labors of L. F. Wilson. Also one at Mt. Union, where J. W. Davis was pastor, which was dedicated by P. Loucks on December 14, 1873. At Lower Proctor, Wetzel county, on September 13, 1874, a small church was formed.

In Pennsylvania, beside the territory served by West Virginia preachers, there was commendable progress made. A number of relatively large revivals were held and some new points established. At Ursina, Somerset county, under the labors of W. J. Davis, a new bethel was dedicated June 4, 1871. M. S. Pritts occupied the pulpit on Saturday evening; P. Loucks, on Sabbath morning, and J. S. McKee, in the evening. At Bully Hill, Venango county, also called Congress Hill, two miles from Franklin, county town, W. B. Long pastor, a new house of worship was built, which was consecrated on December 24, 1871. P. Loucks preached the morning sermon, and J. M. Domer in the evening. One of the most auspicious enterprises brought to completion was the mission house at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, where there had been preaching for some time by Loucks, whose home was "a few miles off." The "Mission Chapel" was finished and ready for dedication March 17, 1872, when J. M. Domer preached the dedicatory sermon. Under the labors of D. T. Leach a bethel was built at Rich Hill, Fayette county, which P. Loucks dedicated August 18, 1872, assisted by the pastor and J. Gallatin. At Harmony, Butler county, with J. Hovis as pastor, the bethel was dedicated by A. X. Shoemaker October 6, 1872. G. J. Bartlebaugh and J. W. Bloyd, joint pastors, built a bethel at Fall Run, which was dedicated the latter part of January, 1873, followed by a revival. J. Hickernell officiated at the dedication, and preached about two weeks thereafter with great power. Templeton, in Armstrong county, where in 1873 Bartlebaugh was pastor, repaired its house of worship in the Summer of 1873, and rededicated it on November 2, 1873. John Hickernell did the preaching, assisted by R. Vanaman, J. Grimm and the pastor. M. S. Pritts organized a church of eight members at Lyons school-house, January 18, 1874.

More work was done in the West Ohio than in the East Ohio Eldership territory. Serious trouble and much friction existed in the latter which hindered Church work. Yet there were redeeming features. For a time the Mansfield Mission was a hopeful enterprise. At first, in 1870, it was the Mansfield and Shelby Mission, with J. W. Senseney as pastor. On February 25th he had organized a church, with J. Myers, a minister who had located there, as elder, and J. Foreman, formerly of the church at Fayetteville, Pa., as deacon. In October, 1870, a contract was entered into to build a bethel, and the corner-stone was laid on November 6th. M. Coates was appointed by the Eldership to canvass for funds, and $3,000.00 was apportioned to twenty-one churches. On April 9, 1871, the lecture room was dedicated. This was used for preaching services until the house was finished. It was called "Trinity Bethel," and was dedicated September 3, 1871, with quite a debt resting upon it. O. H. Betts was appointed to succeed Senseney, and Coates to succeed Betts. Under Coates there was a somewhat extensive revival in February, 1874. And while the debt militated somewhat against the progress of the work, congregations were good. The debt did much to interfere with the final success of the mission by discouraging the brotherhood, which was constantly appealed to for funds to support it. Near Greensburg, Summit county, under the labors of S. Lilley, a house of worship was built in the Summer of 1871, and was set apart to the worship of God December 3, 1871. The preaching was done by T. Deshird, J. A. Plowman and O. H. Betts. The bethel at New Washington was dedicated under the pastorate of D. S. Warner and Thomas James. J. S. McKee preached the dedicatory sermon October 6, 1872. Though their experience with a union house jointly owned by two churches had demonstrated its unwisdom, the brethren of the church of God at Lattasburg and the United Brethren proceeded to repair their house in the Summer of 1872, and by November 17th it was ready for rededication. G. W. Wilson was the pastor, and it was arranged that he preach the evening sermon and Bishop Glossbrenner, of the U. B. Church, the morning sermon. The preaching points in Stark county had approached Canton on the north within such a distance that by 1867 it was deemed advisable to consider the wisdom of seeking an entrance into the county-seat. Oliver was appointed that year to the circuit, which included Stark county, taking charge April 1, 1868. But he got no nearer than the holding of a woods-meeting in the vicinity, which he had to turn over to M. Beck on account of illness. Beck was appointed to Stark circuit in 1868, and he began preaching in Canton. In 1870 he was appointed to Canton Mission, with Moreland and Stump's Bethel. The work made steady progress, with preaching at first every four weeks, and later every two weeks, up to 1873. The services were held in a log meeting-house under control of the Mennonite Church, and then in the Disciple house of worship. Plowman followed Beck in November, 1874. The mission was reported "in a prosperous condition, and is a success in every point of view," the church numbering "fifty efficient members." As late as April, 1875, Plowman held a special meeting in the Disciple house. At Cedar Valley, 7 miles northwest of Wooster, the second bethel was built in the Summer of 1874, and dedicated October 4th by A. X. Shoemaker. G. W. Wilson, M. Coates, L. Selby and M. Beck participated in the services.

in the territory of the West Ohio Eldership durable progress was made in every department of Church work. At Basswood, Williams county, probably the same as Madison, with James Neil and J. V. Updike as pastors, a bethel was built in the Summer of 1870, which A. X. Shoemaker dedicated on September 25th. — Snyder, J. Bumpus, Joseph Neil, brother of the pastor, and H. Pressler assisted in the services. In the country, 3 miles West of Upper Sandusky, Wyandot county, September 18, 1870, a new bethel was dedicated by T. Deshiri, D. Shriner and W. P. Small. With some Church families living in Tiffin, county town of Seneca county, and a church not far from the town, the Eldership was desirous to get a foot-hold in the town. It realized that first of all in such a place a house of worship of some kind was needed. Hence in October, 1870, a committee was appointed to "see if a house of worship can be bought in Tiffin." At South Bridgewater, Williams county, James Neil pastor, the church succeeded in erecting a bethel in 1871, which was dedicated December 31st, by O. H. Betts, who had J. V. Updike to assist him in the services. The Union Chapel, 4 miles northeast of Mendon, Mercer county, was solemnly set apart for religious worship on June 8, 1873. In West Unity, Williams county, where James Neil labored so efficiently, a house of worship was completed in the Fall of 1873, which was devoted to religious uses on January 4, 1874. T. Hickernell preached the morning sermon. M. Beck and A. Kline were also present. On December 28, 1873, a bethel was dedicated in Hardin county, by J. C. Seabrooks, A. Kline, J. Bumpus and W. P. Small, James Neil, pastor, with the church at Georgetown, Defiance county, completed a bethel at that point, which A. X. Shoemaker dedicated June 7, 1874.

Possibly with the ultimate object of beginning work in Toledo, county seat of Lucas county, the Toledo Mission was placed on the list of appointments of the West Ohio Eldership in 1873, with East Toledo as one of the points named. H. S. McNutt was assigned to this mission. He reported six appointments, and the organization of a church at Snyder's school-house, one at Crane Creek, Ottawa county, adjoining Lucas on the southeast, and one in the village of Martin, in the same county. On November 8, 1874, W. P. Small went into Toledo to "hunt a place to preach." He preached in a private house, and reported that the work there needs "a house, a man and means."

It took considerable time and the loss of quite a sum of money to divest the brethren of the idea of having Eldership tents. G. S. Petry, a fine German preacher originally from East Pennsylvania, in 1870 started a project to get a tent. It was to be called "The Union Tabernacle," and was to be owned by a stock membership, at $25.00 a share. In October, 1870, he had secured five subscriptions. Ross wrote against such a project, unless authorized and controlled by an Eldership, and warned subscribers that they are likely to lose their investments.

In the Indiana Eldership the event of special significance which occupied the attention of the brotherhood from 1870 to 1874 was the mission work at Ft. Wayne, county town of Allen county, third county south from the Michigan line, bordering on Ohio. The formal inception of the work may be dated April 1, 1871, when the Standing Committee appointed W. W. Lovett, "our young, energetic and worthy brother," to go abroad among the churches to collect funds to buy a lot and build a bethel. This action was based upon a resolution adopted by the Eldership in 1869, proposing "to open a mission in the city of Ft. Wayne, to be under the control of the Eldership, and the property to be deeded to this Eldership." It was "to be a center and rallying point for our Eldership." They were encouraged and commended by prominent members of other Elderships. November 4, 1871, the Board of Missions of the Eldership appointed a Building Committee. November 13th a lot was bought, and in November, 1873, a contract was made with Daniel Komp to erect the building, finishing it by June 15, 1874, if means are in hand. The building was beautifully located, and was 32 by 50 feet, with a tower over eighty feet high. Under Lovett as pastor, the house was dedicated June 28, 1874, by A. X. Shoemaker, leaving a debt of $300.00. John Martin and John McColley assisted at the dedication.

At Center Jackson, De Kalb county,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles south-east from Auburn, under J. Bumpus, pastor, a bethel was built, and was dedicated May 28, 1871. Mrs. E. McColley preached the sermon, and Smurrah and Bumpus assisted in the services. At Union, Adams county, under Lovett as pastor, A. X. Shoemaker, on August 20, 1871, dedicated a new house of worship. Mrs. McColley held another dedicatory service on October 1, 1871, at Monroeville, Allen county. In Kosciusko county, the church at Beaver Dam, built a bethel in the Summer of 1872. Their pastors were B. F. Bear and I. W. Lowman. The house was dedicated by Lovett on December 8, 1872. Under E. B. Bell's labors a bethel was built in the Egolf neighborhood, 4 miles north-east of Columbia City, Whitley county, which was dedicated on Whit-Sunday, June 1, 1873. The bethel at Flat Creek, Wells county, 3 miles south of Zanesville, was dedicated November 15, 1874. A church was organized by I. W. Lowman at South Wabash in the Winter of 1872-3.

"Michigan is favored with revivals," wrote B. D. Bright in the middle of this period. But, as he also stated earlier, it was "quite a disadvantage that the Church of God had so few houses of worship, as the ministers can not hold revivals" as others do. Shoemaker, in September, 1874, said: "As a people we have effected but little as yet in the State of Michigan; nevertheless, we have now some openings of promise." The work was also considerably scattered, yet fair progress was made from 1870 to 1875, in Allegan, Barry and Eaton counties, adjoining each other from Lake Michigan eastward, and in Isabella, Saginaw and Gratiot counties near the center of the State. At Callmo, Eaton county, Linsley, on April 14, 1871, reported the organization of a church, of which a Methodist minister became a member, and then the minister. At Maple Grove, Saginaw county, a bethel was dedicated by A. X. Shoemaker, on August 23, 1874. He was assisted by Gillaspie, Edwards and White. At Burnips Corners, Salem township, Allegan county, under the labors of S. D. C. Jackson, a bethel was erected in the Summer of 1873. The Ministerial Association of the Eldership was appointed to be held there October 27 and 28, and for convenience the dedication services were held on the 26th. A. X. Shoemaker officiated. B. D. Bright succeeded in building a house of worship in Casco township, Allegan county, which was dedicated by A. X. Shoemaker on Sabbath, November 29, 1874. Bright had also organized a new church at Casco on March 15, 1873. And in Isabella county I. W. Lowman organized a church of twelve members on January 15, 1874.

In Illinois interest so generally centered in the Chicago Mission, and its demands for money were so large relatively and incessant, that few new undertakings could be started. Mainly an individual enterprise, it had the hearty endorsement of all the Elderships and of the General Eldership, and from 1866 Shoemaker was appointed to the mission by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. But he was responsible for the means for the work and for his own support. The territory of all the Elderships was open for him to canvass, and he visited almost every church in the whole body, and many of them repeatedly, from 1864 to 1874. As an indication of what some of the stronger churches paid toward the mission an item in one of Shoemaker's reports is worthy of note. He stated that up to June, 1870, the church at North Bend, Iowa, had paid toward the mission $1,000.00. But by this time the churches realized that the burden was becoming very heavy. Also a spirit of skepticism as to the final success of the mission was beginning to find occasional expression. At this time—1871—came a call for an extra $1,000.00 for sewers and paving, and from January to June, 1871, there were repeated appeals published for means to meet these assessments. Friends rallied to Shoemaker's support, some of them seeking to revive the old spirit by representing that the great fire would benefit the mission, as many of the homeless families would locate in that section of the city. The membership, it developed about this time, was not increasing, and at the seventh anniversary of the formation of the church there were few persons in fellowship which had not moved into Chicago from churches in other parts of Illinois and other States. Shoemaker himself betrayed some faintness of heart, notwithstanding his indomitable spirit, at the now real future of his work which began to replace the imaginary. Reporting the seventh anniversary in 1872, he said: "I have always believed that God in his own time, and in his own way, will vindicate this work." In 1872 he was again reappointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership for a period of three years, with a proviso, that "a change in pastors may be made, if necessary, at the end of one year, or in two years." But the impression steadily grew that the work could be carried onward no further under Shoemaker, and in December, 1872, public demand was made that a new pastor be secured by the end of the first year of this three-year term. It was felt that to spend more money at Chicago under existing conditions would be wasteful. A new pastor, however, would have to be largely supported by the churches, and hence the suggestion that Shoemaker be released and put in the field as general collector. "Investigator," "A Friend of Missions," and others now published articles which foreshadowed final defeat. The plea was that with the limited success and the enormous cost it would be better to stop. The crisis had come. Yet the Board of Missions was not ready to quit, and so on May 31, 1873, it appointed W. P. Small pastor. He resigned October 15, 1873. At an extra session of the Board held at Chicago on this date it declared that it had no man for the mission, and it recommended that the Executive Board take the property, improve it and make such disposition of it as would bring in some revenue. A. J. Hull, of Michigan, was sent there as a supply, but remained only a short time. By request of the Board, the East Pennsylvania Standing Committee appointed A. H. Long, to take charge after J. Kennedy had held a special meeting; but he declined. And while several other Elderships, Iowa and Ohio, urged that the work should be continued, in April, 1874, the bethel, for the time, was closed. And at the meeting of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership on May 23, 1874, a resolution was passed "urging the sale of the mission property," and that "provision be made for the resumption of worship in some other locality in the City of Chicago." There was due Shoemaker $1,500, and other bills were unpaid. It was estimated that by the time all bills and dues were provided for the total amount the mission would have cost would be between $20,000.00 and $25,000.00.

But though this period closed with the dark shadows of disaster evidently hanging over Chicago mission, it was a period not void of encouraging and substantial progress. A new circuit was started in the Spring of 1871, called Maroa circuit, with R. J. Funk, of Iowa, as pastor. It consisted of Fairview, Belle Prairie and Friends Creek. At Spring Grove, Warren county, near Alexandria, a new house of worship was built and ready for dedication January 16, 1870. I. E. Boyer was the pastor, and he secured R. H. Bolton to preach the dedicatory sermon. Joseph Moreland was instrumental in the erection of a bethel, called "Macon Bethel," which A. X. Shoemaker dedicated on November 12, 1871. Moreland, "with a few of the leading men in the neighborhood," also built a house of worship about 10 miles south of Decatur, which was dedicated by Shoemaker October 8, 1871. "Zion Chapel" was built by a church composed almost wholly of Scotch people, converted during a revival held on Cedar Creek, under the joint labors of I. E. Boyer and J. M. Cassel. They at once began the erection of this house of worship, which was dedicated a little over a year later, March 17, 1872, by these two ministers. At Fairview, Macon county, 7 miles east of Decatur, a church was organized by M. S. Newcomer in February, 1871, of seventy-five members, which, under the pastoral labors of G. W. Thompson, built a bethel the following Summer. It was dedicated by Newcomer, November 5, 1871. The Mt. Carroll bethel, H. L. Soule, pastor, was remodeled and ready for rededication on the Sabbath of the General Eldership, June 2, 1872. G. Sigler preached the morning sermon. At Coalville, Ill., a meeting-house begun by the United Brethren, but which they failed to complete, was bought by a Board of Trustees, finished and dedicated as a Union house, under the labors of E. Fulton, by A. X. Shoemaker, June 23, 1872. In Ford county, under J. M. Cassel, pastor, a "Union Bethel" was dedicated July 13, 1873. H. L. Soule having gone to Decatur, in the Summer of 1873, the church at that place repaired its bethel, which Shoemaker dedicated December 21, 1873. He was assisted by I. E. Boyer, James Warner, O. V. Kenniston, A. J. Fenton and Jacob Bear.

In Iowa the work made regular, but not rapid progress. Several new missions were undertaken, and edifying work was done on all the old fields of labor. The first new house of worship begun during this period was in April, 1870, at Colo, Story county, in what the energetic pastor, A. Wilson, called "the geographical center of the State." As he did not find the church and people as ready to give as he had hoped, he borrowed the money out of bank on his own account, and went ahead. His faith was rewarded, and on September 17, 1871, the new bethel was dedicated by F. F. Kiner. Cedar Bethel, Louisa county, on W. Vance's circuit, was built more expeditiously. It was dedicated by R. H. Bolton on June 26, 1870. Within 3 miles of Fredonia, Louisa county, also on the circuit which Vance traveled, "Pleasant Grove Bethel" was built in the Summer of 1870, and was dedicated by Shoemaker on November 27, 1870. Six or eight other ministers were present, among them Megrew, Hollems, R. H. and B. F. Bolton and L. F. Chamberlin. This bethel some years later was destroyed by fire, and rebuilt. At Sand Prairie, Benton county, under W. D. Bowker, a new meeting-house was dedicated December 17, 1871. A. Hollems preached the dedicatory sermon. D. Gill and J. Kepford were present and preached during the day. The Stone Bethel, Lee county, had been the property of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. It was leased for ninety-nine years by the Harmony church, repaired and rededicated June 16, 1872. P. Loucks, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, officiated, aided by the pastor, R. H. Bolton, and B. F. Bolton. D. Wertz, in 1873, was pastor at Allen's Grove, Scott county, where a bethel was erected during the Summer. It was consecrated by A. X. Shoemaker on September 28, 1873, O. V. Kenniston assisting. The "Union Bethel," Cedar county, was built under the pastoral labors of J. D. Meads, and was dedicated January 4, 1874. D. Wertz and Mrs. M. J. Beecher-Wertz officiated.

There was during this period of 1870-1875, most commendable missionary activity in Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas, attended with encouraging success. In Missouri, Clark county, in the north-eastern corner of the State, was part of the Harmony circuit, Iowa. In 1870 R. H. Bolton was the pastor. The church at Peakesville was organized by him on March 31, 1870, and on April 4th it decided to build a house of worship. It was completed under the labors of B. F. Bolton, and was dedicated by I. E. Boyer on December 25, 1870. Arthur Shuler donated two lots on which the bethel was built. The privilege was reserved for other Churches to use the house when not occupied by the church. Nodaway county, in the extreme north-west corner of the State, was part of the Page county, Iowa, circuit. At Union Grove, in this county, a church of twenty-two members was organized in February, 1870. G. W. Thomas and C. B. Konkell preached here, followed by N. J. Howard. R. M. Pine entered Putnam county, on the Iowa line, in April, 1871, and established a regular appointment at Unionville. Keplinger preached at a number of points in Caldwell, Ray and Jackson counties, along the Missouri River, east of Kansas City, in the Summer of 1870. Clinton county, second county east of St. Joseph, on the Kansas line, became one of the most promising points in the State. A colony from East Pennsylvania settled near Cameron in said county, in April, 1870. Among these were P. D. Heffelfinger, S. Kendig, W. Row, D. Wolf, G. Sudsberry, John Miller, Jacob Long, W. Keesaman and their families, all Church of God people. It was known as "The Keystone Union Settlement." R. H. Bolton was the first minister of the Church to preach for them, and he organized them into a church of fifteen members in May, 1870. Services were held in a dwelling house just built, and used for day-school, Sunday-school and preaching. S. V. Sterner followed Bolton; and then came Konkell, and C. S. Bolton later. They put up with the inconvenience of worshipping in private houses and school-houses for some eight years. Near Osborn, De Kalb county, the next county north of Clinton, Joseph Moreland organized a church in June, 1872. At Polo, Caldwell county, adjoining Clinton on the east, J. Slaybaugh, a layman, constituted a church in the Winter of 1870-1. These three counties in 1874 were made a circuit, with good prospects of giving a pastor a living. In Ray county, adjoining Caldwell on the south, at a new village called Allenville, a "Union Bethel" was built by the church of God at said place, the Southern Methodists and the Baptists, which was dedicated December 3, 1871, R. H. Bolton and L. L. Moyer, Methodist Church, South, officiating. A church was organized in "McNeal's neighborhood," Nodaway county, in 1873.

South of the Missouri River the work was spread more or less over the seven counties below Kansas City, along the Kansas State line, and the next tier east, with Morgan near the center of the State. In the latter county W. Berkstresser was located, a Pennsylvanian, near Versailles, where Blakely preached occasionally in 1870, and where later a church was formed. In 1870 a church was organized at Camp Branch, Cass county. The churches at Pleasant Hill and Harrisonville, Cass county; Knobnoster, Johnson county; Versailles, Morgan county, and Sedalia, Pettis county, were formed into a circuit in 1871, and were to support Blakely, their pastor. There was also a church at Lisbonville, Ray county, and in April, 1874, Keplinger organized one at Round Grove, Lawrence county.

When in 1869 the Board of Missions of the General Eldership became alive and active, it prosecuted its work with meritorious zeal and energy. This fact appears in the number of missionaries in its employ and the means it secured for their support during the present period. From 1845 to 1869 it had not one missionary in the field. But for the years ending from 1870 to 1875, it employed at different times and for varying periods eleven missionaries, and spent in their support not less than $7,000, besides funds raised for the Chicago mission, and nearly $1,000 contributed for several successive years by a comparatively small band of sisters in East Pennsylvania under the leadership of Mrs. J. S. Gable, Mrs. Dr. Geo. Ross, and Mrs. J. Kennedy. Except Chicago, these missionaries were all employed in Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska. P. K. Shoemaker was for several years the missionary on the Kansas and Nebraska Mission, as he was located near the State line. He called himself "the Missionary of the West." He was an East Pennsylvania minister, brother of A. X. Shoemaker. He went as far north as Lincoln City, Lancaster county, Neb., Capital of the State, then but two and one-half years old, with two hundred houses. Here the General Eldership had a conditional grant of lots for a Bethel. He was succeeded by D. S. Warner, of Ohio, who was appointed to the contiguous counties of York, Fillmore, Polk, Hamilton and Seward, on the west of Lancaster. He organized a church in February, 1874, at Fairmount, Fillmore county, of twenty-four members. Also one at Cropsey and one at Evergreen; one in the Anderson community, Steward county, of sixteen members, and one other. The Andersons were from Broad Top, Bedford county, Pa., Church of God families. He had fourteen preaching places. The church in York county fellowshipped a Baptist minister, who became its pastor. When the family of Wm. Mooney, a deceased East Pennsylvania minister, emigrated to Crete, Saline county, Neb., adjoining Lancaster on the south-west, they called for a minister. Under instructions of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, Dr. George Ross and J. Kennedy visited Crete in 1872. They reported favorably, and on January 1, 1873, E. D. Aller, of East Pennsylvania, was appointed missionary at Crete. According to Aller's report, Crete was truly a godless town. When he reached there the number of Christians in the place was sixty, which was six per cent. of the population. But he soon gathered a small church. Bolton had preached in Crete in July, 1872, and immediate steps were taken to build a Bethel. Backed up in the enterprise by Ross and Kennedy, the work was pushed to early completion, and the dedication services were held October 20, 1872, by Bolton. He was assisted by Rev. Alley, a Congregational pastor at Crete. Bolton, on August 18, 1873, preached in Richardson county, the south-east corner of the State, where he organized a church which was known as the church in "Barada Precinct." The purpose to build a house of worship was at once agitated. At Barkey school-house, on February 6, 1874, Aller organized a church of fifteen members. The Iowa Eldership in November, 1871, established a mission in Elk Horn Valley, Neb., and appointed A. L. Nye as missionary. He located at Clinton, Stanton county, third county south from the South Dakota line, in the north-eastern part of the State.

The work in Kansas was in the north-eastern and south-eastern parts of the State, with one-third of the territory between the two districts unoccupied. In Washington county, on the Nebraska State line, Henry Aukerman, a layman, began holding prayer-meeting, which in 1871 resulted in constituting a church. C. S. Bolton preached at this point in 1873. He also labored in the adjoining county of Marshall. He organized churches at White Hall, French Creek and Barrett. In Nemaha county a church was formed at Kilmer's school-house. In Marshall county P. K. Shoemaker organized a church at Vermillion, April 12, 1874, and one at Wohlford school-house, April 26, 1874. At Vermillion they decided to build a house of worship. In the Spring of 1870 Keplinger moved from Missouri into Kansas, locating 6 miles south-east of Cato, Crawford county, on the Missouri line, second county north of the Oklahoma State line. In the C. B. Konkel neighborhood, 6 miles south of Cato, a church of fifteen members was formed in the Winter of 1870-1. The Iowa Standing Committee recommended Konkel, a member of the Iowa Eldership, to labor in that section as a missionary. Near Girard, Crawford county, February 19, 1871, Keplinger organized a church of fifteen members. He visited Bourbon county, of which Ft. Scott is the shiretown, and held a woods meeting not far from Ft. Scott. W. Shipman, of Southern Indiana, resided there, supposed to have been the first Church of God minister to locate in Kansas. In Crawford county Keplinger organized a church at the Barber school-house of twenty members, and one of six members in Ozark school-house. Contiguous to Bourbon county on the west is Allen county, where near Humboldt a small church was organized in April, 1872. Keplinger also went into the county next south of Allen, Neosho, and held meetings. He established an appointment at Mulberry Grove, Crawford county, in 1870. In 1874 he also organized a church near Cherokee Station, Kansas. C. S. Kilmer, who removed from north-western Missouri, licensed by the Iowa Eldership, preached at R. A. Slyter's, in Pottawatomie county, adjoining Nemaha and Marshall on the south, and formed a church of eight members.

As J. W. Keplinger in 1870 moved across the Ohio River into Lyon county, Ky., some 50 miles east of the Mississippi River, he began to do lay missionary work, mainly in the way of organizing Sunday-schools. He introduced several hundred copies of The Gem, and secured some subscribers for The Advocate. He reported enthusiastically "the good prospects," and all that he asked was "a good, active minister to visit them and see for himself." To this call Sandoe, of the Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership, responded in October of the same year.

The work in Arkansas began when in 1870 some members of the Church in Texas emigrated to Franklin county, in the north-west corner of the State, the second county east of Oklahoma, and the third south of Missouri. In 1872 Ober followed, and began missionary work, preaching two years in that section, leaving with one church of fifty members. At the Texas Eldership in 1873 he was regularly appointed to the Franklin county mission, with an appropriation of $125.00 raised on the floor of the Eldership. In 1871 the Eldership had licensed G. T. Bell, of Arkansas, "a young man of good natural ability, and full of the Holy Ghost," whom in 1874 the Eldership appointed to serve the Arkansas mission. Being so near the Missouri State line, Enos Hilton, licensed by the Kansas and Missouri Eldership, and living in Barry county, Mo., on the Arkansas line, he found "quite an opening for Church of God preaching in northern Arkansas.

Texas was neglected, and was calling for a preacher from the North. It needed "help, sympathy and prayers." There "are great openings for the Church in the State." For sixteen years Marple had been preaching there, and he felt that his work was done, so that both he and Ober issued strong appeals for ministerial help.

By 1873 a few Church families had emigrated to South Dakota, Clay county, bordering on Nebraska, in the south-east corner of the State. These called for preaching. So there were calls from Colorado, California and Oregon. D. Lewis and A. Longenecker removed to Oregon from Illinois in 1873, followed by G. M. Stroup, of Iowa. They urged the sending of a missionary to the Pacific. Thus the horizon widened, but the constant apology for not responding to these urgent calls was a want of men and means.

The history of the Freedmen's Mission, apart from what preaching among the colored people was done by Stanton and others, was short lived. In 1871 the East Pennsylvania Eldership licensed J. H. Gaines, and appointed him to the "Freedmen's Mission." He left Harrisburg, Pa., for Martinsburg, W. Va., and began a meeting on December 14, 1871, continuing it to the 26th "with some converts." Then he received a call "from the Freedmen at Marysville, Pa.," to which he responded, holding a special meeting there from December 31, 1871, to January 23, 1872. The project of building a meeting-house was at once proposed. Paul Miller offered the donation of a lot, and $184.00 were at once subscribed. A Building Committee was appointed, and the money was to be paid and the building begun when Gaines returned. In 1872 his license was placed in the hands of the Standing Committee, and his name disappeared from the Roll of the Eldership.

Contending for the faith in public debate was still somewhat prevalent between 1870 and 1875. One of the first was held at Burnt Cabins, Fulton county, Pa., in the Summer of 1871, between R. White and Cyrus Jeffries, a Swedenborgian minister, on the peculiar views of that Church on the Resurrection—that it is past, and the judgment is now in progress. The same year, at Colo, Iowa, A. Wilson had a debate with a Rev. Mr. Moyer, “leader of the sect called Soul-Sleepers,” on the kingdom of Christ as already established, and baptism for the remission of sins. In August, 1871, D. S. Warner and Rev. Baker, of the Disciple Church, debated the proposition: “The Church of God, of which I am a member, is the only Church of divine origin.” In March, 1872, a discussion began in The Advocate between Newcomer and G. W. Wilson on the “Secresy” question. Newcomer was an unyielding, almost fanatical, opponent of all secret orders, while Wilson was less opinionated and dogmatic, but a good apologist. The discussion continued for a good part of a year. D. S. Warner and Leonard Parker, M. E. Church, in June, 1872, debated the old subject of baptism. In the Spring of the same year the forum of debate on the ordinance of feet-washing was, by request of the Editor of “The Central Baptist,” St. Louis, Mo., transferred to his paper, and A. G. McCormick requested R. H. Bolton to defend the institution. This he did against B. F. Taylor and J. D. Murphy, of the Baptist Church. In the Fall of 1872 A. Wilson discussed baptism, washing the saints’ feet and the name of the Church of God with P. J. Russell, Christian Church. The same year he tried conclusions with a Mormon, I. N. White, on the question, “Is the Church of God of which I am a member the true Church?” May, 1873, a discussion of man’s spiritual entity; the image of God, and the conscious state of the dead was held between D. Blakely and Mr. Stoneway, in Moniteau county, Mo. A new disputant entered the arena of debate September 23, 1873, when, at Lorain, Stephenson county, Ill., J. H. Besore and Rev. Davis, of the Evangelical Association, were the belligerents on the simple question of immersion as the only baptism taught in the Scriptures. Warner, May 15, 1874, near Orton, Neb., defended the perpetuity and public observance of feet-washing as an ordinance against E. Evans, of the Disciple Church. The questions of the scriptural name of the Church; feet-washing as an ordinance, and literal water-baptism as essential to the remission of sins were the subjects of discussion between A. Wilson, and M. Nichols, of the Disciple Church.

Almost incessantly some controversy was in progress between ministers of the Church in The Advocate. The subjects took a wide range, and the discussions were participated in by scores of brethren. Nor were the amenities of fraternal debate always observed. The recrudescence of no subjects was so common as those of the titles of Elderships and the imposition of hands. The former was more or less discussed each year until the Fall of 1872, following the action of the General Eldership of that year. The relation divinely established between baptism and the remission of sins and church fellowship could for years not be so conclusively established as to put a cessation to controversy. And then for some years the second-work sanctification theory not only provoked controversy, but became a source of trouble in some local churches. There were too few real advocates of creeds to make the question of wide interest when an effort on different occasions was made to revive it. The question of the resurrection scientifically considered, and in relation to the Advent and the Millennium, awakened more than common interest as it was discussed at Ministerial Associations and editorially. The sin against the Holy Ghost on several occasions was carefully discussed, showing quite a divergence of views. Before the prevalence of “the faith healing” epidemic a protracted discussion of the “gift of miracles,” gradually drifting into the “gift of healing,” was carried on in The Advocate on the affirmative by J. Richards, J. C. Clippinger, C. C. Morston, Jesse Little and R. H. Bolton, and on the negative by Sandoe, Swartz, Newcomer and B. F. Beck, with Mackey, who had reached “no definite opinion.” It began in April, 1870, and continued with some interruptions until March, 1872. Bolton had been under treatment by Paul Carter, at his “Healing Infirmary,” and while in no sense infatuated, he declared that “Dr. Carter professed to possess the gift of healing, and has treated me most successfully.” He cited Winebrenner as teaching that “James v. 14, 15, is a recognition of the power of healing given to, and exercised by, the Apostles, according to Mark vi. 13, and that it was the design to continue this power in the church.”

Pentecostal meetings were now being held quite nearly in all the Elderships on Whitsuntide, the German Eldership having held its first one May 27, 1871; but there were signs of decadence which forecasted their early discontinuance. Camp-meetings gradually fell into such disfavor that the number decreased annually. Sunday-school conventions were becoming the popular gatherings, and were beginning to be held in nearly all the Elderships. Even the holding of "a General Sunday-School Convention" for the whole Church was discussed at the Iowa Eldership Convention in 1872, and but for "the great expense" would have been approved. It had the sanction of individual workers in other Elderships. Following the lead of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, by 1875 these organizations existed in all but two of the annual Elderships. They proved of such interest and edifying value as to give them elements of permanency.

Three events in the Temperance world greatly interested Christian people. The first was the revival of the prohibition sentiment. Prohibition was not only again made a live issue; but a party was formed of which this was the vital plank. It was organized in 1869, but held its first national convention and nominated James Black, of Pennsylvania, as candidate for President February 22, 1872, at Columbus, Ohio. The second, was the Local Option movement. Under a Local Option law passed in the Winter of 1871-2, the people of Pennsylvania voted on this question at a State election held March 26, 1873. About 15,000 of a majority were cast against it. These two movements were somewhat antagonistic. The former also made it a political question, and thus lost to some extent the church support. Its candidate for President in 1872 received but 5,607 votes. The third was the "Woman's Crusade," first inaugurated in Ohio in 1873. The women in bands visited saloons, sang, prayed and expostulated with proprietors to close their houses. Like a prairie fire it swept through nearly all the Northern States to the Mississippi River, and also into some Southern States.

Of less interest to the churches of God were some more purely religious events. Of these was the great reunion of the Old and New School Presbyterian Churches, which occurred at Philadelphia May 19, 1870. Then also, the same year, the loss to the Pope of Rome of his temporal domain, and the declaration of the Pope's Infallibility by the Vatican Council. The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1870 by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The same year the Old Catholic Church seceded from the Roman Catholic Church on account of the dogma of Infallibility. The final adoption of lay delegation by the M. E. Church, North, occurred in 1870. The Reformed Episcopal Church was organized in 1873, as a result of disaffection of certain prominent men by reason of the restrictions placed upon them by the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which they were members. Doubtless the best fruits of the "Woman's Crusade" was the organization on November 17, 1874, at Cleveland, Ohio, of the W. C. T. U., whose work has been strongly endorsed by all the Elderships year after year.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHATEVER connection there may be between the adversities and failures of a body of people and internal difficulties and troubles is a problem for the psychologist, and not for the historian, unless he chooses to enter the domain of the philosophy of history. But as the historian deals with facts, he can not overlook the frequent coincidence of the two classes of facts here noted. It is evidently true, as Rollin observed, and Plutarch before him, that "adversity alone can place greatness of soul in its full light, and render the real merits of men conspicuous." He also quotes Cato as saying that "Adversity, in humbling the spirit, restores us to our reason, and teaches us what is necessary to be done." But experience also teaches that adversity often weakens the ties of friendship and fraternity. Sparks of dissension more readily kindle a fire. The serpent-seed of discord finds too often good soil on which to bear unhappy fruit when hearts are wearied with disappointing toil. Shipwrecked hopes often fill men's hearts with suppressed bitterness and hatred; and then, if controversies arise, they are conducted with indecent acrimony. Criminations arise, misunderstandings develop, resulting in wretched quarrels and irreconcilable disputes among those who call themselves Christians and brethren. These violent contentions often make a Church, which should be the Zion of peace, in consequence of the selfishness of the natural man, to become the Babel of confusion. James speaks of envying one another as the great spring of strifes and contentions, in the third chapter of his Epistle; but in the fourth, of a lust after worldly things, and setting too great a value on worldly pleasures and friendships. This, he seems to say, "carried the divisions of the Jewish Christians of his time to a shameful height," says Henry. Whether or not a solution is here suggested of the coincidence of adverse conditions in the work of Church extension of the churches and Elderships in 1875-1880, and the internal troubles which prevailed, the facts are conspicuous and must attract attention.

Notice the blight which befell the work in Nebraska so auspiciously begun during the previous semi-decade, and awakening so much missionary enthusiasm. The bethel at Crete, the first one built in the State, was destroyed, in July, 1875, at least to such an extent as to be "unfit for use." About the same time began the grasshopper plague, which devastated almost the entire State for successive years, and parts of Missouri and Kansas, making those who remained dependant on public charity. Not only did it practically put an end to aggressive work in that section, but the existence of some churches already organized could not be maintained. Some of the missionaries and scores of Church families removed to other States, and the devastation of the country seemed inevitable.

The utter failure of the Chicago Mission, toward which more than a score of thousands of dollars had been enthusiastically contributed, was not fully realized until the General Eldership in 1875. It threatened to prove disastrous to all plans to establish churches in the large cities.

Toward the close of this period the almost despairing cry was heard concerning the Fort Wayne, Ind., Mission, "Do not let it fail!" "Save the Fort Wayne Mission!" But it also failed.

Mansfield Mission, after an auspicious beginning, and the expenditure of quite an amount of funds contributed by the churches in Ohio, finally had to be abandoned and the property sold.

In the East Pennsylvania Eldership the work at Carlisle was suspended and the property sold. And the mission in the city of Reading was in such a hopeless state in 1878 that "the church was actually in a disorganized condition" when Snyder was sent there to revive it, and "the bethel had been closed." It was too late, and the work was finally abandoned.

During and following these disastrous events most of the Elderships had their internal troubles. Even in the Nebraska Eldership, which began its existence almost simultaneously with the advent of the grasshoppers, had some more or less serious dissensions. Charges were preferred against one of the missionaries, which produced bitter feeling and considerable alienation. The Standing Committee stepped in to save a church which was being rent in twain by acts of discipline, at which "witnesses were sworn," who testified at the hearing. It also expelled a local elder and one teaching elder from the Church of God for "continual railing against the Church of God," and for "abusive language." This trouble threatened to spread by being brought into The Advocate.

In Iowa one of the missionary collectors was made the subject of somewhat serious charges, which naturally became a widening circle, and until cleared up interfered with the raising of missionary money, and cast discredit upon missionary agents and upon the system. Another minister was disfellowshipped for acts of insubordination. The spirit of unruliness was indeed somewhat epidemic, and developed instances in other Elderships. Thus in Illinois the Standing Committee had to deal with three cases of ministers who defiantly disregarded the provisions of the Constitution of the General Eldership in the matter of co-operation, and of the Illinois Constitution. One pastor from another Eldership persisted in his refusal to become a member of the Illinois Eldership. He "took an independent stand," declared the Standing Committee, so that it felt it to be necessary "to withhold official connection with him." This resulted in further troubles in the church which he served, which seemed in danger of disruption and death. Another pastor disregarded the provision of the Constitution by leaving his circuit without the approval of the Standing Committee, and was strongly censured. And a third was charged with violating the General Eldership Constitution by removing, without a transfer, into the territory of another Eldership and not handing in his transfer. Yet another member of the Eldership was denied an "open transfer."

Indiana Eldership was obliged to discipline one minister for "his schismatical course," and pronounced him "unworthy of confidence and fellowship." Another minister was expelled under such circumstances as threatened to involve the Standing Committee in a civil suit, as well as to create friction between that Eldership and the East Ohio Eldership. It sharply censured the last named body for granting said minister a transfer, with a clear recommendation, while it laid itself open to an action at law for publishing not alone the facts, but declaring it to be their opinion that he was "unworthy of the confidence of any person, and unworthy the name of citizen."

In Ohio several ministers were expelled, and for heretical teaching; one for insubordination, and one for "bringing reproach upon the Church." Extreme measures were also found necessary in dealing with what the Standing Committee declared to be "disloyal members" in one church, and "persistently insubordinate" members in another church, both classes being expelled from their churches by the Standing Committee.

The Maryland and Virginia Eldership found it necessary to discipline one minister for "violating the Rules of the Church of God and the usages of the Eldership."

The contentions between the churches in Schuylkill and Lebanon counties, Pa., and the German Eldership were chronic, as were also the troubles between said Eldership and the East Pennsylvania Eldership. But in the latter body there were acute troubles. Personal alienations entered more or less into these, some from local causes, and some growing out of the Chicago Mission failure. A division occurred in the church at Lancaster, which resulted in the organization of Salem church of God. The rejection of an article by the Editor of "The Gem" was made the occasion of charges before the Board of Publication. There was unusual friction in the Eldership, evidencing an unhealthy moral and fraternal condition, no doubt partly explained by the words of James.

Whether cause or effect, it was conceded that at this time there was an evident "decline in religion" in the different Elderships, with redeeming features as the revival movement under Moody began to make itself felt in ever widening circles. And then credit must be given to the influence of the great revival of missionary interest in 1869, yet unspent, in carrying the Church safely through the storms and the calm incident to these failures and contentions. For the work did not stand still. The spirit of aggression survived, and the churches and the Elderships turned their attention to other fields.

Not for twenty years, or since "the great awakening" of 1857-8, with which it was compared, had there been such remarkable and general revivals as during the early part of this period. The same conditions existed in the religious world from 1843 to 1857, that were witnessed between 1858 and 1876. Spiritual movements were slow, heavy and sluggish. Revival work languished. But as in 1857-8 the tide turned, and a glorious inflow was realized, and Christianity achieved splendid results, so in the Winters of 1876, 1877 and 1878 there were revivals of wonderful power. The most remarkable was in the Winter of 1875-6, but the whole period from 1874 to 1880 was one of the spiritual eras in the history of American Christianity. The work began under the leadership of Dwight L. Moody, the most conspicuous example of lay preaching in modern times. Assisted by the incomparable singer, Ira D. Sankey, vast concourses of people in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago were powerfully swayed, and thousands were added to the churches. Moody came to Philadelphia upon invitation of a large committee of ministers representing every Protestant denomination. The old freight depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad, Thirteenth and Market streets, was secured and fitted up in which to hold the meetings. Ten thousand, nine hundred and sixty chairs were placed in the building, all of which at many services were occupied. The meetings began November 21, 1875, and continued uninterruptedly until January 16, 1876, during which time it was estimated that Moody addressed 869,000 people. The numbers converted are not definitely known. The total cost of preparing the building and carrying on the meeting for two months was in round figures $30,000. People came to the meetings from a radius of over 100 miles, as many as five hundred coming in on trains in one evening. These carried the revival spirit into their home churches, until the whole of eastern Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey and Delaware was ablaze with revival fires. In these revivals the churches of God largely shared. From different points reports came of unprecedented works of grace. The pastor of the church of God at Middletown wrote: "Such a movement as this has never taken place in this town." Similar reports came from many other points east of the Susquehanna river. From Elizabethtown it was reported that "the house is filled to overflowing every night." Many of the meetings in the larger towns were union meetings. One of these was held at Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., which was never equalled. The number of converts in the town and country for 10 miles around was estimated at five hundred. The whole Cumberland Valley was aflame with revival enthusiasm. On a smaller scale the work extended across the mountains and westward as far as Kansas. At Center Bethel, Westmoreland county, Pa., as many as twenty to twenty-five penitents were at the altar on some nights. At Puttstown, Bedford county, there were one hundred and twenty-seven reported conversions; at Auburn, Schuylkill county, seventy converts were reported. In the Winter of 1876-7, Moody held a meeting in Chicago similar to the Philadelphia meeting, but not equal to it in power and influence either in the city or the surrounding country. The meeting continued eleven weeks, during which time three thousand conversions were reported and one thousand drunkards reformed. It was estimated that six hundred and forty-five thousand people attended these meetings. Special attention was given to the reclaiming of drunkards, as the meeting was coincident with the revival of the temperance work under what was known as the Murphy Movement. This movement began in Pittsburg, Pa., in January, 1877, under the labors of Francis Murphy, of Maine, himself a reformed saloon-keeper and an inveterate drinker. From Pittsburg the work spread eastward and westward, the churches and religious bodies earnestly co-operating with the movement. By 1879 more attention was given to local option. It was considered by many to be peculiarly a moral issue, and churches and Elderships espoused it with general unanimity. Others regarded it as a political movement, disassociated from legitimate church work. Prohibitionists generally opposed it, thus creating division in the ranks of Christian workers.

With unquenched zeal the churches of God continued diligent in the work of the Master in every department of Christian endeavor. The revivals of the period added hundreds of new and enthusiastic members to the churches, men and women not wedded to old traditions, but ready for new methods and new enterprises. Yet the disposition and tendency to preserve what is established was strong enough to prevent either the introduction or radical innovations, or the abandonment of existing institutions. To some of these many of the older members were almost conscientiously attached. This was true of camp-meetings, for the continuance of which strenuous efforts were made, despite the burdens they imposed, the absence of any real need and the discouraging results. As a partial substitute grove meetings were held by many churches in all the Elderships. But in 1875 four camp-meetings were held, two in East Pennsylvania Eldership, one in Venango county, West Pennsylvania, and one on the Toledo Mission, western Ohio. In 1876 only three camp-meetings were held. The idea of holding Eldership camp-meetings was first suggested in Iowa, in 1876. The Standing Committee on June 5, 1876, appointed Besore, Bolton and Murray "a committee to mature a plan for the organization of a Camp-meeting Association." But this committee reported at the Eldership that "the action was not complied with." By persistent urging, eight camp-meetings were held in 1877, one in Maryland, four in East Pennsylvania and three in Ohio. In 1878 Ohio held but one camp-meeting, Maryland two and East Pennsylvania four. An effort was made to unite all the churches in East Pennsylvania in the holding of one general camp-meeting, under the management of a committee named by the Eldership. It was held on the grounds of the M. E. Camp-meeting Association, near Oakville, Cumberland county, and was considered a success. It was repeated in 1879, during which year eight camp-meetings were held, one of them in Maine. The Ohio Eldership followed the lead of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and held an Eldership camp-meeting near Smithville, Wayne county. The effort to hold an Eldership camp-meeting in West Pennsylvania the same year failed. Results during these five years were exceedingly meager. A Pittsburg paper reviewed the camp-meetings held by the Methodist Church in 1877, and stated that the "general verdict is that they have not proved a success." And this view was endorsed by The Advocate by the careful citation of facts.

Pentecostal meetings of a general character were destined not to be as long-lived as camp-meetings. Much as they were acclaimed for a few years, they had in them elements of weakness which served to forecast their early discontinuance. Decadence was noticeable already in 1876, when they began to become more local in character, and in 1878 when the Indiana Standing Committee voted against having one, and the Ohio Standing Committee voted two to three in favor of suspending them, though the Rules required two to be held annually, and two were held, but were local. East Pennsylvania Eldership, where they originated; Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa and Nebraska held Pentecostal meetings in two or more of the five years of this period. The meetings were of a highly spiritual character, tending to deepen the piety and quicken the spiritual vitality of the churches where they were held. The effect of the revivals and of the zealous work of the ministers and churches during and following them is given in the statistics compiled by A. Snyder, and published on December 26, 1877, as follows: Number of annual Elderships, 13; number of licensed preachers, 384; number of preachers in active service, 193; number of preachers licensed during the year, 39; number of circuits, 117; number of stations, 30; number of missions, 35; amount of missionary money collected during the year, $2,906.81; probable number of members, perhaps not far short of 50,000. Snyder also kept an account of the conversions and accessions to the churches of God as reported during the year of 1878, and in July, 1879 published them as follows: Conversions, 4,237; accessions, 2,958; baptized, 1,428.

Ministerial Associations were held once or twice a year in all the annual Elderships except the Texas, the Maine and German Elderships. To reduce the expense to the ministers they were often held in connection with some other meetings, such as the Pentecostal meetings, or the Eldership sessions, or Conventions. Their main object was the edification of the ministers. In some of the details they differed. Most of them began with a sermon the first evening, and the discussion of specially assigned topics during the other sittings. But in some Elderships more sermons were delivered, on subjects or texts designated by the committees on programs. In some Elderships exegeses of special texts were a regular part of the program. It was quite customary to have a critic, whose duty it was to pass rigorous judgment on addresses; to point out faults in syntax, diction, manner, gestures, and in general to submit critical observations and detailed examinations and reviews of the work of the members of the Association. It was thought by many to be an office exposed to faults and dangers, which in itself might seem to invite severe criticism. And Brewer could be quoted: "Nay, if you begin to critic once, we shall never have done." The office did not long survive. The topics took a wide range, although a little close observation shows that many of the same topics, a little varied in phraseology, were on the programs of different Associations in the course of a year or two. Current questions outside of a doctrinal and practical and religious character were generally ignored. Looking over the topics of this period one will find such as these: Church fellowship, what is it, and what are the terms and conditions? How can we best promote a revival of religion? The qualifications needful for an efficient ministry. Should manuscript be used in the pulpit? Do the soul and spirit have conscious existence after death? The order of the ordinances. The change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week. Regeneration, in a variety of forms. Conscience as a guide. Forms of modern infidelity. In what does the happiness of heaven consist? Conditions and proper subjects of prayer. How to bring the elements, lay and ministerial, in the Eldership into the most effective service for the Church. Best methods of preparation for the ministry. How to best care for converts. Family religion. What is the best way to deal with local church difficulties? Prayer for the influence of the Holy Spirit. Increased efficiency in the work. Hindrances to the promotion of Church work. True evidences of a state of grace. Instrumental music. Ground of justification. Christian perfection. Call to, and qualifications for, the ministry. Prayer-meetings. What is sanctification? Christian union. The Bible and its origin. How to secure and promote a healthy church state. Fasting. Christmas as a holiday. Are we observing the proper day as a day of rest? Jesus and his office work. In some Associations there was a question box, but it was not much more popular than the critic.

As many of the topics submitted for discussions at Ministerial Associations were questions on which there was a division of views, debates not unfrequently characterized the sessions, which needed guidance and restraint, just as those in The Advocate. For as there were those "whose words are not framed to tickle delicate ears," especially of opponents, so there always were writers who wielded somewhat venomous and virulent pens. Some of the questions discussed at these Associations had been canvassed in the columns of The Advocate, or vice versa. This was often for a purpose, as, for instance, the order in the observance of the ordinances, which was reversed in some churches in Indiana, and the churches in the German Eldership. There were two public debates between 1875 and 1880.

One was held at Osborn school-house, near Seward, county seat of Seward county, Neb., between D. S. Warner, of the Church of God, and C. L. Boyd, Adventist. The proposition discussed was: "The first day of the week has been set apart by divine authority as Sabbath or Lord's day." The discussion was the outcome of a series of addresses by Boyd on the Seventh-day Sabbath. So well did Warner defend the proposition, that at the close of the debate the congregation present voted thirty-six to sixteen that he had established it. The debate continued three evenings, November 23, 24, 25, 1875.

At Cedarville, Ark., in May, 1877, G. T. Bell had a debate with a Mr. Hyde, of the M. E. Church, on The New Birth. Bell had the negative of the proposition, "that natural water produces the new birth." He "claimed it to be spiritual water, or the gospel, which flows from the fountain, Jesus Christ."

A quasi public discussion took place in Harrisburg, Pa., on the subject of "The Washing of the Saints' Feet," between Dr. J. Swartz, pastor of Zion Lutheran church, and G. Sigler, pastor of Fourth Street Church of God. Dr. Swartz preached a sermon in his church against the ordinance, to which Sigler replied January 5, 1879. These sermons were followed by a brief newspaper discussion between the two pastors. Sigler's sermon and the newspaper articles were subsequently published in pamphlet form. The Eldership in October following specially commended Sigler "for his able and faithful defense of the doctrines of the Church." At different times and in various forms this subject was under discussion. In 1875 a writer in the "Findlay (Ohio) Jeffersonian," under the pen name of "Philip," attacked the rite as an ordinance, to which "Sincerity" replied in several articles in The Advocate. Editor Forney defended the ordinance in 1876 against a writer in the "American Christian Review," a Disciple periodical. Said writer based his argument on I. Tim. v. 10, where he affirmed that it is classed with good works; on any reference elsewhere by Paul to the rite, and on the want of evidence that it was observed in the primitive church. Editor Forney also reviewed, the same year, a sermon by Rev. Weible, preached in Lebanon, Pa., and published in a Lebanon paper. Weible laid special stress on the fact that feet-washing is mentioned only in one of the Gospels. Forney, in 1877, also reviewed "Homo's" contention that there is "no command or precept" for the observance of this rite. In 1877 Forney took issue with "The Christian at Work," which endeavored to prove that "Feet-washing was not instituted by Christ as an ordinance." He also published two articles in the columns of The Advocate presumably from members, if not ministers, of the Church, the influence of which he endeavored to counteract, one of which suggested a change of the time of day when to observe the ordinances, from the evening to the forenoon. The main reason given being "the accommodation of old members of the churches." The other one, while in form an argument against abandoning Feet-washing as a religious ordinance, yet the intimation that "a great deal is being said about the Church of God dropping Feet-washing," seemed to call for vigorous criticism. In connection with these discussions a hymn composed by Mrs. L. B. Hartman years before was republished. The impression often sought to be made that this ordinance has in modern times been accepted by few religious bodies was from time to time corrected. It appears that then and since the following religious organizations besides the Church of God either have at one time observed, or still continue to observe, the ordinance, viz.: Scotch Baptist Church in Nova Scotia, Seventh-day Adventists, Free-will Baptists; General, or Arminian, Baptists, Separate Baptists, United Baptists, Duck River and kindred Associations of Baptists, Primitive Baptists, Colored Primitive Baptists, Christian Connection, Two Seed Baptists, Brethren in Christ, United Zion's Children, Christian Union, Church of God and Saints of Christ (colored), Church of the Living God, Amana Society, German Baptists, Mennonites, New Congregational Methodists, United Brethren, United American Free-will Baptists.

As the observance of the Communion before Feet-washing was mainly based upon the words in John xlii. 2, "Supper being ended," Editor Forney in 1875 in a critical editorial showed that this was not the Lord's Supper, and also that it was not then "ended." But as arguments seemed ineffective in convincing brethren of their error in this matter, the subject was repeatedly revived and rediscussed. In 1878 "The Order of the Ordinances" was the title of three elaborate editorials, in which the whole question was reviewed and ample authorities cited in confirmation of the general practice of the Church.

ious forms would come up. As "modern miracles" it was claimed that Mark xvi. 9-20 assured the church of the perpetual presence of such a power. Others advocated it under the title of "divine healing," or "faith healing." But mind healing, or mind cure was regarded as a better diagnosis of the various cures reported. That this was nothing new, and that it was not essentially religious, was made evident in discussions during 1875-1879, in which different brethren participated. The excessive enthusiasm and unreasoning zeal of some advocates of faith healing made it necessary at times to use discipline; but by finding the true philosophy of the undeniable phenomena the harm which fanatics had the power to do was reduced to a minimum. The Church of God was not the only religious body which had to contend against the perversion of such truths as must be admitted in connection with this subject, or the facts which were credibly established. For nearly half a century, says A. T. Pierson, in a work published in 1905, the inquiry has excited increasing interest: "How far may we carry to the Lord bodily ailments in prayer and faith for healing?" This question could not be ignored, as bodies of believers, both numerous and respectable, affirmed belief in divine healing as a truth taught in the word, and as a fact of their own experience. Two duties seemed clear then: To restrain men and women from creating dissensions and schisms; and, to arrive at the real truth on the subject. This seems to have been the aim of discussions on what had the appearance of antagonism to the advocates of faith healing.

During this period there was a revival of controversies on Infant Depravity and Infant Salvation, by C. Price, in review of a sermon on the last subject by the Rev. W. B. Browne, Presbyterian Church, and by Editor Forney on "How are Infants Saved?" in answer to a question on the subject, in two editorials. The former topic was also discussed editorially in answer to "Truth," who reported a minister of the Church of God as teaching that "an infant is perfect depravity." The inadvertent insertion in the columns of The Advocate of a short paragraph which referred to "original sin," brought on a discussion between Editor Forney and James Mackey on this abstruse question. The book entitled, "The Christian Ordinances" is in the main a reproduction of a series of eight editorials, in which the pamphlet by James Quinter, German Baptist, on the Origin of Single Immersion, is exhaustively reviewed and answered. They were called out, as many other controversial editorials were, by the request of a subscriber "to answer the positions taken by Elder Quinter, and to defend the practice of the Church on the subject of baptism."

So little is said these days on the Premillennial Advent that it is not so easy to realize the controversies which were formerly conducted on this subject with considerable warmth. October 30, 1878, began a Pre-millennial Convention in New York, which created more than ordinary interest in this subject. B. F. Beck and C. C. Bartels, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, were present and were in hearty sympathy with the views advocated. Bolton reports that they returned brimful of the premillennial doctrine," which he characterized "a precious doctrine." Dr. Tyng's address on the subject was reproduced in The Advocate, while the Editor published strictures of the resolutions embodying the sentiments of the Convention. Other and minor questions were discussed briefly, and without creating general interest.

The Second International Convention of Sunday-school workers was held at Atlanta, Ga., April 17-19, 1878, and gave some additional impulse to Sunday-school work in the United States. East Pennsylvania Eldership had taken the lead, ten years earlier, among the churches of God in convention work; but nearly all the Elderships followed during the present period, Indiana holding its first convention in 1875, and Nebraska in 1879. There was much uniformity in the manner of conducting these conventions, and a similar line of topics was discussed. The first evening there was an address of welcome, a response, enrollment of delegates, report of treasurer, followed by voluntary remarks. The next morning the officers were elected, and then two or three subjects were discussed during each sitting by one or two whose names were on the program, "and others."

The earnestness and zeal with which frontier mission work was carried on is indicated by the men which the Board of Missions of the General Eldership kept in the field. Its territory then, embraced Michigan, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Indian Territory, and all the country westward. The following missionaries were in its employ in 1875, either during the whole year, or for different periods: G. E. Ewing, P. K. Shoemaker, I. S. Richmond, James Neil, G. F. McElwee, E. D.

Aller, D. Keplinger, D. Blakely, C. B. Konkell, C. S. Bolton, D. S. Warner. Of these, six were in Nebraska, four in Kansas and Nebraska, two in Missouri and one in Michigan. In 1876 it had W. H. Oliver in its employ as General Evangelist in Michigan, and in 1879 B. D. Bright held the same position. Four missionaries in 1876 were stationed in Nebraska, two in Kansas and one in Missouri. Most of these, with several additions, were continued during 1877. In 1878 the force was increased. In Nebraska were the following: E. D. Aller, W. R. Covert, J. Kager, C. S. Kilmer and A. L. Nye. J. A. Smith was employed in Texas; E. Wilson in Missouri and P. Shaw in Kansas. Changes during the year were sometimes made, and additional men employed. In 1879 the Board had calls for missionaries from Colorado and California, but could not answer them. It appointed G. T. Bell to Arkansas and Indian Territory; in Kansas it had M. C. Ogden and J. C. Forncrook; in Nebraska it had in addition to E. D. Aller, General Evangelist, W. T. Harris and A. L. Nye. E. Wilson was appointed to north-western Missouri, while E. Marple was General Evangelist in Texas. Of all those employed during this period none has labored with greater success in different departments of Church work and in different Elderships than Jay C. Forncrook. He was born in Wayne county, N. Y., December 23, 1845. In 1868 he removed to Battle Creek, Mich., and thence in 1874 to near Crete, Neb. Here he heard for the first time a sermon by E. D. Aller "on the distinctive doctrines of the Church of God." He was "thoroughly convinced that it was the truth." He was converted at a meeting at the Salt Creek school-house, nine miles east of Crete, conducted by John Barkey, on March 24, 1877, and united with the church of God newly organized at Salt Creek. In the Fall of that year he was sent as a delegate to the Nebraska Eldership, and while there he "was convinced" that he ought to enter the ministry. Without being an applicant, the Eldership voted him a license. On his return home he preached his first sermon at Salt Creek school-house. In the Spring of 1878 he visited north-western Kansas, and located land in Norton county, and in the Fall he started for his new home, but stopped during the Winter at Phillipsburg, Phillips county, where he taught school and also conducted some revival meetings, and organized one church. Resigning his school, he entered the mission field, at the solicitation of the Secretary of the Board of Missions. He succeeded in organizing two additional churches that Winter. In the Spring the Board appointed him missionary in Norton and adjoining counties, and he removed to the place he had located a year before. Here in the following Winter he organized the church at Clayton, Norton county, and during the same year the church at Brennenman's, in the same county, and one at Wallace Mills school-house. He also organized the church at Ellis school-house, 8 miles below Clayton, one of the strongest churches in that section; but which was unfortunately converted into a Disciple church under the influence of the missionary who followed Forncrook, and deserted the Church. This field he served for five years, except the year he was General Missionary in Nebraska. In 1883 he was called to Lanark, Ill., where he remained as pastor four years. Thence to Decatur; but at the end of one year he was prevailed upon to re-enter the mission field as General Missionary in Kansas. But soon after entering on his labors he was called to Ft. Scott, Kans., where he succeeded in establishing the church, and building a house of worship. After a successful pastorate of four years he resigned and accepted the Crawford county work. After two years on this field and one year as General Missionary in Missouri and another year in the same capacity in Kansas, he removed to Iowa, thus ending his successful career as a missionary.

A commendable record of results accomplished on the territory under the control of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership was made during these five years. And yet much of it was temporary, and necessarily neglected opportunities for doing greater good were often lamented. Missionaries had too large fields in many instances, and were employed for too brief periods. A. L. Nye, first sent to the Elk Horn Valley, Stanton county, Neb., 100 miles north-west of Omaha, was later appointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. He states that for three years he labored "with little or no success"; but in January, 1875, he organized a church. In July, 1878, he extended his labors into Knox county, on the Dakota line, and did the first preaching by a Church of God minister. He succeeded in organizing a church, May, 1878, near Oakdale, Stanton county. A little later he organized one at Millersborough, Knox county. In October, 1878, the Iowa Eldership appointed D. S. Guinter missionary to South Dakota. E. D. Aller was for a number of years the missionary at Crete and in Saline and Fillmore counties. For two or three years the work was greatly hindered by the swarms of grasshoppers which destroyed vegetation of every character. There were revivals, but the people who remained were too much perturbed and too poor to engaged heartily in church work. Times were hard, crops destroyed, and industries stagnant. This plague extended into Kansas and Missouri. In June, 1875, one of the missionaries said it was the darkest cloud that we have ever beheld. Another one wrote: "Grasshoppers have swept over our fair country and have laid bare nearly the whole country, east and west for perhaps 100 to 130 miles, and north and south about 300 miles. Nearly all the wheat, hay, tame grass and the growing corn, with nearly all the growing garden vegetables are eaten up." Even the foliage on the trees was stripped off. And in 1877 one of the Nebraska missionaries wrote: "A rain of grasshoppers fell on our fields, and in a few short hours every green thing in fields and gardens was destroyed." Yet there were calls for preaching, and revivals, as Howard, on the south-east Nebraska mission wrote. In York county, D. S. Warner, in June, 1875, organized a church of thirty-one members. And to such an extent were the ministers and churches encouraged that they conferred together on the advisability of organizing an Eldership in Nebraska. In January, 1877, the rebuilt Bethel at Crete was dedicated. A church was organized by Barkey, in Saline county, of fifty members, and another one a year later in Gage county. A new mission was formed November, 1878, embracing parts of three or four counties in Nebraska and Kansas, and A. B. Slyter, formerly of Michigan, appointed to it. J. L. Jackson organized a church in Fillmore county, in April, 1879, and one at Oliver's school-house. The work extended, by June, 1879, over a large part of eight or ten counties in the south-eastern corner of the State, besides the missions in north-eastern Kansas, in Norton county, Kansas, and in Stanton and Knox counties, Nebraska, making nine or ten fields of labor.

Among the missionaries in north-eastern Kansas was P. K. Shoemaker. His chief complaint was that fields were too large, as he said in 1875, and consequently points are often neglected and die. He was instrumental in building the first Bethel in Kansas, located at Vermillion, Marshall county. It was dedicated by his brother, A. X. Shoemaker, November 19, 1876. It cost $3,100.00, of which $900.00 remained unprovided for. C. S. Bolton also labored in the north-eastern section of Kansas. He traveled as far westward as Washington county, where there was a small church. Some work was done by him in Ottawa and Cloud counties, south of Washington, in the Summer of 1875. He organized a church in Pottawatomie county, in 1877, of seven members. A church was organized in Brown county, April, 1878, of ten members, by P. Shaw. More substantial work was done in south-eastern Kansas. It extended as far toward the north, as Osage county, where, in 1878, Peters had quite a revival and organized a church at Rock Creek of twenty-two members. And in 1879 he organized another one at the Booth school-house, of ten members. M. C. Ogden succeeded in getting a foothold in Reno county, over a hundred miles west of Ft Scott, where he organized a church in 1878. There was a bethel in this county in 1879, where N. Hill preached. In the Spring of 1879 a church was formed in Ness county, seventy-five miles further west, to which county five families emigrated from Indiana. This region was known as south-western Kansas. It included Kingman county, where in February, 1879, Ogden organized a church in Smutch Creek Valley, of nineteen members. In this county a bethel was built and dedicated October 29, 1879, under Ogden's labors, known as Keystone Bethel. R. H. Bolton preached on the occasion. He organized another church in Kingman county, of twenty-six converts at one of his revivals. J. H. Woodberry was traveling a circuit in 1879, composed of Wilson, Allen and Neosho counties, which he said was 160 miles in extent, and in May organized a church of eleven members in Wilson county. These counties are in the south-eastern corner of the State. Woodberry, J. M. West and J. E. Cunningham about this time began their machinations to organize a new and independent Eldership, which gave considerable trouble and did harm to the cause. His reasons were deviations "from the landmarks of Winebrenner"; "troubles in the Eldership," and "troubles in the churches." Woodberry had talents to do good work had he proved faithful.

Missouri interests were not so well looked after. Blakely had done some work in Saline county in 1875. Keplinger was missionary in Cass county, with eight preaching places. S. D. C. Jackson labored in Morgan county. Neither had special success. Woodberry was on the Nodaway county work, in the extreme north-western part of the State. He reported in 1876 that the work was "on the increase." He organized a church at Marysville, while R. H. Bolton formed one at Coatsville the same year. In 1877 Woodberry did good work in Atchison county, in the north-west corner of the State, where he had organized a church in 1876. J. M. West was his co-laborer in 1877, and he organized a church at Union Grove with seven members. In De Kalb and Harrison counties Blakely and E. Wilson conducted successful meetings.

Woodberry, in 1878, worked a little south-eastward into Caldwell and Ray counties, where he regarded prospects good "to work up a Church of God element." He had seven appointments. Blakely, in 1878, succeeded, "after ten years," in "building a house of worship at Keystone, Clinton county, which was dedicated in November, 1879, M. S. Newcomer, of Illinois, officiating. There was at this time another body of people called the Church of God, in Mercer and Harrison counties, on the Iowa line, which held views in all respects identical with those of the brotherhood. They originated in 1872, and at this time numbered one hundred and fifty.

The Kansas and Missouri Eldership realized the distinction it acquired when at its session on October 4, 1877, it appointed John P. Coulam to be a missionary in Alvingham, South Lincolnshire, England, his native place. He had returned thither on account of his health. The Eldership regretted its "inability to come to his aid in remuneration for his labors; but the Board of Missions of the General Eldership in the same month made an appropriation to him of $50.00. He reported four conversions later in the year, and on February 13, 1878, stated that he had "fairly introduced the Church of God teaching," and that he expected "before long to see a church of God organized."

G. T. Bell was the great missionary and revivalist in Arkansas and the Indian Territory. He labored principally in Franklin and Washington counties, in the north-western part of the State, during this period. In November, 1876, he organized a church at Boston, Madison county, adjoining Franklin on the north. Also one at Natural Dam, Crawford county, contiguous to Franklin on the west. His work was enlarging, so that he earnestly called for a missionary to be sent to his assistance. In November, 1876, he organized his third church. During the year prior to this date he had received one hundred and fifty members into fellowship. June, 1877, he organized a church at Cedarville, Crawford county. This year he extended his mission into Sebastian county, south of Crawford. At the Eldership in 1878 he reported having received three hundred and forty members and organized ten churches; but this may mean the total during the time he had been on the mission; but he was a remarkable revivalist, often reporting "revivals" at his regular preaching services. He is the only minister known to be on record as having a "revival" at a funeral service. In 1878 Bell started a mission among the colored people. He organized a church, into which he received two Methodist ministers, whom he "licensed to preach." He also held a camp-meeting this year in Franklin county, near Grand Prairie. In the same year he crossed the line into the Indiana Territory, where he reports organizing "the first church among the Indians," at Honey Hill, Cherokee Nation, composed of fifteen members. Riddle followed Bell in 1879, and organized a church at Mt. Vernon, Crawford county, Ark., of fifteen members. Among the members at Honey Hill was James Bennet, a carpenter and painter, through whose efforts "the Church of God was introduced to the Cherokee Nation." He began work among the Indians in 1877, and in 1879 he was appointed missionary to the Cherokee and Choctaw Nations. He organized a church at Caney, Flint District, Cherokee Nation. He had formerly been a preacher in the Baptist Church.

There was some improvement in conditions in Texas, where they were badly in need of a new man. Marple was still there, and during the year 1879 was General Missionary; but he urgently called for help. "Texas wants a preacher." He also made strong appeals for emigrants from churches North. The Board of Missions finally sent J. A. Smith, of Ohio, to succeed Marple. In 1879 he reported prospects good for the organization of three churches. There was at this time quite a religious awakening in Texas, and in proper hands the interests of the Church of God might have been revived.

It was hoped that a beginning of church work would be made in Colorado in the Fall of 1879, when D. B. Rendell, of the Maine Eldership, removed to that State. He reached Livermore on November 6th, and wrote that he would "try to preach the word of God."

In Michigan but little was accomplished. On March 1, 1877, James Haskins organized a church at Eavenson school-house, Gratiot county, all heads of families, consisting of fifteen members. He was followed by W. Seifried, who did successful work during the Winter of 1878-9 and later. He organized the church at New Haven Center in January, 1879. In Lenawee county James Neil and Lavina Alleman, pastors, succeeded in building a house of worship, which was dedicated December 16, 1879.

When in 1875 J. Garrigus and Snodderly and their families removed from Page county, Iowa, to Washington county, Ore., and three other families from other counties in Iowa, Garrigus urged the sending of a missionary to that country. He was seconded by the Editor and by the Secretary of the Board of Missions. S. V. Sterner, then of Missouri, offered to go; but there were no means to support him. In December, 1875, J. A. Smith submitted his name to the Board for missionary to Oregon; but the same answer had to be made. Meanwhile Garrigus began work by organizing a Sabbath-school and holding prayer-meetings. Calls for a missionary to be sent to Minnesota in 1877 had to be disregarded for the same reason. The want of men and means, two topics so often discussed, greatly retarded Church extension work.

In Iowa a good deal of aggressive and substantial work was done from 1875 to 1879. A. Wilson reported the dedication of a new house of worship at Alice, Grundy county, in 1875. At the historic spot where sleep the remains of E. Logue, near Trenton, Henry county, at Moorhead's Grave-yard, stands Green Mount Temple, which was dedicated January 31, 1875, by A. X. Shoemaker. J. S. Miller and W. R. Covert were also present. Another new house of worship, dedicated by Shoemaker, June 20, 1875, was built at Moneka, Cedar county. C. L. Wilson was pastor. A. C. Garner assisted in the services. There were now four bethels in Cedar county. Shoemaker also dedicated a new bethel near Grundy Center, Grundy county, on January 30, 1876. J. M. Klein was pastor. In the Spring of 1876 A. C. Garner removed to Sac county, Iowa, adjoining Ida on the east, the latter being the second county east of Missouri River. His post office was Sac City. He proposed to preach quite a good deal, supplying points which had no pastors. Such calls came from Sac, Ida and Buena Vista counties. Thus the standard of the Church was planted in the north-western section of the State. It was also about this time that A. X. Shoemaker first visited Ida and Sac counties on an inspection tour. He became a real estate agent, and sold lands to many brethren of the Church in Eastern Pennsylvania, who located largely in the country around Ida Grove. He preached at a number of points for nearly three years. When the propitious time had arrived, on April 27, 1879, church work was begun in Ida Grove, M. S. Newcomer on that day preaching the first sermon. At the Eldership in 1878, D. S. Guinter was appointed to the Sioux Mission, Iowa. This was in Sioux county, on the South Dakota line, and the second county south of the Minnesota line. Thus the Eldership territory now extended entirely across the State, from Des Moines county in the south-east corner, to Sioux county in the north-west corner. Guinter had moved to Canton, Dakota, in March, 1876, but did little, if any, work prior to the Winter of 1878-9, when he began his labors on the Sioux Mission and in Canton, South Dakota.

The history of Church work in Illinois during this period is somewhat brief, but indicates substantial advances. It begins with the dedication of the bethel at Buda, Bureau county, December 19, 1875, by A. X. Shoemaker. The house cost over $3,000.00, and was built during the pastorate of M. S. Newcomer. On October 3, 1875, under the labors of G. Sandoe, a new bethel was dedicated at Oak Point, Clark county. And one 3 miles East of Charleston, Coles county, June 11, 1876. Coming across from Danville, Iowa, on May 12, 1877, R. H. Bolton organized a church near Disco, Hancock county, Ill., on the Mississippi River, below Burlington, Ia. Another new organization was effected by Newcomer, pastor, near Tampico, Bureau county, in 1878. On November 23, 1879, the new house of worship 4 miles south of Mazon, Grundy county, was dedicated, M. S. Newcomer preaching the dedicatory sermon. W. B. Allen assisted during the day, as did the pastor, J. Bernard. Mission work at Mendota, Ill., was determined upon by the Eldership in October, 1879, when the matter was referred to the Board of Missions. Said Board entered into an agreement with the trustees of the Congregational Church for the lease of its house of worship for two years from January 1, 1880, for $120.00 a year. M. S. Newcomer was put in charge of the work by action of the Standing Committee, December 3, 1879. In the regular Church work quite a good deal was accomplished, and through revival efforts many were brought into fellowship, thus greatly edifying the churches.

The Indiana Eldership during this whole period was working in the shadows of impending failure of the Ft. Wayne Mission. When in 1876 it was left without a pastor, the supplies of the pulpit regarded the prospects still quite good. In March of said year the Board of Missions borrowed money to meet immediate claims. And as "necessity demanded immediate action," by request the Board of Missions of the General Eldership released Indiana Eldership from its assessment, and W. P. Small was secured to canvass the Eldership for funds. Lovett was re-appointed pastor. When Small had completed his work he was put in charge of the mission, in June, 1878, when a visitor said "the church is alive, but breathing faintly." In July, 1878, an assessment was laid on all the churches in the Eldership to raise the amount needed to support Small. He did not remain long in charge of the work, and Lovett was again appointed. Strong appeals were made not to "let the bethel pass into other hands;" "save the Ft. Wayne Mission!" No appointment was made in November, 1879, and so regular preaching was suspended, while B. Ober was appointed to canvass Ft. Wayne City for funds, and I. W. Markley the whole territory of the Eldership. At Nettle Lake a new house of worship was built in 1875, which was dedicated August 22nd, by A. X. Shoemaker. James Neil, Joseph Neil and H. S. McNutt were present. Another bethel was built at Potter's Station, Ind., and dedicated May 21, 1876, by Elizabeth McColley. It cost $1,260.00. J. Parker was the pastor. W. W. Lovett officiated at the dedication of a new house of worship near Columbia City, Ind., July 13, 1879, which cost $2,000.00. D. Keplinger was the pastor. The Standing Committee arranged for a new circuit in November, 1879, after the Eldership, called Eel River circuit, with eleven preaching places. A new church was organized at Churubusco, Whitley county, April 25, 1875, by I. W. Lowman.

At Mansfield, Ohio, there was substantially a duplication of the history of the Ft. Wayne, Ind., Mission. By October, 1875, the work had so declined that the church was "torn and scattered." A reason for such failures was in part found in the want of sympathy, or "the disparagement of city missions" by the country membership. This was intensified by the outcome at Chicago. Conditions were so unfavorable, with a debt of $2,700.00, "besides missionary funds invested," that at a meeting of the Missionary Society on October 5, 1875, it was decided to sell the property. About $1,500.00 missionary money was invested in it, and there was grave danger of sacrificing the whole of it. Hence, collectors were kept in the field during 1876, 1877 and 1878. And as late as November, 1879, payment of subscriptions was urged. Naturally such work alienated the minds of the brotherhood from such enterprises in general. Almost simultaneously there were sales of other church properties, as at Pleasant Valley, Seneca county, which was ordered in January, 1875, by the Standing Committee. So also on February 16, 1875, the Standing Committee directed the sale of the church property at Clintonville, Franklin county. The parsonage at New Washington, Crawford county, was sold in 1877, to pay the debt resting on it. But to relieve the situation in a degree, successful work was reported on the Toledo Mission by J. A. Smith. Several new churches were organized, one at the Stuller appointment, with twelve members, in February, 1875, making the fifth church on the mission. On the Paulding Mission there were eleven preaching points served by D. Sands, and on January 13, 1875, he organized one new church. In Hardin and Marion counties S. Kline, despite his conflicts with the Disciples, was rewarded with good results. Plowman, at Canton, Stark county, gathered the wrecks of the original church which were loyal to the Eldership notwithstanding the seeds of error and disloyalty sown by M. Beck, and organized them into a loyal church on August 4, 1875, Daniel Bayler being elected elder, and S. H. Addams, deacon. They at once appointed a Building Committee "to take the necessary measures to erect a house of worship," as up to this time the services had been held in church houses owned by other bodies and in dwelling houses. Plowman also preached in Medina county, where he was successful in organizing a new church. At Primrose, Williams county, near the Michigan State line, McNutt succeeded in building a new bethel, which was dedicated by A. X. Shoemaker on January 23, 1876. He had the assistance of W. P. Burchard, S. Chamberlain, James Neil, and his brother Joseph. A bethel built at Freedom, Henry county, E. Poling, pastor, was set apart for divine worship on May 7, 1876, by J. W. Aukerman, assisted by J. V. Updike. At Neptune, Mercer county, in April, 1876, the church resolved to build a new bethel, which was completed and dedicated January 13, 1878. J. W. Aukerman preached the dedicatory sermon. The work was in charge of J. H. McNutt. Another bethel under the same pastor was built in the Now settlement, which Aukerman dedicated May 26, 1878. The mistake had been made here years before of building on land for which they had only the promise of a deed. The man died, and later the house was sold to the Evangelical Church, involving quite a loss to the local church and making the task more difficult to build a new house. Garrison succeeded in forming a new church in 1876 at White House, Lucas county. The bethel at Pleasant Ridge, near Webster, Hancock county, was dedicated by G. W. Wilson, October 14, 1877. The pastor was Isaac Steiner. A house of worship being for sale at Belmore, Putnam county, the Standing Committee, in response to the general desire of brethren residing there, directed its purchase. While the General Eldership held its triennial session at West Salem, Wayne county, in May, 1875, the church did not own a house of worship. But through the indefatigable labors of J. M. Cassel the work of raising funds to build a house for themselves was begun in April, 1878. Cassel also had the bethel at Wooster repaired, which W. P. Small dedicated December 15, 1878. He also succeeded in repairing the house at Cedar Valley, which was reopened May 18, 1879, J. V. Updike officiating. On June 1, 1871, under S. Dickerhoof, the new house of worship at Middle Branch, Stark county, was dedicated by J. S. McKee. During several of these years the Eldership was contending against the inroads of heresies advocated by D. S. Warner. It had finally to resort to the old remedy of excommunication in order to prevent the spread of the disease and restore the body to good health.

In proportion to its numerical strength the West Pennsylvania Eldership leads during this period in the number of houses of worship built and dedicated. Eleven are reported over the whole territory. Of these the first was in Butler county, on the field of which Bartlebaugh was pastor. It was dedicated December 20, 1874, J. W. Davis preaching on Saturday evening and P. Loucks on Sabbath. At Edenburg, Clarion county, under the labors of R. Vanaman, a bethel was erected during the Summer of 1876, and dedicated by Shoemaker on January 11, 1876. The cost was $2,000.00 or over. A church of fourteen members was organized at said place about the same time. In Venango county, in the McQuiston neighborhood, near Scrub Grass, Loucks dedicated a new house of worship, December 26, 1875. M.

Davis was the pastor of this charge. The work in Cambrja county was in good condition, and a new house of worship was built at Garman's Mills, and dedicated by Loucks January 2, 1876. As pastor at Benwood, Marshall county, W. Va., J. S. Marple was successful in having a bethel built in the Summer of 1875, at the dedication of which Loucks officiated on December 1, 1875. There were some rather large revivals in Greene county, Pa., in January, 1875, under the labors of W. B. Long, at one of which there were over forty accessions. Also in the county of Fayette, under the labors of W. J. Davis, a very successful revivalist. Davis, in the Spring, went to Greene county, where, at Windy Gap, he succeeded in building a house of worship. This was dedicated by D. Wertz, August 27, 1876. S. Woods was in charge of the work in Somerset county, and in the Summer of 1876 built a bethel at Kingwood, which was dedicated by Loucks on October 8, 1876. After the holidays, in 1878, the revival at Templeton, where about fifty were converted, prepared the way for the building of a bethel, which was begun in April, 1878, under the labors of J. W. Adams. Butler county had another dedication on January 26, 1879, at Glade Mills, at which Loucks officiated. M. S. Pritts was the successful pastor. The church at West Newton was organized in 1843. In 1852 it built a small bethel, which it used until the Spring of 1879, when a better and more commodious house was built, which was dedicated on October 12, 1879, by G. Sigler. It cost $2,454.00 and was erected under the labors of J. W. Bloyd, pastor. The bethel at Avenue, 1 mile from Tarentum, Allegheny county, was built in 1879, under the labors of R. Vanaman. It was dedicated November 30, 1879. This church is also known as the Brackenridge Avenue church. The church was organized by Plowman in 1869; the bethel was built during the Summer of 1879. The dedicatory services were conducted by B. F. Bolton. The Eldership had a mission in Jefferson county, in 1875, with J. W. Adams as missionary, who organized a church at Cool Spring of twenty-three members, "the greater part of them heads of families." He was succeeded by M. McVay in 1877-8, who had revivals at Center Point and at Emericksville. He extended his labors into Elk county, preaching at Crossburg in an Adventist house of worship, the church being without a pastor. The church at Cool Spring was in danger of losing its house of worship, owing to a small debt which it claimed to be unable to pay. Another mission, in which W. J. Davis was pastor, was in Kanawha county, W. Va. There was a small church at Grandview, and in January, 1879, he organized one in Jackson county. This was the beginning of work in this county. T. Woods opened the Proctor mission, Wetzel county, where he had good success, as the Disciple influence was waning. He opened nine appointments. In 1879 W. B. Smith was sent to open a mission known as the Bradford Mission, on which he was quite successful.

Good success attended the work on the Morrison's Cove circuit, including Stonerstown and other points on the east of the mountain, East Pennsylvania Eldership, in 1875, under G. W. Seilhammer, so that the Standing Committee divided the field January 19, 1875, and gave Stonerstown to J. M. Speese. Roaring Spring was assuming some importance, as a revival toward Spring resulted in ninety-eight conversions, a majority of which united with the church. In 1877, with H. E. Reeve as pastor, the work was still further enlarged by the organization of a church at Snively's, which elected James Miller and George Snively, elders, and Jacob and Samuel Snively, deacons. It has rarely been the case that a board or committee of the Eldership has been so radically divided, or two boards or committees so sharply antagonistic, as was the case from March, 1875, until the session of the Eldership. The division was in the Standing Committee, of which a majority was in conflict with the Board of Missions. The matter at issue was the authority of the Standing Committee to appropriate missionary money. It had appropriated $300.00 to certain missionaries. This the Board declared to be an invalid act, and refused to recognize it, or to pay the appropriations. The Eldership sustained the Board. In June, 1875, a bethel was projected at Idaville, Adams county, and work begun, but no statement of its completion is on record. D. H. Mumma, the pastor, was an energetic missionary, and he lamented that the work in this county had been so much neglected. But prospects were still good. He was successful in building a house of worship at Harmony, York county, near the Adams county line, in the Summer of 1877, which was dedicated on the unusual day, December 9, 1877, being Saturday, at 10 a. m., by C. H. Forney, who also preached on Sabbath morning and evening. At Zimmermantown, Schuylkill county, a bethel was built in the Summer of 1875, under the labors of S. Smith, which was dedicated October 10th, by A. Snyder, assisted by I. Hay and D. Shope.

In Windsor township, York county, a bethel was built on Daniel Holtzinger's farm, and known as the Holtzinger Bethel, which J. Keller dedicated November 12, 1876. C. Knoll was the pastor. T. Still and S. E. Herman assisted at the dedicatory services. At Hummelstown, Dauphin county, the building of a bethel was begun in the Spring of 1876. The corner-stone was laid by B. F. Beck on July 2nd, and on December 10th the house was solemnly set apart for divine worship, the morning sermon being preached by G. Sigler and the evening sermon by W. L. Jones. S. C. Stonesifer was pastor. Under the labors of F. L. Nicodemus the church at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, made extensive repairs on its house of worship in the Summer of 1876. The original house was built in 1841, but was remodeled and enlarged, and on October 8th was rededicated by C. H. Forney. The bethel at Maytown, Lancaster county, built in 1858, was also repaired and much improved the same Summer, under the pastorate of I. S. Richmond. It was reopened November 12, 1876, C. H. Forney preaching the sermons, with the presence of J. W. Deshong, I. Brady and J. C. Owens. The original bethel at Altoona was "a shell of a house," 26x40 feet, and was also becoming too small to accommodate the people who desired to listen to "the eloquent Irish preacher," J. Hunter. Accordingly the church went energetically to work in 1876 to build a house which would seat from four hundred and fifty to five hundred people, which was dedicated the nearest Sunday to St. Patrick's day, 1877, C. H. Forney officiating. The Annville, Lebanon county, church, originally organized in 1844, and once a strong church, had become extinct. But a few families of the church removing to the place, with Dr. Ross and family, of Lebanon, reorganized it April 2, 1877, with sixteen members. J. A. MacDannald was then pastor, who secured for the occasion the services of G. Sigler and A. Snyder, the former preaching an English sermon and the latter a German sermon. The most phenomenal enterprise developed in Lancaster City, Lancaster county, where a division occurred in the church, and nearly one hundred members withdrew and began to hold regular services in a large hall. They called J. B. Soule to be their pastor. They manifested a remarkable spirit of aggressive missionary zeal. With no house of worship, they established two missions, one on Dorwart street, and the other in the northern part of the city. The former was started July 18, 1876, the latter December 24, 1866, known as the Antioch mission. The church was organized June 8, 1877, and on July 15, 1877, the corner-stone of their house of worship was laid by C. H. Forney. November 18, 1877, the house, known as "Salem Church," was dedicated. C. H. Forney preached in the morning, and W. L. Jones, in the evening. The church at once went to work to build the Antioch mission bethel, which was dedicated May 19, 1878, by C. H. Forney. At the session of the Eldership in 1878, J. W. Miller was appointed to Salem church and its missions, and J. B. Soule was sent to Altoona, to take effect April, 1879. The church resented this action, and declared itself independent of the Eldership. It did not long survive, and the enterprise with such an auspicious beginning utterly failed. Bainbridge, Lancaster county, with D. S. Shoop as pastor, began the erection of a new bethel in the Spring of 1877. C. H. Forney preached and laid the corner-stone July 29, 1877, and also dedicated the new house May 5, 1878. A. H. Long assisted at both services, and at the dedication W. L. Jones preached in the evening. The colored brethren at Brownsville, Franklin county, began the work of building a bethel in June, 1878; but owing to lack of means made slow progress. The mission at Columbia, Lancaster county, was making steady progress under the energetic labors of J. W. Deshong, and on July 29, 1878, with preaching in three or four churches in the town by Forney, Shoop and Beck, the former, in the afternoon, laid the corner-stone. The dedication occurred March 23, 1879, when Sigler, Jones and Laverty officiated. The church at Reading, having become disorganized and scattered, was reorganized August 18, 1878, with "twenty-five or thirty members." On September 1, 1878, under the pastoral labors of W. P. Winbigler, the corner-stone of a new bethel was laid at Lisburn, Cumberland county, and the house was dedicated December 22, 1878, C. H. Forney officiating at both services. A new point of promising church work was opened at North Middleton, Cumberland county, near Carlisle, I. S. Richmond being pastor. The corner-stone was laid by C. H. Forney October 20, 1878, C. C. Bartels being also present. The preaching was in the barn of John Lightner near by. The house was completed and dedicated May 4, 1879, under the pastorate of O. H. Betts. C. H. Forney preached in the morning, and F. L. Nicodemus, in the evening. Other ministers present were R. M. Pine, H. Hackenberger and J. F. Meixel. After needed repairs, the bethel at Marysville, Perry county, was reopened September 28, 1878, under the labors of J. W. Felix, C. H. Forney preaching the sermons. The Fairview bethel, Lancaster county, was built under the labors of D. H. Mumma, and was to have been dedicated December 25, 1878; but the services were deferred until June 1, 1879, when C. H. Forney preached both morning and evening. At 4 o'clock p. m., the church was organized. Near the home of John Soule, father of the Soule brothers, the Sandy Hollow bethel stands, built in the Summer of 1878, and dedicated by W. L. Jones and J. B. Soule December 22, 1878, F. L. Nicodemus being the pastor.

In the Maryland and Virginia Eldership the work of confirming the churches was earnestly pushed forward, and there were many successful revivals. The prospects in the Virginia part of the Eldership apparently brightened under the labors of C. L. Amy. It was regarded as excellent missionary territory, but was generally much neglected. Amy in 1875 had eight appointments around Martinsburg, and in 1876 began the building of a bethel in Berkeley county. But at the Eldership in 1876 the only other bethel in that territory was ordered to be sold to pay a debt resting on it, and the field was left without a preacher, to be supplied by the Standing Committee. At Oak Hill, Creagerstown circuit, J. W. Kipe, pastor, a new house of worship was dedicated December 24, 1876. In 1877, a bethel was built at Piney Creek, 1½ miles from Taneytown, Carroll county, under the pastoral labors of S. W. Naill, and was dedicated by C. H. Forney, December 16th. Under the labors of J. A. Staub a new bethel known as Mt. Briar meeting-house was dedicated May 11, 1879, by S. W. Naill. The new bethel at Appler's Mills, with J. A. Saxton, pastor, was dedicated by Wm. Palmer on June 1, 1879. On December 21, 1879, the bethel at Sigler's, Frederick county, was dedicated, C. H. Forney and G. Sigler officiating. A. Philhour was the pastor.

Conditions in Maine were peculiar. The cause had elements of strength and prosperity. Naturally a stable people, conservative and truth-loving, only the best and most permanent results could have been anticipated. The faith and practice of the Church of God appealed to them; they were in a measure prepared for them. They earnestly called for missionaries, and seemed anxious that representatives from East Pennsylvania should come among them and devote their years to the cause in that State. In April, 1875, W. H. Engler left Maytown, Pa., and went to Maine, reaching Enfield on the 10th. He organized a church of God at Dixmont on April 15th, with twelve members; one at Orono on the 22nd, with fourteen members, and one at Bradford, April 28th, with twenty-five members. He remained only a short time, but returned again in November, 1877. These brief trips by different ministers were not satisfactory, and John Dennis said they were usually at the wrong season of the year for that climate. But still the work grew and enlarged. Mills dedicated a church building at Fort Fairfield in February, 1876. At Windsor he organized a church March 11, 1876, and in 1878 the Quarterly Meeting convened with the church recently organized at Lincoln Center, in their new house of worship. Of this church Dr. J. I. Brown was a member, the only Maine minister who ever attended a General Eldership. In May, 1876, Mills organized one church at Monroe, and one at Swanville. In June, 1876, A. F. Brown formed two organizations, one at Glenburn, and one at South China. Quite a large revival was carried on at Islesboro by Mills and others, and with the sixty-five converts a church was organized in 1878 by E. F. Hanson. Also one at Searsport, June 16, 1878. These churches were located in the counties of Somerset, Waldo, Kennebec, Aroostook and Penobscot, and numbered twelve or more. But the elements of disintegration manifested themselves as early as December 19, 1878, when three preachers withdrew, "not being satisfied with the proceedings of the body here in Maine." And in July, 1879, the churches in Waldo county, at a Quarterly Meeting, voted "to withdraw from the body in Maine and form an Eldership under the Rules of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." Six churches in Waldo county joined this movement. As early as 1838 B. Howard found churches of God in New Brunswick, where probably this movement in Maine originated. He went from Eastport, Me., to Halifax, N. S., where he found a church of God. Also at Picton. He established churches with this name and faith at Cornwallis, Falmouth, Liverpool and Port Midway and other places. At St. John's, N. B., he found a similar church, and himself organized one at Orimocto, and at two other points. Some of these churches existed during the time that this movement was in progress in Maine.

While the number of deaths of ministers of the Church of God during this period was small, outside of the Church quite a number of distinguished men ended their illustrious careers. Those in the Church who fell in the battle of life were P. D. Collins, of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, but first licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1858. He died May 13, 1875. He was followed October 1, 1876, by William McElroy. He was licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1840. He received his early religious training in the Episcopal Church; but after his conversion he united with the Methodist Church, and later with the Church of God. He reached the age of 78 years. For a short time he was a member of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, as he generally labored within its territory, much of his time in Virginia. On June 1, 1878, D. Keplinger wrote: "Our much beloved fellow-laborer, George H. Thomas, has fallen." He died in San Antonio, Texas, whither he had gone for his health. He reached the age of sixty. He was ordained to the ministry by the Ohio Eldership in 1843. Thence he went to the Indiana Eldership, where most of his active ministerial life was spent. But for short periods he was also a member of the Illinois, the Iowa and the Kansas Elderships. "He was one of the ablest ministers of the Church of God for many years," is the testimony of one who was well acquainted with him. In other religious bodies the most prominent men who passed away during this period were Charles G. Finney, the eminent theologian and educator, President of Oberlin College, who died August 16, 1875; Richard Fuller, the celebrated Baptist minister of Baltimore, Md., pre-eminently a Bible student and a Bible preacher, died in October, 1876; W. G. Brownlow, Methodist minister, journalist and political leader, who died April 28, 1877; Dr. Muhlenberg, Protestant Episcopal minister and poet, died in 1877; Charles Hodge, of the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J., a theologian of world-wide reputation; Pope Pius IX., who died at Rome, Italy, February 7, 1878, whose death was considered "one of the great events of the decade." He was born May 13, 1792, and was named Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti. His successor, Gioacchino Pecci, was elected in March, 1878, and assumed the name of Pope Leo XIII. Howard Malcom, a noted Baptist divine, born in 1799, died in 1879. He is the author of the edition of Butler's Analogy of Religion, with Introduction, Notes and Conspectus, which is still a text-book in the Course of Studies of the East Pennsylvania Eldership.

CHAPTER XV.

THERE is something fascinating about memorial days! We all keep them, whether they be observed by public celebrations, or in the quiet of our own hearts! In silence, secretly and alone, we often wander back along the traveled road of life which lies behind us, and gratefully raise our Ebenezer. But more inspiration is realized, and a deeper enthusiasm created when the people of a town or city, a State or a Republic join in a common commemoration of some historic event, like that of the nation's birth, or the beautiful services of Memorial Day, when a nation repeats year after year that magnificent poem:

"Cover them over with beautiful flowers,
Deck them with garlands, those brothers of ours,
Lying so silent by night and by day,
Sleeping the years of their manhood away."

Thus the nation in 1876 celebrated the centennial of its existence, and in melodious symphony chanted Whittier's majestic "Centennial Hymn:"

"Our Fathers' God! from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand."

Perhaps this "Centennial," pre-eminently so-called, with a few others, awakened the suggestion, which took form in 1878, to observe the semi-centennial of the formal organization of the Church of God during 1880, the first year of this semi-decade. A recommendation was made to the General Eldership in 1878 to arrange for a suitable commemoration of this event, and said body appointed C. H. Forney and M. S. Newcomer to prepare a plan for such a service. This work was done in good time, and on September 1, 1879, a report was made to the Executive Board of the General Eldership convened at North Liberty, Johnson county, Iowa, Linsinger, Bailey and Besore, of the Board being present. This Program was approved by the Board, with the exception of "Item II.," which provided for "a semi-centennial camp-meeting, under the direction of a semi-centennial camp-meeting committee." All the Boards of the General Eldership were to meet on the camp ground. One sermon was to be preached by a minister of each Eldership which had been organized. The other items in the Report provided for were: "A semi-centennial Anniversary or Memorial Day on the Sabbath preceding the date on which the first Eldership was organized," with a complete "order of services." Each annual Eldership was requested to set apart a day during its session in 1880 to hold special Semi-centennial services. The first Sabbath in January, 1880, was named on which the Semi-centennial year was to be opened by the preaching of a sermon by each minister in charge of an appointment in every Eldership, touching the missionary, educational and publishing interests of the Church, and to urge special contributions during the year to these interests. A certain number of brethren were to be appointed by the Board of Publication and the Editor and Assistant Editor of The Advocate to prepare fifty-two special articles on assigned subjects, to be published in the fifty-two issues of the paper during the year. On December 11, 1879, the Board of Publication and the Editor met in Harrisburg, Pa., to agree upon the topics for the suggested articles and the writers. They arranged for three series, one on Church Doctrine and Church Polity, one on the History of the Church, and one on Biographies of Fathers of the Church. These with their authors were as follows: Church Doctrine:—Fall and Depravity, G. Sigler. Doctrine of Sin, J. S. McKee. Atonement and Redemption, P. Loucks. Ability and Free-Will, M. S. Newcomer. Conversion and Regeneration, A. X. Shoemaker. Providence, D. Wertz. Ordinances and Rites, A. Swartz. Rule of Faith, G. W. Wilson. State of the Dead, George Sandoe. Local Church Polity, A. Hollems. Annual Eldership Polity, D. A. L. Lavery. General Eldership Polity, R. H. Bolton. The History of the Church was to be written in periods of ten years, which were as follows: Up to 1840, T. Hickernell. From 1840 to 1850, W. Vance; 1850 to 1860, A. Megrew; 1860 to 1870, C. Price; 1870 to 1880, I. E. Boyer. Annual Eldership Histories. The East Pennsylvania Eldership, A. Swartz. East Ohio Eldership, J. A. Plowman. West Pennsylvania Eldership, A. C. Raysor. Indiana Eldership, J. E. McColley. Iowa Eldership, J. Lininger. Illinois Eldership, W. B. Allen. Michigan Eldership, C. C. Linsey. German Eldership, A. Snyder. Southern Illinois and Indiana Eldership, W. Booth. West Ohio Eldership, W. P. Small. Texas Eldership, E. Marple. Kansas and Missouri Eldership, D. Blakely. Maryland and Virginia Eldership, J. H. Chew. Nebraska Eldership, E. D. Aller. Maine Eldership, H. Mills. The Biographies were arranged as follows: J. Winebrenner, by Dr. George Ross. G. U. Harn, by J. W. Ankerman. W. Mooney, by A. Swartz. E. H. Thomas, by J. H. Redsecker. W. McFadden, by Mrs. J. Winebrenner. E. Logue, by F. F. Kiner. D. Maxwell, by D. Shelley. J. Keller, by Mrs. M. J. Ross. A. Miller, by J. Haifeigh. James Mackey, by Mrs. E. R. Gable. John Walburn, by George Smuller. J. H. Bamberger, by W. L. Jones. J. M. Domer, by J. Hickernell. George Thomas, by D. Keplinger. W. Adams, by S. Lilley. J. Flake, by J. M. Carvell. Early local workers, by George Sigler, Jos. Neil and B. Ober. The Editor of The Advocate had assigned to him his predecessors as editors, and the history and finances of the paper. The Board of Incorporation of the General Eldership also arranged to have a semi-centennial Sunday-school service in every school throughout the whole territory. In the Order of Services for Memorial Day the following were the items: 1. Doxology. 2. Hymn (original, and the Executive Board appointed M. S. Newcomer to write it). 3. Scripture Lesson—Matt. xvi. 13-20; Col. i. 12-28; I. Peter ii. 1-10. 4. Prayer. 5. Hymn No. 414, Church Hymn Book. 6. Historical Sermon. 7. A thank-offering for General Eldership mission work. 8. Hymn No. 420, Church Hymn Book. 9. Prayer. 10. Hymn No. 798, Church Hymn Book. 11. Benediction. One object of this Semi-centennial was indicated as "a specially appropriate one"; that is, "to labor for a deeper and more pervasive piety among the members of the Church of God." What the results were of this anniversary no one can venture to estimate. Records do not show. On June 16, 1880, a reader of The Advocate made a report on three items as he gathered them from the paper, and which were evidently incomplete. His report takes in every State in which ministers of the Church labored, and shows for the months of January, February and March a total of conversions, 1,538; baptisms, 535, and accessions, 1,110. February 24, 1881, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Gable made an appeal for $1.00 from every member of the Church, to raise $50,000 "for the Lord's treasury over and above that raised other years, for the beginning of a Permanent Fund." It, however, elicited no response. The Alverton, Pa., church and Sunday-school enjoy the distinction of making "a semi-centennial donation to the Permanent Fund of the Board of Missions in June, 1880."

A subject of world-wide interest in 1880 was "The Robert Raikes Centennial," or the one hundredth anniversary of the introduction of Sunday-schools by Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, England. There was very much to rejoice over during this anniversary, and the Church of God and its Sunday-schools all over the territory of the General Eldership heartily participated in it. On June 2, 1880, when the Board of Incorporation was in session at Fort Wayne, Ind., J. H. Redsecker presented the matter in a letter addressed to the Board, in which he urged that appropriate action be taken "touching the celebration of the establishment of Sunday-schools one hundred years ago by Robert Raikes." The Board appointed a committee to report a suitable plan. This committee met on June 17th, and drew up an order of service, and named September 5th as the day, recommending that this day be observed by all the schools, with the use of the Order of Services agreed upon. There was to be an appropriate sermon in the morning, and a sermon and addresses in the evening; selections of Scripture, responsive readings, hymns of praise, selections of music and addresses to the schools in the afternoon. Essays and addresses were also provided for at the Sunday-school conventions. These services everywhere created general interest and awakened new enthusiasm in Sunday-school work. To Robert Raikes Providence had in no adequate measure revealed the future grandeur of his work, and eloquent speeches and sermons scarcely did justice to the splendid achievements of the army of workers in this divine cause.

The Semi-centennial also naturally revived interest in the "Life and Times of Elder John Winebrenner," and so the Board of Incorporation called upon the Executive Board, "urging said Board to take immediate action on this matter." Said Board had been "instructed to appoint Sister Elizabeth R. Gable to write" this work; but nothing had been done. While not connected with the movement, nor directly concerned in its results, the Church of God felt an interest in the Pan Presbyterian Council which met in Philadelphia, Pa., on September 23, 1880. It was composed of "all the religious bodies in the world whose government is presbyterian and whose creed is in harmony with the consensus of the Reformed Confessions." Many topics were on the program for discussion which had been receiving a good deal of attention from the churches and ministers of the General Eldership. This was especially true of Bible Revision, or a new translation of the Scriptures, which in different forms had been exhaustively discussed in The Advocate. The preparation and publication of the new version was unquestionably the most important literary enterprise of the nineteenth century, and its completion was waited for with curiosity and anxiety by hundreds of thousands. It was the revision of the Bible published in 1611, known as the Authorized Version. The purpose was to complete the work in 1880, the fifth semi-centenary of Wickliffe's Bible, the first complete translation of the Old and New Testaments into the English language. But these calculations were not realized. It was not until May 17, 1881, that the work was in the market in England, and May 20th in the United States. So great was the demand for copies of the new version that several enterprising daily newspapers published the entire Revision within a few days after the appearance of the first copies. To many, however, the Revision was a disappointment, though the recognized scholarship of the world generally approved it. But the public expressions of judgment by ministers of the Church were unfavorable, except that the Editor of The Advocate defended it. Far less interest was manifested in the publication of the revised Old Testament. The first edition was published in England on Saturday, May 16, 1885, and in the United States the first copies were placed on sale May 21st. Fifteen years had been occupied in completing the entire work.

The Church of God was more or less interested in the discovery and publication of "Teachings of the Twelve Apostles," which appeared in 1884. The work adds its testimony to that of the Scriptures and other early writers against sundry denominational theories, chief among them being that of the doctrine of Apostolic succession and the various theories of the episcopacy. Also there is in it not a word in favor of infant baptism.

The uniformly close connection of the Church of God and the Free Baptist Church added interest to the celebration of the latter's centenary, or the holding of its "Centennial General Conference" in July, 1880. Not only is there an essential similarity between the two bodies; but not unfrequently in those earlier years did ministers of the Church of God serve as pastors of Free Baptist churches in north-western Pennsylvania and south-western New York, and in Ohio, Illinois and Kansas. Some Free Baptist churches also assumed the name of "Free Baptist Church of God." These were received through their delegates at the Yearly Meetings, and the question was raised in 1880 whether they might not send delegates to the Elderships of the Church of God.

As this period was noted for semi-centennial and centennial anniversaries, so the entire nineteenth century was characterized by the production and development of some of the greatest agencies which have given such vast impulse to the advance of Christianity. But it was reserved for the latter part of the century to give birth and permanent evolution to one of the most remarkable of all Christian agencies, and in which the churches of God and the Elderships have manifested a well sustained interest. It is known by the comprehensive name of "The Young People's Movement." Sporadic organizations here and there, and without any connection, were formed as early as 1867. But the seed from which sprang the "Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor" was planted by Dr. Francis E. Clark, Congregational minister in Portland, Maine, February 2, 1881. The object as then conceived was "to hold and to train in Christian work the young converts who had been brought into the church during a recent revival." It is an organization which seemed to be the outcome of a real, felt necessity of training and guiding aright the young Christians who might otherwise stray away. Of slow growth at first, it has developed to enormous proportions. It was at first opposed by the older members and ministers of the Church of God; but its gradual introduction conquered opposition, until a very large proportion of the churches have organized societies.

Notwithstanding this unusual activity so far as the formal elements of Christianity are concerned there was an ever-deepening conviction that the Churches in America and Europe were in a state of spiritual declension. In this lack of vitality, spirituality and power the Church of God was not exempt. It was a question of anxious concern for two or three years to determine the causes and the remedy. In an article published in The Advocate in April, 1882, Mrs. M. E. Megrew, of Iowa, dwelt strongly on the "loss of spiritual power" in the churches: "It is a subject of thought, conversation and prayer, why it is that spiritually we as a Christian nation are losing, instead of gaining, in influence over the unconverted and skeptics of every order." January 3, 1880, was designated by the East Pennsylvania Eldership as "a day of special prayer for a revival of religion throughout the bounds of this Eldership." In discussing this action it was stated editorially that the spiritual condition of the churches loudly called for such special prayer. Goldwin Smith was quoted in these words: "A collapse of religious belief of the most tremendous kind is apparently now at hand." It was said to manifest itself "in practical atheism, and hence a total disregard of all those higher sanctions which come with a reverence for God and the thought of immortality." The same testimony came from the old world: "A wave of infidelity was steadily advancing over Protestant Europe." Not only was this declension noticeable in the growing infidelity, but in formality in the evangelical Churches and in loss of power. The low religious temperature was lamented, and at various Elderships committees on the state of religion made special reference to the lack of spiritual vitality in the churches. The "dearth of revivals" deplored by the "Lutheran Observer" was one of the evidences of the prevalent spiritual declension: "There has not been a time for many years in which so few revivals have been reported in the various Churches of our country as at present" (April, 1881). There was a falling off in attendance of Christians and others at public worship which, as a rule, has never been regained. The reasons assigned were numerous. Ministers of the Church of God usually put emphasis on the absence of personal piety in the members; a "drifting toward sectarianism"; worldliness; use of carnal means and methods in religious work and especially in the raising of funds for religious purposes, such as fairs, sociables and festivals, and worldly amusements. Until late in the year 1883 these matters were earnestly discussed, especially the "drifting toward sectarianism" and amusements. The craving for public amusements has in all ages of the church been taken as a sign of low spiritual vitality. While religion is anything but sanctimonious gloominess and bodily austerity; yet its source of joy is in the well-spring of a consciousness of pardon and of fellowship with God. It has no need of recourse to worldly frivolity and sensual amusement to keep up the steady flow of that peace which "passeth all understanding."

The churches were aggressively active in the various forms of Christian labor, even if there was a weakening of their spiritual forces, and watchmen on the walls of Zion were falling at their posts. A rather disproportionate number of ministers were summoned to their great reward during this period. Death respected neither age nor stalwart manhood. The veteran James Richards, the last one of the six who constituted the first Eldership, was the first to hear the whispered words of the Angel of Death, "O child of earth, I call thee home!" He died March 6, 1880, aged nearly 80 years. Israel Brady, first elder of the church at Mt. Joy, Pa., and Jacob Strawbridge, Orrstown, Pa., also ended their labors in 1880. Others who during the semi-centennial went to the chamber of death, the death-bed of the just where angels minister as "on a post of honor and of joy," were Moses Gault, aged 73 years, and Abraham Resh, nearly 72 years, both of the Ohio Eldership. In 1881 the most prominent minister to answer the final summons was P. Loucks, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. A fellow-minister of said body, but who had for a number of years been in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, S. S. Richmond, preceded him by four months. J. M. West departed this life in August, near Quitman Station, Mo. He was one of the early ministers who so faithfully and successfully preached the doctrines of the Church of God in Ohio, he having been licensed in 1847. In 1882 J. C. Owens ended his career at the advanced age of nearly 78 years. Of the younger men whose premature deaths cast a deep shadow especially over the East Pennsylvania Eldership, were Alexander Wiley, in 1880, but a few months over 35 years old, a man of fine character and good talents; J. E. Arnold, than whom few stood higher in the scale of moral excellence, and S. W. Naill, "a good man, and full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." A. C. Raysor, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and T. H. Deshler, of the Illinois Eldership, both full of years and of good works, followed these younger men in 1884 to the realm of "kinder skies, and milder suns, and seas pacific as the soul that seeks them." Two laymen, whose names and faces were for years as familiar as those of any ministers, ended their useful lives during this period. From 1859 to the day of their departure they were on the Board of Publication. George Ross was the first of the twain to be "called home to a glorious rest." He died November 30, 1880, at his home in Lebanon, Pa. He was followed on August 11, 1881, by J. S. Gable, almost a life-long elder of the church at Lancaster, Pa. Illustrious men in other walks in life and in other Churches, cotemporaries of these servants of God, who joined them in the other world, were Dr. Burr Baldwin, founder of the American Sunday-school system, who died January 23, 1880; Lucretia Mott, eminent and widely-known member of the Society of Friends, social reformer and a delegate to the World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London, England, who departed November 11, 1880; the scholar, author, theologian and Royal Chaplain to the Queen of England, A. P. Stanley, July 18, 1881; Bishop Matthew Simpson, June 18, 1884, the most eloquent Methodist prelate of the century.

It was during the Semi-centennial that the Salvation Army, which by 1878 had developed into a regular organization, invaded America. It has had a varying career, and has been highly lauded and sharply criticised. During these five years the work of the Church of God was carried forward by the use of the established means of grace, uninfluenced by the wild vagaries of the Salvation Army, or the formalism of less evangelical Churches. Camp-meetings continued to be held, with a gradual tendency toward permanent places and the organization of Associations. Maine also was holding one each of these five years. All together there were seven in 1880, nine in 1881, five in 1882, six in 1883 and five in 1884. Texas, under the leadership of J. A. Smith, of Ohio, came into the list in 1880, and Missouri held one in 1880. The Venango county camp was under the control of a regular organized Camp-Meeting Association, and in 1880 held a "Semi-centennial Camp-meeting." It had leased a grove for a period of ten years. No camp-meetings were held during this period in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois or Iowa. In 1879 the Iowa Eldership directed the Standing Committee to arrange for a camp-meeting in 1880; but there was so little to encourage the committee that when the subject came up it was "indefinitely postponed." A series of sermons on previously announced subjects, by different ministers, was an innovation at the Venango county camp-meeting in 1882. The same year the method in vogue among the Methodists of raising funds by charging an admission fee to the grounds was introduced at the Landisville camp-meeting, and provoked much adverse criticism.

The results reported from the thirty-two camp-meetings held during the period were exceedingly meager.

Pentecostal meetings continued to be held nearly each year in the following Elderships: German, East Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, so that they numbered from three in 1881 to seven in 1880. But they were losing in power, and were becoming more local, individual churches holding them for their own edification. No special results were effected.

Ministerial Associations were held in nearly all the annual Elderships. Gradually a change of time was made from Ohio westward, and a day or two were devoted to these meetings immediately preceding the convening of Elderships. They proved instructive to ministers and profitable to the churches where they were held. The topics covered a very wide range in personal and church life, and in dogmatic theology. As examples the programs of the Associations of the different Elderships during this period can be cited as good specimens. A few may be quoted: East Pennsylvania—"Sermons, and how to prepare them." "Does the Holy Spirit act on the human heart independent of the word of God?" "What are the fruits of the Spirit?" "Does the devil command an influence independent of human agency?" "Should young ministers take a skeleton into the pulpit?" West Pennsylvania—"Have preachers a scriptural right to receive members by the right hand of fellowship?" "Ministerial character." "Evidences of a Christian life." "Necessity of religion to society." "Revivals, best method of conducting them." Maryland and Virginia—"Is anointing of the sick with oil in the name of the Lord an ordinance of the Church of God?" "Is baptism a condition of salvation?" "How should the church proceed with a faultfinder?" Ohio—"The Bible—why do we believe it to be inspired?" "Should there be unity of work among all the churches of God? If so, how can it best be promoted?" "What are the conditions of effectual prayer?" "Is instrumental music profitable in the churches?" "Is man a dual, or a triune, being?" Indiana—"Define the God-head." "What is foreordination?" "Best manner of sermonizing." "Has the day of miracles passed?" "What is the resurrection, and what are its benefits?" Illinois—"How to conduct a prayer-meeting." "What is the Christian duty in regard to the present temperance reform movement?" "What is scriptural sanctification?" "Is the office of ruling elder as held by the Church of God scriptural?" Iowa—"The nature and extent of the atonement." "How are we brought under the benefits of the atonement?" "What are our present needs as an Eldership?" Nebraska—"What position shall we take on the Prohibition agitation?" "Relation of ministers to the children." Kansas—"Is the soul of man immortal?" "What is the scriptural way of conducting ordinance meetings?" "What is the scriptural plan of supporting the gospel?" Southern Indiana—Subjects for discussion: Repentance, Faith, Regeneration, Hope. West Virginia—"What is the Church of God, and its foundation?" "What is the kingdom of God, and when established?" "How are ruling elders constituted?" "How are deacons constituted?" "When, where and in what Church did divisions originate?" Quite a number of the essays on these topics were published in The Advocate. Some of the Associations had regularly framed Constitutions and By-Laws, and were conducted under parliamentary rules. Actions taken in the form of resolutions were, as a rule, confined to the work of the Associations. Quite frequently the topics discussed at Ministerial Associations were echoes of current questions. This was true of Instrumental Music. At the time this subject was on the Ohio program the controversy over it was in progress in the United Presbyterian Church, resulting in the sending down to the Presbyteries of an overture rescinding the law against the use of instrumental music in their churches. Or the doctrine of the Resurrection, in the Indiana Association, which had been pretty thoroughly discussed in The Advocate by a minister of the adjoining Eldership, in Illinois. Or High License and the Prohibition question, in which the Church and Elderships always manifested a deep interest. High License dates from the passage of such a law in Nebraska, in 1881, and it spread eastward as far as Pennsylvania within a few years. It was antagonized quite generally by Prohibitionists in and out of the Church. Hence, this question of the Christian's duty with reference to the temperance reform movement, as in the Illinois Association; or the position we should take in the Prohibition agitation, as in the Nebraska Association. From Iowa to Pennsylvania Prohibition was advocated as against all license measures. Prohibition had made its greatest conquests between 1850 and 1860, after which for over two decades it lost nearly all the ground previously gained. High License and Constitutional Prohibition came into prominence together, and temperance people had to choose between them. Especially in Iowa, Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania did this become a live issue for Christian people of all denominations. And as the ministry quite generally favored prohibition it was not only a safe question to discuss at these Associations; but it afforded an excellent opportunity to reach the public where these gatherings were held. Hence, in a few instances mass meetings were held in the evening, and these topics earnestly discussed in favor of Prohibition.

Few of the remarkable developments of this century were more rapid and substantial than that of the Sunday-school. The convention idea met an inborn desire for, and need of, mutual helpfulness. It rests on a broader basis than that of the C. E. Society. Its platform is the only one upon which all evangelical bodies, both sexes and the representatives of all ages, meet to discuss and plan the evangelization of the world. Hence, its growth into a great system, from the district convention to the international convention. Thousands of such conventions are held every year. They are a great evangelical force. The third and fourth International Conventions were held during this semi-decade. As the Church of God was always earnestly aggressive in Sunday-school work, it was but natural that it should be deeply imbued with the convention idea. Distance in most of the Eldershires was a great barrier; yet in 1880 conventions were held in five Eldershires—East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Nebraska. West Virginia followed in 1881, and other Eldershires later. The pastors with rare exceptions were leaders in these assemblies, and they devoted their energies and talents zealously to the work. The themes discussed were generally of a practical character. As a sample of programs, that of West Pennsylvania in 1883 may be taken. There were twelve topics for the seven sittings, as follows: "Have our conventions been a benefit to our Sunday-schools?" "Is the International plan a success in our Sunday-school work?" "Is the industry of teachers increased by means of Lesson Helps?" "Is it prudent to introduce Helps other than the Workman and Lesson Leaves in our Sunday-schools?" "Is it best to use the blackboard in the Sunday-school?" "Should the conversion of children under twelve years be encouraged?" "The order of exercises in the Sunday-school." "Teachers' Meetings—should they be encouraged?" "What constitutes a Sunday-school teacher?" "The teacher's implements." "What is ocular teaching?" "Sunday-school prayer-meetings." "The relation of the Sunday-school to the family."

The ministers and churches of the German Eldership carried on their regular church work in the common way, with none of the special services except occasionally a Pentecostal meeting. They had no Ministerial Association, no Sunday-school conventions, and even camp-meetings were less frequently held. Their territory became gradually more and more contracted, by reason of the dissatisfaction which induced the churches to apply to the East Pennsylvania Eldership for pastors. There was but one circuit at this time, supplied by a minister not a regular member of the Church. No aggressive work was done. The Independent church at Auburn united with the Eldership, thus giving it some additional strength.

In the State of Maine there was considerable activity, and reports indicate successful work in revival meetings, camp-meetings, now held annually, and at the Quarterly Meetings. H. Mills was a traveling evangelist, who carried the work forward in three or four counties in the State, and preached part of the time in several towns in New Brunswick. Churches were organized at Tracy Mills, Andover, Lakeville and Upper Wicklow, N. B. They were, however, as yet not fully indoctrinated, as in February, 1880, in answer to a direct question, whether the churches in Maine observed Feet-washing, Mills replied that they did not; but that they were preparing the way to follow this command. Unfortunately the elements of disaffection and division existed in the churches of Maine. In June, 1880, after debating the question for several years, the "Waldo Quarterly Meeting withdrew from the general body in Maine, and organized an Eldership, assuming the name of the Waldo Eldership." It adopted the Rules of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, of which Mills was at this time a member. Its territory embraced the counties of Waldo, Penobscot, Kennebec and Lincoln. There were twelve churches and eight preachers in this Eldership. Three of these counties are comparatively small, and lie contiguous, in the southern part of the State; while Penobscot extends from the northern border of Waldo to Aroostook county, the northern-most county in the State, adjoining New Brunswick on the west. In this county Mills was successful in organizing some churches. In February, 1882, an Eldership was organized in this section of the State, called the East Maine Eldership. This included New Brunswick. The action in organizing this Eldership in Maine, in addition to the one authorized by the General Eldership, and which had the State lines for its boundaries, was criticized, and was defended by Mills on the ground that the distance from the Aroostook and New Brunswick part of the territory to the territory of the Waldo Eldership was too great to be conveniently traveled by ministers and delegates, being from 150 to 200 miles. And also on the ground of natural right for ministers and churches to organize Elderships when they think advisable to do so: "I supposed," said Mills, "that ministers had a perfect right to form themselves into an Eldership in any State, or Province, at a proper distance from the Maine Eldership." If the brethren who organized the Eldership in the southern counties of the State before the General Eldership in 1881 approved such a step, "have the brethren not the same right in New Brunswick and Aroostook county, Maine?" However, the Editor who had criticised this action was not convinced of this reasoning, and so in the issue of The Advocate of April 5, 1882, he fully explained the polity of the Church as embodied in the Constitution of the General Eldership. These same elements of a centrifugal character were at work more or less in all parts of the Maine territory, and it was feared would ultimately prove disastrous.

This was a period of reconstruction, rather than extension of the work, in East Pennsylvania. Some mission enterprises were begun within the old territory, as at Mt. Carmel, Northumberland county, in Perry county, Fishing Creek Valley, at several points in Dauphin county, and one in Lancaster county. But the repairing, enlarging and rebuilding of houses of worship was the special work of these five years. At several points the interest decreased to such an extent that houses were closed, and finally sold. This was the case at Carlisle, Cumberland county. In January, 1880, a committee was authorized by the Board of Incorporation "to rent the bethel to the Dunkard Brethren." And not long after the property was placed in the hands of the Standing Committee to sell. The bethel at Strinestown, York county, was sold in the Summer of 1880. The rededication of the bethel at Green Spring, Cumberland county, after extensive repairs, was reported in February, 1880. The preaching on the occasion was by O. H. Betts, who was assisted by R. M. Pine and H. Mills. In Lancaster City the church at Prince and Orange streets undertook the work of establishing a mission at the intersection of Green and Christian streets. A Sunday-school was organized June 1, 1879, and a mission chapel built during the Fall and Winter following. This was dedicated by the pastor, D. A. L. Laverty, assisted by A. H. Long and J. W. Deahong on March 1, 1880. Mission work in Northumberland county was carried on energetically by J. C. Hoover and D. H. Mumma. Hoover organized a church of twenty members at Mt. Carmel, and one of ten members at Rocktown, both in the Spring of 1880. A house of worship was erected at Mt. Carmel, and dedicated October 4, 1883, under the pastorate of S. Smith. At what was known as the Shoemaker appointment, Lurgan township, Franklin county, under the labors of F. L. Nicodemus, a bethel was built in the Spring of 1880, and was dedicated July 4th, G. Sigler officiating. This is a historic spot, as it was the home of the parents of A. X. and P. K. Shoemaker. As early as 1850 or 1851 A. X. Shoemaker preached there, and held a very successful revival meeting. Only a few of the converts were brought into the church, and with the disadvantages under which the church labored, worshiping in a private house, or the school-house, no progress was made. Nicodemus became pastor in the Fall of 1879, and had a large revival. The work of building a church-house was at once begun, and the corner-stone was laid by C. Price on April 30th, assisted by G. L. Cowan. At Rockville, Dauphin county, the church, though almost extinct, had the unique experience of two dedications within one year. Under the labors of C. I. Behney the bethel was repaired, and was rededicated December 19, 1880. W. L. Jones had been secured for the dedicatory services, but was prevented from attending, and the pastor preached the sermons. O. J. Farling was present and assisted in the services. In the Spring of 1881 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company made a proposition to the Chairman of the Standing Committee and Agent of the Board of Incorporation, C. H. Forney, to purchase the lot on which the bethel stood for the laying of an additional track. The sale to the Company was effected, and the building was removed to the new location, and was dedicated November 20, 1881. A. H. Long did the preaching on the occasion, assisted by the pastor, J. A. Mac-

Dannald. On what was then known as the Stonerstown circuit (Saxton), S. B. Howard had an extensive revival in the mining town of Robertsdale, Huntingdon county, in the Winter of 1881, and a church was organized, which under the labors of W. J. D. Edwards became quite strong. But while it felt that it "ought to have a meeting-house," the work was deferred, and the church, by removals and deaths, was reduced to a few families. At Martinsburg, Blair county, under the pastoral labors of G. Sigler, the bethel was dedicated May 22, 1881. Through the zealous efforts of P. Stanton, a colored minister, the church at Brownsville, Franklin county, succeeded in building a house of worship, which was dedicated August 7, 1881. While J. A. MacDannald was pastor at Marysville, Perry county, two dedications took place on that circuit. Extensive repairs were made to the meeting-house at Marysville, and it was reopened with appropriate services on September 25, 1881, D. A. L. Lavery doing the preaching. The year following the church at Hartman's, Fishing Creek Valley, erected a substantial frame bethel, which was dedicated on August 27, 1882, by A. Swartz. The bethel at McClure's Gap, Cumberland county, was built in the Summer of 1881, and dedicated December 18th. G. W. Seilhammer preached the sermons, assisted in the services by the pastor, W. S. Smith. With J. M. Carvell as pastor, the bethel in Shippensburg underwent "a complete transformation," and was dedicated by S. D. C. Jackson on December 13, 1881. The church at Auburn, Schuylkill county, with I. Hay as pastor, built a new bethel, nearer the center of the town, which was dedicated May 21, 1882. The house of worship at Palmyra, Lebanon county, was rededicated on September 17, 1882. The pastor, F. L. Nicodemus, secured the services of I. Hay for German preaching on Friday and Saturday evenings; A. Swartz, Sabbath morning, and J. C. Seabrooks, Sabbath evening, both in English. S. Spurrier, architect, builder and pastor, during the Summer of 1882, built a bethel at New Baltimore, Franklin county, which was dedicated by W. J. D. Edwards, November 5, 1882. Spurrier, after the dedication, went to a point called Hughes Old Forge, 6 miles East of Waynesboro; Franklin county, and held a brief revival meeting, which resulted in the organization of a church. The Camp Hill church, under the labors of C. C. Bartels, remodeled and repaired its house of worship, which was dedicated by S. D. C. Jackson, February 11, 1883. The Mt. Pleasant house of worship, York county, was rededicated on February 18, 1883, by G. W. Seilhammer, assisted by A. H. Long. H. E. Reece was the pastor. Another point on his field was Wellsville, York county. Two miles from this village a bethel was built, which was dedicated May 27, 1883. G. W. Seilhammer preached on the occasion. This house of worship was christened "Mt. Olivet Bethel." The church of God and the River Brethren joined in building a meeting-house at the Clover Creek appointment, Blair county, which G. Sigler dedicated June 10, 1883. D. S. Shoop was pastor. The River Brethren were represented on the occasion by John Bowers and Peter Keagy; and the Progressive Dunkards by "Elder Spanogle." With W. Sanborn as pastor, the church on Nagle street, Harrisburg, was renovated and repaired in the Spring of 1883, and rededicated July 1st, by Thomas Neal, G. W. Getz preaching in the evening. C. C. Bartels officiated at the rededication of the bethel at Wormleysburg, Cumberland county, July 29, 1883. J. Haifeigh participated in the services. The church at Puttstown in the Spring of 1883 decided to build a new bethel at Saxton, midway between Stonerville and Puttstown, the corner-stone of which was laid September 16th, with appropriate services conducted by D. S. Shoop. The house was completed by the following Spring, and was dedicated May 25, 1884. J. Haifeigh did the preaching. F. L. Nicodemus was the pastor, and besides him H. W. Long, Simon Fleegal and H. Whitaker were present at the dedication. In Altoona, Blair county, the original bethel was replaced by a new and much larger house, under the labors of J. W. Deshong, and was dedicated by D. S. Shoop on November 4, 1883. S. D. C. Jackson officiated at the rededication of All-Workers Bethel (Green Street), Harrisburg, March 16, 1884. The pastor was Thomas Neal. O. J. Farling, an active, aggressive missionary, began holding meetings "of his own accord," in the new village of Baldwin (Steelton), three miles below Harrisburg, in 1882. He rented and fixed up a Hall for a Sunday-school, in which he held a successful revival in the Winter of 1882-3, which resulted in the organization of a church. In the Winter following the Standing Committee appointed T. Still to this mission, and authorized him to purchase ground, collect funds and proceed with the building of a bethel. This was done in the Spring and Summer of 1884, so that on September 21, 1884, the corner-stone was laid. G. W. Getz preached on the occasion. The house was finished during the Winter, and the dedicatory services were held February 22, 1885. G. W. Seilhammer preached the sermons, and was assisted in the services by S. C. Stonesifer. The bethel at Andersontown, York county, after undergoing thorough repairs, was rededicated on December 7, 1884. O. H. Betts was the pastor. S. D. C. Jackson officiated at the rededication of the Churchtown bethel, Cumberland county, on December 28, 1884. The preacher in charge was J. C. Seabrooks. During the pastorate of J. M. Speese, the church at Washington Borough, Lancaster county, thoroughly repaired and greatly improved the house of worship, which was reopened with sermons by G. W. Seilhammer and B. F. Beck on November 9, 1884.

It might be said of the ministers and churches of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, in the words of Gray, that during this period they "kept the noiseless tenor of their way." But little out of the routine of church work is noticeable. Four new houses of worship were built and dedicated. Of these, one was located in the beautiful Middletown Valley, Frederick county, Md. The church there was organized by Winebrenner and Bean in 1852, and during nearly thirty years had worshiped in a school-house. While several times they planned to build a bethel, the purpose failed of execution until late in the year 1879. By December 20, 1879, the new bethel was completed, and on that evening the last services were held in the school-house. On the morning of the 21st they met in the bethel, which was solemnly consecrated to the divine worship, G. Sigler preaching the sermons, and Saxton, Staub and Philhower taking active part in the services. The second one was built at Mayberry, Carroll county, Md. The corner-stone was laid May 29, 1880, four ministers participating in the services—Lookingbill, Naill, Selby and Palmer. The dedication occurred October 31, 1880, when W. L. Jones did the preaching. Naill, Palmer and Selby took part in the services during the day. The historic church at Uniontown, Carroll county, Md., early in the year 1882 resolved to build a new meeting-house to take the place of the old Reformed church in which they had worshiped from the time of their organization in 1833. The church was composed principally of the Reformed members which had been converted under the preaching of Winebrenner and his collaborators. They retained for their use the Reformed house of worship, built in 1817. But when they decided to build a new house, they bought out the right of the Reformed Church Synod, and used the materials in the new house. The corner-stone was laid June 3, 1882. A. H. Long preached morning and evening in the Methodist Protestant house of worship. Lookingbill and Fleegal assisted in the services. The house was finished, and was dedicated October 29, 1882, G. Sigler preaching the sermons. Long, Fuss and Lookingbill participated in the services. After hard struggling and great sacrifices, the church at Sharpsburg, Washington county, Md., succeeded in completing their house of worship, and dedicated it December 17, 1882. W. Palmer preached on the occasion, and the church also enjoyed the presence of J. A. Saxton, J. W. Kipe and J. A. Staub.

It was quite natural, and of great importance to the West Pennsylvania Eldership, that persistent efforts should be made to build up a strong church in Pittsburgh. Conditions, however, were so adverse that repeated failures were experienced. In the Spring of 1880, with G. A. Bartlebaugh as pastor, a new preaching point was opened in Allegheny City. A church was formed of eight members, and a Sunday-school organized. Bartlebaugh preached alternately at this point and at the Pittsburgh bethel. The debt on the latter property weighed heavily against the work. An effort was made to provide the means to liquidate the debt by selling the vacant lot in the rear of the building, with a frontage of 63 feet and a depth of 32 feet. The entire property was placed for sale in the hands of the Treasurer of the Eldership in 1882. At a point about 5 miles from Stonersville, Westmoreland county, lived Solomon Fulmer. He invited B. F. Bolton to visit him and preach for the people in his community. This he did in September, 1878. In 1879 he held a grove meeting there, and on February 18, 1880, he began a revival meeting in a school-house, which resulted, on the last Sabbath in the month, in the formal determination to build a bethel. In March a church of twenty members was organized, and the work of erecting a house of worship entered upon. The corner-stone was laid on August 8, 1880, by P. Loucks, who was assisted by D. A. Stevens and J. Gallentin. It was decided to call the new house of worship "Grandview Bethel," and it was so dedicated November 14, 1880. The dedicatory sermon was preached by G. Sigler. The cost of the house was $1,500. At Draketown, Somerset county, under the labors of G. J. Bartlebaugh, a "Union Bethel" was built in the Summer of 1880, and was dedicated by J. Hickernell on December 19th. In Fayette county the work was in good condition, and one church was organized in 1881. J. W. Davis was doing mission work in Franklin, Venango county, during the Winter of 1880-1. He organized "a mission church in the city." When A. R. McCahan was appointed to New Brighton, Beaver county, in the Fall of 1880, the church at that place decided to erect a new bethel. This they did the following Summer, at a cost of $1,700. The house was dedicated October 2, 1881, the sermon on the occasion having been preached by J. S. Marple. Other ministers present and participating in the services were B. F. Bolton, R. Vanaman, D. T. Leach, N. M. Anderson, W. H. H. Criswell and W. B. Elliott. The Center Bethel, now Alverton, Westmoreland county, which was built in 1863, had become too small, and needed repairs. In the Spring of 1881 the church decided to modernize the building and to enlarge it by the addition of a cross section of a building in the rear, 44 by 24 feet, at a total cost of $2,319.00. The dedicatory services were held October 30, 1881, with preaching by M. S. Newcomer. The efficient pastor of the church was R. L. Byrnes. The bethel at Indian Creek, Fayette county, erected under the labors of J. W. Gallatin, was dedicated September 3, 1882. The sermon was preached by R. L. Byrnes, who was assisted during the day by J. Hickernell. The house cost $974.75. The West Pennsylvania Eldership included Garrett county, Md., adjoining Somerset on the south. In the Summer of 1882, with Joseph Grimm as pastor, the little church at Sand Spring, Garrett county, Md., built a bethel, which was dedicated by J. S. Marple on September 2nd. It was christened "Grimm's Chapel." J. R. H. Latchaw came to Venango county from Iowa in the Fall of 1881, and took charge of the work in and around Barkeyville. Under his labors a bethel was built at Hickory Grove, Victory township, Venango county, which was dedicated May 14, 1882. J. W. Bloyd, D. T. Leach and W. R. Covert were the ministers present. October 17, 1882, with D. A. Stevens as pastor, R. L. Byrnes dedicated the new bethel at Laurel Run, Westmoreland county. H. D. Grimm formed a new church of forty-seven members at a point in Greene county, Pa., in January, 1883. The church at West Newton, Westmoreland county, "enlarged and greatly improved its house of worship," virtually rebuilding it after its partial destruction by fire. The cornerstone was laid May 11, 1884, and the finished bethel was dedicated August 31, 1884, by G. W. Sellhammer. J. W. Davis was the pastor. The work in West Virginia was making steady, if not rapid, progress, and the territory was being enlarged. There were indications of growing permanence in the building of houses of worship and in the missionary spirit which seemed to prevail among ministers and churches. At Cameron, in Marshall county, a bethel was built in 1881, and dedicated by J. S. Marple on July 3rd. At Pipe Creek, Ohio, on the Woodland circuit, W. G. Steele began preaching in 1882, and succeeded in organizing a church of twenty-seven members. They bought a Presbyterian house of worship; remodeled it, and dedicated it November 16, 1884. W. R. Craig preached on Saturday and Sabbath evenings, and J. C. Cunningham, on Sabbath morning. In 1883 work was begun in the extreme southern part of the State by W. H. Bailey. He had a revival in Raleigh county, and found calls coming in which he could not answer. He strongly urged ministers from the North to come and occupy the ground. He also preached in Greenbrier county, where in 1884 conditions were so favorable that "a church of from twenty-five to one hundred might be organized if we had a man to preach for them." Belmont county, Ohio, belonged to West Pennsylvania. In 1881 D. T. Leach was pastor of the Riverview Mission, in this county, and he had successful revivals at Riverview and Franklin Station. At the latter place the church had increased to fifty-two, and they had "bought a house to worship God in," and were raising "funds toward building a new house." At Bellaire, same county, the church, under the pastoral labors of W. B. Long, built a new house of worship, which was consecrated to the worship of God February 24, 1884. J. S. Marple officiated, assisted by J. C. Cunningham. In July, 1883, J. W. Bloyd, pastor of the Uniontown Mission, Fayette county, Pa., "erected a large tabernacle-tent on the old show ground in the southern part of the town," where he carried on a series of meetings in an "endeavor to effect the organization of a church of God."

Ohio had at this time an energetic, aggressive ministry. And though naturally somewhat discouraged by the failure of the work at Mansfield, they went to work with unabated zeal to "strengthen the things which remained." More formal organization of local church work was effected and a number of new church houses were built and old ones repaired. Ministers, too, manifested a deeper interest in their intellectual culture. A "Literary Class was organized for mutual benefit," of which many of the pastors became voluntary members. More attention was given to the proper deeding of church property, so that all possible losses might be prevented. As an instance of circuit organizations for the purpose of looking after the financial interests, the McComb circuit may be cited. On December 16, 1882, the officials of the different churches on the field met with the pastor, A. P. McNutt, and adopted a Constitution, By-Laws and Rules of Order. This circuit council consisted of the elders and deacons of each church, and the pastor. It fixed the salary of the pastor, and apportioned it to the churches. Prior to this date individual churches in Elderships in Pennsylvania had been framing Constitutions for their more orderly government. The first dedication in this period was that of the bethel at Liberty, which occurred August 22, 1880. The preaching was done by J. W. Aukerman. On November 21, 1880, the Evergreen Bethel, two miles north of Fostoria, was dedicated. T. Koogle preached on the occasion. He also was the preacher at the dedication of the bethel at Kirby, which took place on January 1, 1882. J. M. Cassel preached the Sabbath evening sermon. The bethel at Beery's, after being extensively repaired under the labors of E. Poling, pastor, was re-opened January 22, 1882. Small and Koogle did the preaching. At Rising Sun, Wood county, J. M. Cassel officiated on January 1, 1882. T. J. Lewis and M. C. Mowen, with the pastor, J. H. McNutt, also participated in the services. A feature of many of the Ohio dedications was the presence of so many ministers. At the dedication of the Colton Bethel, June 18, 1882, six ministers were in attendance, including the pastor, C. N. Belman. J. M. Cassel officiated, with the assistance in the services of Koogle, Vass, Poling and Lewis. Center Bethel was rededicated on the same day. It is located in Seneca county, and had for its pastor W. P. Burchard. J. W. Aukerman was the preacher, who had as assistants G. W. Wilson and W. H. Oliver. The church at Moreland built a new house of worship in the Summer of 1882; which was dedicated by Aukerman on November 26, 1882. There were also present besides the pastor, W. P. Burchard, these ministers: Thomas Metzler, C. Winbiger, W. P. Small, E. Poling and G. L. Cowan. A new house of worship was finished at a point seven miles west of Belmore, Hancock county, under the labors of A. P. McNutt, which was dedicated on January 14, 1883. J. M. Cassel preached the dedicatory sermon. Other ministers present and assisting were Burchard, Belman, Warren and J. H. McNutt. One mile and a half south-east of Mercertown, Mercer county, a new bethel was built under the supervision of the pastor, E. Poling, which was dedicated by T. Koogle, September 9, 1883. The enterprise of the people and church at Enterprise, Van Wert county, where T. Koogle was pastor, was lauded by J. M. Cassel, who preached the dedicatory sermon of their new bethel on December 2, 1883. On Thursday evening previous W. P. Small preached, and on Friday and Saturday evenings, B. F. Bolton.

Ft. Wayne Mission is not the only Church enterprise which was crippled or killed by a heavy debt incurred at its incipency. The present period opened with a meeting of the Board of Missions of the Indiana Eldership in January, 1880, when a resolution was adopted "to make one more effort toward liquidating the debt on the Ft. Wayne Mission property." Ober was appointed to canvass the city, and Markley the Eldership territory. They were instructed to take subscriptions exclusively, to be called in when the entire amount of the debt had been secured. At this time the Board's assets were $166.00; its liabilities, $739.30. To give moral support to the mission, the Board of Missions of the General Eldership held its annual meeting at Ft. Wayne; but it could otherwise do nothing for the work there. The Eldership was not able to supply the pulpit with a pastor in October, 1880, as it was making "every effort to pay off the debt." In December, B. D. Bright, of Michigan, was requested to come to Ft. Wayne and "hold a meeting of days as soon as possible." The Board also "requested the Sisters' Missionary Board to raise $200.00 to support a minister at the Mission." After the holidays, in 1881, Bright held a meeting as requested, and reported "little accomplished; none came into fellowship." In September, 1882, he was impressed that "this mission work does not meet the hearty approval of the brotherhood and sisterhood of the Indiana Eldership. And so they withhold their means." The debt on the mission property in October, 1883, was "$467.28, over and above the Eldership loan and stock certificates." The Board of Missions was directed to repair the house and send a minister there. As this could not be done, the mission was made part of the Roanoke circuit. In October, 1884, the property was placed in charge of D. Komp, and the mission was left off the list of appointments. Little progress was made in other parts of the Eldership. At Sugar Grove, Green township, Noble county, a new house of worship was dedicated by S. D. C. Jackson, May 29, 1881. Under the labors of I. W. Markley, the church at Sheldon, Allen county, built a new bethel, which was dedicated December 25, 1881. Lovett preached the dedicatory sermon in the morning, and in the evening an ordinance meeting was held. Three and one-half miles south-east of Columbia City, Whitley county, a house of worship was erected during the Summer of 1883, which was dedicated by R. H. Bolton on December 16th. It was in the Summer and Fall of 1884 that the name of Mrs. Maria B. Woodworth first appeared as a preacher in the Indiana Eldership. In the latter part of July and the first week in August she, with her husband, held a large revival meeting at Buzzard's school-house, Indiana, and organized a church of ninety members. Before she left they had raised $400.00 toward building a bethel. At the Eldership in 1884 she was licensed to preach and was appointed "Eldership General Evangelist."

One of the most serious disadvantages under which the ministry in Michigan was laboring from the beginning of its history was not only the inadequate, but almost the total want of support of the active preachers. After the dedication at Bangor the pastor, Charles Moulton, wrote: "The greatest and most distressing evil that we have to overcome in the Michigan Eldership is to get our people to see the necessity of supporting the minister in charge of a work. They think that he should work in the field, or woods, or some other place during six days of the week and provide for his family, and preach on Sundays for nothing. We must seek to effect a change in this respect, and redeem our cause in Michigan." Almost no progress is indicated in the Eldership during these five years. A colored church was organized in Cheshire, Allegan county, of which R. Smith was made pastor by the Standing Committee in January, 1881. In Branch county, on the Indiana State line, some progress was made in several new localities. At Bangor, Van Buren county, the church had for some years been worshipping in a meeting-house built by some other religious body, which had spent $3,800.00 on the property, mortgaged it to pay bills, and was not able to redeem it. It became the property of the mortgagee, who lost about $3,000.00. He had permitted the church of God to worship in it rent free, and in the Spring of 1882, sold it to the church for $600.00. It was "a good, spacious and substantial" building, according to S. D. C. Jackson, who officiated at the dedication on June 4, 1882. S. Spencer and Wm. Redding were present and gave assistance in the services.

The final events in the history of the Chicago Mission transpired in 1881-2. At the General Eldership in 1878 final settlement was made with Shoemaker, when there was due the Eldership $1,329.10. By the meeting of said body in 1881 this had been paid, except the small balance of $13.70. On June 22, 1881, the General Eldership authorized the Board of Incorporation to sell the property. Said Board on June 22, 1882, directed its committee to proceed with the sale, which was done, and the property was sold for $8,000.00. Total cost of sale was $435.10, leaving a net balance of $7,564.90, which was set apart as a Permanent Missionary Fund of the General Eldership. A new church organization was effected at Todd's Point, February, 1880, by E. C. Turner. The failure of the Chicago mission enterprise did not subdue, nor seriously repress, the courage of the Illinois brethren. In 1879 they planned to start a mission at Mendota, La Salle county, with M. S. Newcomer in charge of the work. Part of his duty was to collect money to pay the rent of the house of worship secured for religious services and to support himself. After laboring in this double capacity for a year and a half, he wrote, "We at last see a gleam of light." This was on August 8, 1881, when a church of nine members was organized. He was followed by I. S. Richmond, who "took hold of the matter energetically, assisted by the sacrificing help of W. B. Lewellin. Ground was bought, and the work of erecting a small mission chapel was begun. The corner-stone was laid June 29, 1884, and the building was completed and ready for dedication October 12, 1884. It cost $500.00. The dedicatory services were conducted by M. S. Newcomer. He had also officiated at the dedication of "a house of worship completed on the Shelby county mission," on February 6, 1881. Many years previous, Sandoe had preached, in the Enfield school-house, near "Father Bear's." In the Winter of 1880-1, E. C. Turner had "a gracious revival" there, when they concluded to build a house of worship. Sandoe preached the first sermon in the new house, Saturday evening, February 5th. In January, 1883, Sandoe did good evangelistic work in Coles county. Thence he went to Platt county and assisted Gregory in a meeting at Milmine, where on January 31st they "organized a church of twenty-two members, all heads of families." An "imposing house of worship" was built at Warrensburg, Macon county, in the Summer of 1883, Newcomer being the pastor, with Mrs. A. C. Newcomer as his assistant. It cost $3,500. It was dedicated December 23, 1883, the preaching on the occasion being done by W. W. Lovett, with W. I. Berkstresser and D. Weigel present and participating in the services. Unable to complete their house of worship without foreign help, the Board of Missions of the Illinois Eldership appropriated $100.00 for that purpose, on condition that the deed be so written as to secure the property to the Eldership in case the church should become extinct. The bethel built at Melrose, Clark county, under the labors of D. H. Rupp, was dedicated November 9, 1884. Also one at a point three miles north of Martinsburg, on Rupp's charge, which was dedicated November 16, 1884. Sandoe and Bernard preached the sermons. A spirit of non-co-operation developed in certain churches in the northern part of the State, which was severely rebuked by the Board of Missions as "revolutionary." Newcomer, as Assistant Editor of The Advocate, regarded this as one of "the dangers which confront the Church." That the Church is in danger of "losing vital force; subside to a dead, lifeless formality," and that one cause which "contributes to this result is lack of co-operation."

After the failure of the Chicago Mission enterprise, A. X. Shoemaker decided to seek a home, and possibly a field of ministerial labor in north-western Iowa. He finally selected the beautiful Maple Valley, in Ida county; and while he did quite a good deal of preaching, he gradually became interested in an extensive land agency. Through his influence quite a number of Church families bought farms and located in Ida county, in the vicinity of Ida Grove. Among the families which invested extensively in land was that of Jesse Kennedy, of Mt. Joy, Pa. In 1879 he located there, and began agitating the question of Church work in the county by the appointment of a regular missionary. There were families of the Church scattered through the county of sufficient number to form several churches, all good, true and energetic members of churches in the East. As I. E. Boyer had arranged to move on "one of the Forney farms in March, 1880, to farm and preach," the Standing Committee was asked to appoint him missionary to Ida county, which was done February 18, 1880. D. Werts had also located there, and did a good deal of preaching. November 15, 1880, Boyer was reappointed, with an appropriation of $175.00, he to devote all his time to mission work. But he reported "meeting interests have not been very prosperous." He had three regular preaching points—one near Ida Grove; one six miles south-east, and one six miles north, of Ida Grove. He also preached in the court-house, but this was soon closed against religious services. Arrangements were then made with the Baptist church to hold services in their house of worship. Realizing the need of a bethel, they decided to build in the Fall of 1881; but a partial failure of crops prevented the work from being begun. January, 1882, G. T. Kimmel, the new missionary, entered on the work. His field also included Woodbury county. He had a revival in a school-house near Ida Grove, which further stimulated the brethren to plan for a house in "the little city" of Ida Grove, which had a population of from 1,200 to 1,500. On May 21, 1883, "the Church of God people in the vicinity of Ida Grove held a meeting and decided to build a bethel at a cost of from $3,000 to $3,500. They at once subscribed $2,000, and in a short time began the work. In August, 1883, Mrs. McFadden, widow of Wm. McFadden, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, reported the work so far advanced that "we expect soon to have a bethel to worship in." But this anticipation was not realized for some years. Before work was begun at Ida Grove successful mission work was done in Guthrie county, by A. Wilson. A bethel was built in the Beaver District of said county, known as the "Beaver Bethel," which was dedicated by S. D. C. Jackson on July 4, 1880. In Mahaska county, toward the south-eastern part of the State, J. M. Mullen succeeded in organizing a church of twelve members on July 28, 1880. A mission was also created in Union county, in the south-west, and L. F. Chamberlin was appointed as missionary, to begin his work in April, 1882. F. C. Melson had been preaching more or less in the county.

In Nebraska the work was making slow progress. Some of the original ground was lost, and the new fields were not making much progress. The Crete parsonage was rented, and the committee to which the question of the disposition of the entire property was referred reported in favor of its sale in 1880. It had an offer of $700.00 for the bethel and two lots. As the title to the property was vested in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, the Board of Incorporation of the General Eldership could not sell it. Said Eldership was therefore requested in 1883 to transfer its title to the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. The depressing effect of this failure on the work in Nebraska could not be concealed. In Fillmore county better success attended the labors of Aller and others, and additions to the churches were reported. W. T. Harris was the missionary in south-eastern Nebraska. A. G. Bogart in Seward and Polk counties. J. Etherton in 1882 was general missionary in the State. He was succeeded in the Fall by J. C. Forncrook as General Evangelist. He had a number of successful revivals, and during the year organized two churches. Work was done to an encouraging extent by Shaw on the Otoe Indian Reservation in the south-eastern corner of the State. In the Winter of 1883, Mary Berkstresser, licensed by the Illinois Eldership in 1881, visited Clay county, Neb., and at the solicitation of friends held a series of meetings in the Liberty school-house, during which "between fifty and sixty manifested a desire to accept Christ." "Elder Evans assisted in the services." J. C. Forncrook visited the place on March 18th, and organized a church of nineteen members, which shortly after was considerably increased.

In Missouri, as elsewhere in these western States, the ministers were somewhat unsettled, and for want of a full support in many instances left their fields of labor, and the cause suffered. This was true in the north-western section of the State. Yet the people were receptive to the truth, and when they received faithful preaching responded, and the work prospered. In 1881 D. Blakely was pastor in the north-western counties of Missouri. At Alanthus Grove, in Gentry county, a meeting-house was erected under his labors, which was dedicated August 28, 1881. The failure of C. S. Bolton to reach the place gave to C. Gaston the honor of preaching the dedicatory sermon. Blakely lamented that notwithstanding the liberal manner in which the Board of Missions had treated the field "there is no move elsewhere on the territory to build houses of worship." Good work was also done in Harrison county, adjoining Gentry on the East. J. N. Smith resigned the charge in 1881, and C. S. Bolton succeeded him. Revivals were enjoyed, and there was a demand for more laborers. What was known as the Central Missouri Mission, Morgan county, also experienced a number of revivals under the labors of M. C. Ogden in the Winter of 1882-3. At Elmo, Nodaway county, Blakely began to preach in the Town Hall in 1881, and after a revival steps were taken to build a bethel. But the work was deferred for a year, when under the pastoral care of C. S. Bolton the house was built, and was dedicated on October 15, 1882. F. F. Kimer did the preaching. G. T. Bell came up from Arkansas and held revival meetings in Barry county, organizing two churches in the Winter of 1882-3.

Kansas continued as part of the Kansas and Missouri Eldership until 1881, when the Kansas Eldership was organized. At the Eldership session in 1882 there were fifteen churches and fifteen additional preaching points, with ten or twelve ministers within its territory. Some churches had gone down because of neglect by the ministers, or removal of their members. The ministers were men of zeal and a self-sacrificing spirit; but only a few were supported fully, so that they could devote all their time to the work. M. C. Ogden was an active missionary. In 1880 he was on the South-western Kansas Mission, preaching in Reno, Kingman and Rice counties. In January of that year he organized a church at Sego, Reno county. He was followed by Newton Hill, who met with encouraging success. In March, 1883, assisted by C. B. Konkell, a good revival meeting was held in the Mendon school-house, Rice county, resulting in the organization of a church of seven members. J. C. Forncrook was missionary on the North-west Kansas Mission, embracing Norton and Phillips counties, and one or two counties in Nebraska. The work was prospering. In the Spring of 1880 he organized a church at Hugh Prairie, Phillips county. Later, one at Long Island, with eleven members. In August, one at Chessman's, with four members, and one at Clayton, with ten members. In 1881, he organized a church at Hall's, or Hale's, in Phillips county. J. W. Felix went to Ellsworth county from East Pennsylvania, and preached the word faithfully. In April, 1881, he organized a church six miles north-east of Wilson, near the center of the State. Clara Yutay, who was licensed in 1877, was appointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to the South-eastern Kansas Mission. She had been preaching some at New Pittsburg, Crawford county, Kas., and at Pleasant Hill, Mo. Under her labors a church was organized at Ozark in the Summer of 1883. A Bethel was built on her field, six miles north-west of Oswego, county seat of Labette county, which was dedicated September 12-14, 1884. It was called Center Bethel. P. K. Shoemaker preached on Friday evening and Sabbath evening, and C. S. Bolton on Saturday evening and Sabbath morning. A new house of worship, the first in southern Kansas, was built six miles north-west of Center Bethel, at Parsons, Labette county, under the labors of R. T. Sargent, which was dedicated January 14, 1884. The preaching on the occasion was done by Mary Newcomer, of Illinois. The licensing of Clara Yutay induced the Standing Committee to appoint a committee to draft "a form of female and exhorters' licenses." The Standing Committee also found a serious trouble in the church at Keystone, Kingman county, owing to the expulsion of a prominent member by action of the church. It declared the action illegal, and decided that the ruling power is in the elders duly elected by the church. Some friction developed between the Kansas and Missouri Eldership and the Nebraska Eldership because a member of the latter was laboring in the territory of the former without becoming a member. The trouble was aggravated by the passage of resolutions by the Elderships, instead of taking the constitutional course in such cases. W. H. Cross labored successfully in Wilson and Allen counties, and then in Labette county. J. A. Miller, missionary in Taylor county, Neb., crossed over into Republic county, Kas., where he organized a church, in 1882, at the Cuba school-house. The ministers in the southern part of the State, led by C. B. Konkel, began in 1880 to agitate the question of a Kansas Eldership. The principal plea was the great distance ministers and delegates had to travel in going to the Eldership meetings. Ministers in the northern counties opposed it. But a meeting was called at Keplinger's school-house, Crawford county, "to meet September 18, 1880, to discuss the propriety or impropriety of organizing a new Eldership in Kansas." A majority of those present voted in favor of a Kansas Eldership.

The work in Arkansas was of an unstable, fluctuating character, possibly owing to the character of the people; yet evidently also as a result of instability on the part of ministers and the emotional element in their preaching. Sometimes half the preachers would quit their fields, leaving the entire work in a few hands. Extensive revivals were followed by reactions which proved well nigh fatal to newly organized churches. In the Winter of 1879-'80, D. S. Summit was the missionary in Montgomery county. He organized a church in January, 1880, called the Rocky Creek church. G. T. Bell preached in Benton county, where at the Redick school-house he organized a church of twenty-six members. J. W. Riddle was the missionary in Franklin county, and witnessed forty-one conversions in the Winter of 1880, and baptized fifty-six converts. In 1881 Bell succeeded in getting a number of families together for a church organization at Wild Cat, Benton county. He notes the fact that a number of "preachers have quit their fields," and that he and a few others "are left to care for twenty-five churches." The work was making fair progress among the colored people, and several colored ministers were diligently preaching the word. They had their own Standing Committee, duly appointed by the Eldership. In September, 1883, Bell organized a church of sixteen members at Pleasant Ridge, Sebastian county. At the close of a "protracted meeting at the Highland meeting-house," Washington county, in August, 1884, Bell organized a church of over thirty members.

Reports indicated that prospects were good for the establishment of churches among the Indians of the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1880 appointed G. T. Bell as missionary to the Cherokee Nation; but he declined to accept the work. Later B. F. Reese was appointed. He entered upon the work with commendable zeal. He had seven regular congregations to preach to, and his field extended 120 miles. He remained there only a short time. In February, 1882, James McCarthy, a full-blooded Indian, preached for the Indians. In 1883 J. W. Riddle spent part of his time in the Indian Territory, and with G. T. Bell conducted a successful meeting, followed by an organization of a church of Cherokee Indians. He also had good success at Camp Creek, where in September, 1884, the work of erecting a Bethel was well under way, and was finished in October, and dedicated. Camp Creek is in the Sequaway District, in which there was another organization at Redland. There was also one in the Flint District.

A persistent effort was made to redeem the work in Texas. The northern missionary, J. A. Smith, appointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1880, labored on the North-west Texas Mission, and E. Marple was assigned to the "East North Texas Mission." Smith reported the organization of a church at Duckworth school-house. He preached in Denton, Fannin and Collin counties. In the latter county measures were taken to build a meeting-house. A church was also organized at McKinney, in Collin county. Smith held a camp-meeting in Collin county, beginning July 5, 1880, at which there were fourteen conversions, eleven baptized and a church organized of twenty-four members. Three or four of the old churches were reorganized, while one church, with six members, was organized in Denton county; one, with thirty-two members, in Hunt county, and one, with fifteen members in Lamar county. The total number of members in the State was given as being two hundred and thirty-five. These encouraging reports were partly discredited by J. M. Brackeen, a member of the first organization in the State, as also by B. Ober, who, under appointment as missionary by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, returned to Texas in the Spring of 1882. He "did not find things in good condition," and reflected severely on Smith. In September, 1884, he reported the organization of one new church of ten members at Whitsborough. The new missionary to Texas, G. T. Kimmel, of the West Ohio Eldership, entered upon his work in July, 1884, under appointment by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership.

With the beginnings of Church emigration to Colorado, California and Washington, the brethren, especially in the West, began to think of mission work in those newer sections of the country. From the neighborhood of Polo, Mo., "quite a number of our families are about to emigrate to Washington Territory," wrote the minister in that county. They expected to locate "near where Brother Snodderly and other families of the Church are living," and it was suggested that they thus colonize and begin church work. J. E. McColley, of Roann, Wabash county, Ind., in June, 1880, made it known that he "contemplated going to Colorado, with the intention of laboring for the salvation of sinners and establishment of churches of God." The Board of Missions of the General Eldership thereupon "heartily approved of this noble work, and wished him Godspeed." D. B. Randell had removed previously to Livermore, Larimer county, Colo., and was preaching at several points. P. Clippinger, of the Kansas Eldership, in 1883, stated his intention to visit the brethren in Colorado and California. The Eldership thereupon requested the Board of Missions of the General Eldership "to recommend him as a minister to the confidence of the brethren in Colorado and California." Thus to follow Church families of good repute was the economical, good old way of doing effective Church extension work. It was only the lack of means which hindered the establishment of permanent churches in any number of localities to which Church families emigrated from points further East. Oregon called for a minister in January, 1880. J. Garrigus had removed to Greenville, Ore., and expressed his desire that "some good preacher might come this way and preach for us," and hoped "the day is not far distant when we can get a preacher to come here and preach for us."

Of all the oral discussions thus far conducted between ministers of the Church of God and ministers of other bodies, in several respects the most unique was one between W. Palmer, of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, and Elder C. C. Wells, of the Church of God of Jesus Christ." The challenge came from Wells. It was reported to the Eldership at its session in October, 1880. Formal action was taken, resolving, "That this Eldership gives its approval of said discussion." Four propositions were debated. Wells affirmed one negative: "That Feet-washing should not be practiced in the Church of God, because as taught and practiced by Christ and his Apostles it was a Jewish custom." Palmer affirmed three propositions: "That the spirit of man has a living, conscious existence after the death of the body;" "To baptize in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost is the only authorized formula of Christian baptism," and "The punishment of the wicked is eternal, conscious suffering." The debate was held in the Bethel at Germantown, Frederick county, Md., and began January 7, 1881. A debate between W. R. Covert, of the Church of God, and Rev. Williams, of the M. E.

Church, was held at Harmony, Butler county, Pa., on August 9 and 10, 1881. Williams had the affirmative of the negative proposition under discussion: "The washing of the saints' feet is not an ordinance of the New Testament." It was pre-arranged "that no decision was to be given;" but J. W. Davis, who reported the debate, stated that the opinion prevailed that "so far as argument was concerned Covert gained the victory." Covert had fine natural talents for polemical discussions, to which was added a deep-seated self-confidence. Then he had been practicing a little in a one-sided debate with Clark Braden, to whose arguments he had carefully listened in a sermon on "A Campbellite Conversion; or, What I Must Do to be Saved," delivered July 10, 1881. He dissected Braden's arguments with a keen-edged scalpel, and then showed the fallacies which were hidden in a wealth of words. Eager for other triumphs, Covert challenged through "The Dispatch," of Pittsburg, Pa., C. T. Russell "to discuss in a public debate the Creed of the Church of God, which is the inspired revelation known as the word of God." But "Mr. R. failed to come to time," and so Covert published him in the Pittsburg "Times" as having virtually "conceded that my position is true." B. Ober in a debate with Clark Braden in October, 1882, was "almost unanimously admitted, except their own members, to have fully sustained every point in debate." There were four propositions, of which Ober affirmed these two: "Church of God is the only proper, scriptural church title;" and, "The washing of the saints' feet is an ordinance commanded by Christ to be perpetuated in the church." Braden affirmed these two: "The kingdom or church was organized on the day of Pentecost;" and, "Water baptism is one of the conditions of remission of sins of the penitent believer, or sinner." In 1883 Covert had a public discussion with Robert Singer, of the Christian Church, during the session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, at Ursina, Somerset county, Pa. There were two propositions, of which Covert affirmed that "Washing of the saints' feet is an ordinance in the church of God instituted by Christ." Singer affirmed that "Immersion in water of a believer in Christ, the Son of God, is essential in order to the remission of sins." Some one telegraphed the Editor of The Advocate this laconic dispatch after the debate had closed: "Covert vs. Singer. Debate ended. Church property saved. Brethren jubilant. Enemy vanquished. Covert retires with fresh laurels from the theological contest." December, 1883, finds Covert in a very different role, the actor in a drama of another character. Pittsburg, Pa., was "in great excitement over the recent debate between Prof. Granger, of New York, and Prof. Seymore, who affirmed, and Elder W. R. Covert who denied, the proposition: Resolved, That animal magnetism exists and is the principal element in mesmerism." Again "Covert gained a decided victory," wrote W. B. Elliott. In May, 1884, Covert had a debate with a Mormon Apostle, involving these three propositions, or questions: "Is the Book of Mormon of divine origin, and are its teachings entitled to the respect and belief of mankind?" "Is the Church known as the Church of God in harmony with the church established by Jesus Christ and his Apostles as found recorded in the New Testament?" "Is the Church known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in harmony with the church established by Jesus Christ and his Apostles as found revealed in the New Testament?" The debate took place in the bethel at Pittsburg, and began May 5th. Only the first proposition was discussed, for eight consecutive evenings, when Covert "refused to debate the other two with the present opponent" because of the failure of W. H. Kelley "to produce any tangible arguments upon the question under discussion," and because of "W. H. Kelley and his brother E. F. Kelley, acting as moderator, failing to conform to parliamentary rules and usages of public debate."

The decrease of the disputatious spirit was indicated in the falling off in the number of controversies in The Advocate as well as in oral debates. And yet during this period there was a total of over thirty controversial articles and editorials published. Among the more prominent were these: "The Unpardonable Sin," discussed by John M. Harrel, of Iowa, and by the Editor. Various questions relating to the ordinance of washing the saints' feet, beginning May 24, 1881, with an article in favor of the ordinance, by Noah A. Cofmann. This was followed by two articles from the pen of Geo. W. Ashton, Iowa, in defense of the ordinance against the Editor of "The Standard," a Baptist paper of Chicago. The Editor of The Advocate on May 10, 1883, replied to the Editor of the "Reformed Church Messenger;" on May 17 and 31, and June 7 and 14, on "The Time of the Washing of Feet by Christ," and on June 21 on "The Apostolic Practice of Feet-washing." On November 28, 1883, Newcomer began a series of ten articles on "Is Feet-washing an Ordinance?" "Critic," of "Smoky City" (W. R. Covert), criticised Newcomer's articles sharply in two issues of the paper. "Philo" followed in "A Critic of the Critic on Feet-washing." "V. D." came to the aid of Newcomer in March, 1884, and Newcomer in two replies closed the discussion September 27, 1884. The discussion of the Communion question was broadened by adding to the mooted subject of the order of the ordinances, those of the interpretation of "supper being ended," "breaking bread" and "the love feast." Eight editorials were devoted to "The Love Feast and the Communion," in reply to questions and strictures on the subject by "An Inquiring Friend." The prevalence of faith-cures, and the doctrine of faith-healing, were warmly debated under these headings, and under the subject of "miracles," as many of the alleged cures seemed miraculous. Largely in the same connection the divisive doctrine of second-work sanctification was strongly antagonized as heretical in theory and mischievous in practice. The apparent tendency to the dual life of believers led to a careful discussion of "the unity of moral character" by the Editor as against C. W. Evans, of the Iowa Eldership. The Editor declared in an editorial on "Hungering After Righteousness" that "It is a stupendous delusion to think that we can be right in part. Righteousness is a unit. It is in the singular." This position was antagonized by Evans, and at once the form of the question was changed to that of unity of moral character, showing that supreme ultimate intention or purpose determines character, and not desultory executive acts of the will. The discussion continued eleven weeks. A similar discussion was precipitated between A. Wilson, of Iowa, and the Editor, on the old subject of receiving unbaptized persons into church fellowship. "The Divine Sonship of Christ" was thoroughly discussed editorially in reply to skeptical questions on the subject.

A few notable events characterized this period: Of these, two were of special interests to the churches in their temperance work and social purity. The White Cross Army was commenced by Rt. Rev. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, early in 1883. It was a popular movement among Christian workers generally. Brave, pure-hearted men and women enlisted in the cause and labored with great zeal. It was said that in many places "the order of the meetings is a very solemn one." It was introduced into many Sunday-schools. Then came the White Ribbon Army, a new phase of the temperance movement, which grew out of the International Sunday-school Lesson for December 7, 1884, Prov. xxiii. 29-35. It had its origin in the Bethany Sunday-school Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

On December 6, 1884, an enterprise was completed which had been before the public at different periods from the early Summer of 1848, and in which all religious bodies in the United States were interested, as well as other organizations and the States as political units. This was the Washington National Monument, at Washington, D. C. Weisshampel, in 1869, agitated the matter of having a marble block placed in the Monument by the Church of God, with a suitable inscription. This was to cost about $200.00, and the money was secured by voluntary contributions.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE decade from 1880 to 1890 in the development of the churches of God bears in a minor degree a resemblance in certain particulars to the Renaissance of the fifteenth century. The latter was a gradual evolution of the European races, a sort of rebirth, which denotes the transition from the period of history which has been called the Middle Ages to that which we call Modern. It was marked by a fresh stage of vital energy in general, which manifested itself in a freer exercise of the intellectual faculties stimulated by the revival of learning and its application to the arts and literature of modern peoples. Symonds regards this revival as a function of that vital energy, an organ of that mental evolution, which brought this modern world, with its new conceptions of philosophy and religion, its reawakened arts and sciences, its firmer grasp of the realities of human nature and the world, its manifold inventions and discoveries, its altered political systems, its expansive and progressive forces, into being. This forward movement on the part of the churches of God centers around two main institutions organized during this period, viz.: the principal institution of learning under their control, Findlay College, and the gradual development of the missionary spirit in organic form, as later seen in the Woman's General Missionary Society, both of which are reserved for separate consideration in following divisions of this work. Almost every department of Church enterprise felt the stimulus of these two factors. There was an augmentation of energy, an inflow of new blood into the leadership of the churches. The few remaining veterans in the ministry, a small remnant of the heroic men of the early decades of the Church's history, passed away during this period. The second generation of ministers was fast disappearing and new men gradually came to the front as leaders in the various Eldershops and in the churches. Old activities were intensified in some instances; worn-out methods were exchanged for newer ones, and more recently tested forms of organized work were put into effect.

One of these new forms of activity was the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. While the first organization of such a society was effected in 1881, and a constitution adopted which has stood the test of more than a quarter of a century; and while an annual convention was held as early as 1882, and the first national convention prior to 1885, in 1883 there were but a few societies outside of New England. The new movement received attention in The Advocate prior to 1885, and was under discussion and favorably acted upon by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1884. Only a few local societies were organized at that time in the territory of the Eldership; but they increased each year, until by 1890 a majority of the churches had effected organizations. In West Pennsylvania one of the first societies organized was at Stoner's, now Alverton, which was formed in the Summer of 1887. In Illinois Eldership the first society was organized at Decatur, July 5, 1887. Martinsville followed in 1888. The movement spread rather rapidly throughout the territory of the General Eldership, as it did in all Churches, until by 1890 societies had been organized in a majority of the Eldershops represented at the session of the General Eldership in that year. A Y. P. S. C. E. Union was also formed in East Pennsylvania Eldership, and one in Illinois, in 1890. The interdenominational character of the Y. P. S. C. E. seemed one of its most objectionable features. Another weak point discussed in those years was the age-limit. It was felt that to confine it to young people would prove detrimental to spirituality, and would divide churches into classes having but little practical sympathy. The churches of God were disinclined to follow the example of the Methodist Episcopal, the Baptist and a few other Churches, which organized their young people into societies of their own. In Canada the Methodist Church prefixed "Epworth League" to the general term of Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. The churches of God did not consider themselves as of sufficient numerical strength to adopt such a safe-guard against the influence of interdenominational associations.

Another important movement which began about 1883 in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and which gave added impetus to the Sabbath-school cause, was Children's Day. The main original purpose of this day was to give special recognition to the children in the public service of the sanctuary. The date of the first recorded service of this character is not now known. It was held in Pilgrim church, Brooklyn, N. Y., of which Rev. Dr. Storrs was pastor. The day was observed by isolated churches in the East Pennsylvania Eldership several years prior to 1885, but there was no concerted action. Even after the Sunday-School Convention, which met at Camp Hill, Cumberland county, Pa., in 1883, adopted a resolution in favor of the observance of the day, it received only a partial recognition. In the Fall of 1884 several annual Eldershops endorsed the action of the General Eldership of that year, and thus prepared the way for the formal introduction of the new movement in 1885. The second Lord's day in June, 1885, was the day fixed for the service. The Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees of Findlay College prepared a program for all the schools to use. It consisted, besides the usual devotional services, of two addresses; one exercise by children, and two essays. It was originally not a day to raise money; but other Churches had turned it to this use. When the General Eldership made it synchronous with College Day the paramount object was to secure funds for Findlay College. In this it has been eminently successful, as was anticipated by the fact that in 1884 Children's Day brought $7,000.00 into the treasury of the Evangelical Association; $10,000.00 into that of the Baptist Church; $196,000.00 into the Mission Fund of the Presbyterian Church; $225,000.00 into the treasury of the Methodist Church, and comparatively large amounts into the treasuries of other Churches. Very beneficial effects of the faithful observance of the day have been generally realized.

The churches, and especially the Elderships, continued to take an active interest in the temperance question. Elderships favored State and National prohibition, which was a live issue in Iowa, Pennsylvania, Kansas and West Virginia during several years of this period. The interest was intensified by three facts, to wit: First. The organized opposition of the liquor interests, through which it became increasingly a political question, and was generally encouraged by the two great political parties. The churches of God in the main gave their official endorsement to the Prohibition party. A few of the ministers were candidates for Legislatures on the ticket of this party. Second. The cold-blooded assassination of Rev. George C. Haddock, Sioux City, Iowa, August 3, 1886, by a crowd of brewers, saloon-keepers and roughs, against whom he was collecting evidence in liquor cases then pending. Third. The decision, in 1887, by the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring that prohibition without compensation is valid, in two cases in which the State of Kansas was a party. National prohibition thus became more clearly the question for the churches to agitate, as it was realized that local and State prohibitory legislation and amendments can be only partially successful without National prohibition. Then, even prior to the formation of the Anti-Saloon League, there was as early as 1885 an organized Anti-Saloon movement which enlisted many of the churches, as more speedy results of a local character were expected.

Pentecostal meetings continued to be held to the close of this period, in from one to six different Elderships. This tenacious interest in the person, functions and offices, the inworking and outworking of the Holy Spirit indicated the importance of this spiritual movement. Not to know the presiding and controlling power, and the corresponding need, of the divine Spirit, of all deficiencies in Christian experience is the most lamentable and deplorable. To effect such an experience was ever the purpose of these meetings. Yet the obstacles they encountered increased the tendency to localize and finally abandon them. In East Pennsylvania Eldership two were held, wholly of a local character, in 1885; and none was announced after that date up to 1889. Illinois Eldership appointed two, one in the northern and one in the southern part of the territory, for each of the five years of this period. Indiana Eldership had one in 1885, 1886 and 1889. Iowa Eldership had two in 1885 and one in 1886, all of a local character. Ohio Eldership appointed but one in the five years, in 1886. Michigan, one in 1886. Kansas, one in 1886 and one in 1888. Southern Indiana, one in 1889. Missouri, one in 1888.

Most persistent efforts were made during this period to keep burning the camp-meeting fires. The lack of spiritual results, the growing indifference of the churches, the increasing expenses made it very difficult to hold local camp-meetings. In 1885 one was held in East Pennsylvania, one in Maryland, one in Ohio and two in West Pennsylvania. In 1886 West Pennsylvania again held two, Maryland one, Indiana one, and Maine one. In 1887 and in 1888 one was held each year in Maryland and one in West Pennsylvania. In 1889 seven were held, one each in East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, Maine, Maryland, Indiana, Illinois and Indian Territory. A Camp-meeting Association was formed in West Pennsylvania, to hold an annual camp-meeting not far from Sewickley, on the Methodist Episcopal camp-ground. W. R. Covert, a man of indefatigable energy, but of a volatile and flighty fancy, with S. Arnold, "secured perpetual right in behalf of the churches of God of the West Pennsylvania Eldership to hold an annual camp-meeting." A similar Association was formed in Venango county, West Pennsylvania Eldership, which conducted a camp-meeting in said county in 1887. In 1886, in addition to the camp-meetings already noted, one was held at Anderson, Ind., by the evangelist, Mrs. M. B. Woodworth. It was held on the fair grounds, and continued ten days. It was one of the first camp-meetings under the auspices of the Church of God at which a "gate fee" was charged. The meeting was reported quite a success in the number of converts, as shortly after its close a few over one hundred were baptized; but in some other respects the reputation of the meeting was not good. While less time was given to the cultivation of social and recreative interests which were becoming so prominent, bearing no conceivable relation to the original purpose of camp-meetings, some characterized the meeting as "not any better than a fair;" or, "little religion about this."

Mrs. Woodworth was a revivalist of remarkable power; but after a brief period of constant activity she relapsed into obscurity. She was licensed to preach by the Indiana Eldership in 1884. She was at once appointed Eldership Evangelist, and reappointed in 1885. She was so successful in her work that she soon became noted as an evangelist of more than ordinary power, and was invited to hold revival services in churches of other religious bodies, in halls and in one instance in the court-house. In 1886, in the territory of the Southern Indiana Eldership, of which she became a member, she began her special career as an evangelist. She began her first meeting, with four helpers, in the Royal Skating Rink, at Muncie, Ind., in November, resulting in the organization of a church of 150 members. Thence she went to Indianapolis, Ind., and early in December began her meeting in the Meridan Skating Rink. It continued over the holidays, and resulted in about 175 conversions. Her husband also reported "over twenty healed in soul and body." From the Rink they went to a large Hall, with a seating capacity of 5,000, where on March 19, 1887, a church of 168 members was organized. Trances became now a feature of her meetings, the subjects claiming to be "overpowered by the Holy Spirit." Faith cures in large numbers began to be reported. "The lame were made to walk, the blind to see, the deaf to hear." While she had been at Anderson, Ind., in 1886, her most successful meeting held there was in the latter part of June, 1887. A large church was organized. As elsewhere by this time, "many were the wonderful cures" reported. After a brief stay at Greensburg, Ind., Mrs. Woodworth and her party crossed the State line into Illinois, and held a four weeks' meeting at Urbana, in September, 1887, resulting in one hundred converts. In August, 1887, she held a camp-meeting at Boiling Springs, Ill., concerning which it was reported that "the faith-cure business is overshadowing all other things in the meeting." From here she went to Oakland Park, Decatur, where she remained until October 2nd, closing her meeting with "one hundred conversions." About the middle of November, 1887, she began her work in the W. C. T. U. Tabernacle, Hannibal, Mo. The number of converts was given at 150, and "twenty were healed." A church was later organized with 100 members. In the Winter of 1885-6 she made an attempt to carry on her work in the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, but she was officially notified to desist, and so was recalled by her Eldership. In July, 1888, she held a successful meeting in Springfield, Ill. Thence she went to Louisville, Ky., in August, using "our own tabernacle" in which to hold the services. "Hundreds of souls" were converted, a Hall was rented and a church of God was organized of "over 100 converts." By the close of the year 1889 the results of her four years of revival work were reported as follows: "We have a membership of nearly 1,000 as a result of her work, representing about a dozen churches. Half a dozen church houses have been erected, a dozen or more preachers licensed, quite a number of Sunday-schools carried forward, and prospects for rapid church upbuilding." Mrs. Woodworth encountered strenuous opposition everywhere after she began to defend and advocate faith-healing, visions, trances and other vagaries. She conceded that she was confronted with "opposition on every side;" that in some cities where she held meetings "the ministers in council agreed not to co-operate with her, nor to give any countenance to her work." Even the large majority of the ministers of the churches of God, and most of the Elderships, had no sympathy with her views on faith-healing and modern miracles. Her work was ephemeral. Disintegration of churches she organized followed at early dates, and the proofs abounded that she built with wood, hay and other inflammable materials.

An encouraging effect of Mrs. Woodworth's wonderful revivals was the inspiration to energetic endeavors felt by ministers and churches in the work of evangelism and Church extension. Her work, with all its defects, was of a very serious character, and it suggested the propriety of "days of fasting and solemn prayer for revivals" in many localities. Gratifying results followed.

The material interests of the churches were faithfully attended to during this period. There was a tireless struggle after progress, a cheerful optimism and a power and activity in the pursuit of better things which were rewarded by a good measure of success in competing with other religious bodies. As in the early days, there still survived the belief that the Church had a special mission to carry the torch of "the faith once delivered to the saints" throughout the land and to be the bearer of truths which otherwise would be neglected. To make permanent the fruits of their labors ministers realized that houses of worship owned by the churches, and parsonages, needed to be built, and they urged this strongly on the membership. Responses were generously made, and a comparatively large number of houses of worship was erected and others repaired and improved. The first to be dedicated was the new bethel at Taylortown, Ohio, where the church had been worshipping in the Town Hall. The house cost $900.00, and was built under the labors of S. Kline, pastor, and dedicated December 21, 1884; C. Winbigler officiating. J. W. Riddle was quite successful as missionary among the Cherokee Indians, Indian Territory, and in the Winter of 1884-5 built the bethel at Camp Creek, which was dedicated in the Spring of 1885. Through the labors of J. F. Meixel, pastor of the Upper Perry circuit, Pa., the project of building a bethel at Center Square was started in 1882 or '3, but the work was delayed, and not until 1885 was the new bethel finished, under the pastorate of W. J. Grissinger. It was dedicated June 7th, when S. D. C. Jackson preached the dedicatory sermon. The cost of the building was $715.00. In Riley county, Kans., J. A. Miller and E. L. Latchaw as pastors, a bethel was built at Riley Center in 1885. The church had existed for three years without a church home. The dedication took place August 30th, the services having been in charge of J. R. H. Latchaw. In 1885 J. C. Forncrook was the efficient pastor at Lanark, Ill., and under his labors "Summit Bethel" was erected at a cost of $4,000.00. It was dedicated October 10, 1885, Latchaw preaching on the occasion. Trinity, Wells county, Ind., was pastorless in 1885; but the church heroically went to work and built a bethel, which E. Miller dedicated November 15th. This exhibition of church efficiency and of appreciation of moral responsibility received just commendation. J. M. Cassel, who on September 27, 1885, preached the dedicatory sermon of the Pleasant Grove Bethel, St. Mary's circuit, Ohio, pronounced it "a monument to the zeal and energy of the pastor, T. Koogle." It was a sign of "the prosperity and progress of the church." The presence at the dedication of T. Hickernell and J. A. Dobson was noted as "connecting links binding us to the early history of the Church." At Shambaugh, Ia., under the labors of A. Wilson, pastor, a new bethel was built in the Summer of 1885, at a cost of $2,500.00. It was dedicated by M. S. Newcomer on November 22nd. At Copley, Summit county, Ohio, a bethel was finished and dedicated December 20, 1885. W. P. Small was pastor, and J. M. Cassel officiated at the dedication.

At Cool Spring, or Sprankle's Mills, Jefferson county, Pa., a house of worship was built under the labors of L. B. Appleton, which was dedicated by him on January 24, 1886, in the absence of the minister who had been engaged for the occasion. The new bethel erected at White Oak, Clark county, Ill., was consecrated on May 30, 1886. Wm. Johnson was the devoted pastor. George Sandoe officiated, assisted by J. Bernard. A bethel which had stood for nearly forty years, at Slippery Rock, Beaver county, Pa., gave way to a new edifice erected during the Summer of 1886, under the labors of J. W. Davis. The new house was more commodious. The corner-stone was laid on May 30th, and the dedication took place October 10th. The name was changed to Connoquenessing Chapel. The second bethel at Highspire, Dauphin county, Pa., was dedicated July 25, 1886, when J. T. Fleegal was the pastor. G. W. Seilhammer preached in the morning, and J. W. Miller in the evening. The house cost $2,407.00. In Kennedy's Valley, Perry county, Pa., the corner-stone of a new bethel was laid June 27, 1886, when on account of the failure of the preacher for the occasion to be present, W. J. Grissinger, pastor, officiated. The building was completed and dedicated on March 6, 1887, when G. W. Seilhammer did the preaching. Under the pastorate of W. P. Winbigler, the church at Frizzlesburg, Carroll county, Md., built a house of worship, which was dedicated by G. W. Seilhammer on November 21, 1886. The rededication of the Syracuse Bethel, Ind., under the labors of I. W. Markley, took place on July 11, 1886. The dedicatory sermon was preached by E. Miller. The house had been "repaired, remodeled and refitted, and was commodious, attractive and superior to the former house." On Herr street, Harrisburg, Pa., under the pastoral care of J. W. Jones, the little church of colored folks began to build a bethel in the Summer of 1886. The corner-stone was laid by C. H. Forney and J. M. Carvell August 15th, but they were not able to complete the building. Better success attended the church at Highland, Dauphin county, Pa., which, under the pastoral care of H. E. Reeve, began the erection of a bethel in the Summer of 1886, laying the corner-stone September 19th. C. H. Forney and J. M. Carvell officiated. The building was completed at a cost of $2,300.00, and was dedicated by J. W. Deshong, January 23, 1887. The ordinances were observed in the evening. T. Still had meanwhile become the pastor. The church at Mt. Olivet, York county, Pa., having built a spire and put a bell into it, rededicated the house September 12, 1886. H. E. Reeve and T. Still preached on the occasion, and with the pastor, J. F. Meixel, conducted an ordinance meeting in the evening. A new house of worship was built by the church at Sugar Creek, Wayne county, Ohio, and dedicated September 26, 1886, W. P. Small preaching on the occasion, assisted by G. H. Ritchie. Under the labors of W. J. McNutt, a bethel was built at Sugar Ridge, VanWert county, Ohio, which J. M. Cassel dedicated in October, 1886, assisted by D. Sands. I. W. Markley as pastor succeeded in building several bethels on his field in Indiana. One of these was in Columbia City, Whitley county, at a cost of $3,200.00. It was dedicated by M. S. Newcomer November 14, 1886. The church was the outgrowth of Mrs. Woodworth's labors in 1885. Another was built at Butler, at a cost of $3,800.00. It was dedicated November 21, 1886, M. S. Newcomer officiating. At Round Grove, Ill., with O. B. Huston pastor, a new bethel was built at a cost of $1,300.00. It was dedicated by Geo. Sandoe October 10, 1886. The bethel at Wallacetown, Clearfield county, Pa., after undergoing extensive repairs, was rededicated November 21, 1886. J. W. Deshong did the preaching. Thos. Young was pastor. Such extensive alterations were made to the Lancaster, Pa., bethel in the Summer of 1886, that it "was not recognizable as the old bethel," at a cost of $3,682.00. The consecrated C. Price was pastor. The rededication took place November 14th, G. W. Seilhammer and G. W. Getz officiating.

In 1887 E. L. Latchaw succeeded in gathering a small church in a new settlement of sod-house dwellers, near Utica, or Kansada, Ness county, Kans. They worshiped in a sod school-house, 12x15 feet. They decided to build a frame bethel, 20x30 feet, which was dedicated on May 28th. The sermons on the occasion were preached by W. H. Cross. On May 8, 1887, the bethel at South Fairview, Cumberland county, Pa., was to be dedicated, when G. W. Seilhammer officiated. But the act of consecration was deferred in order to cancel the entire indebtedness. This was done, and on the 22nd J. B. Lockwood preached and dedicated the house. O. J. Farling, a minister actuated by the old missionary spirit, succeeded in organizing a church in Stoney Creek Valley, Dauphin county. They began the erection of a bethel soon after; the corner-stone was laid June 18, 1887, by C. H. Forney, assisted by M. M. Foose and J. Berkstresser. The house was completed and dedicated September 18th, when G. W. Seilhammer, M. M. Foose and I. A. MacDannald officiated. The cost was $940.00. Mission work in Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, Pa., was begun in an old school building, bought by D. S. Fox for $500.00. An additional $500.00 was spent in alterations and improvements, when the new church building was dedicated, July 17, 1887, with G. W. Seilhammer, W. R. Covert and J. S. Marple as the preachers of the three sermons of the day. The bethel at New Kingston, Cumberland county, Pa., built thirty years before, was repaired under the labors of D. W. Keefer, and rededicated July 24, 1887. G. Sigler and A. H. Long did the preaching. At Olive Branch, Miami county, Ind., R. H. Dempsey, pastor, a bethel was built in the Spring of 1887. A. F. Dempsey officiated at the dedication on July 24th. The Fairview Bethel, York county, Pa., was rededicated July 24, 1887. J. C. Seabrooks preached on the occasion. At Tobias, Putnam county, Ohio, a new church edifice was ready for dedication on September 4, 1887, under E. Poling, pastor. J. R. H. Latchaw was present and preached, but the act of dedication was deferred on account of failure to cancel the indebtedness. Under the new pastor, J. W. Aukerman, the money was secured, and in the latter part of October, 1887, R. H. Bolton dedicated the house. It was christened "Pleasant Valley Bethel." The bethel in Mendon, Mercer county, Ohio, built under the labors of J. W. Boyd, at a cost of $1,600.00, was dedicated on September 25, 1887. M. S. Newcomer did the preaching; W. B. Allen and W. P. Small assisted in the services. "The Mission Bethel of the Ohio Eldership," which J. W. Aukerman, General Missionary, succeeded in building in Putnam county, was dedicated by T. Koogler on September 25, 1887. The village of Centennial, in which it was built, was located "in the woods," and services had been held in the school-house and in a blacksmith shop. On the same day the church at Steelton, Dauphin county, Pa., H. E. Reeve pastor, rededicated its house of worship. J. Berkstresser and M. M. Foose preached the sermons. November 6, 1887, the church at Anderson, Madison county, Ind., organized by Mrs. Woodworth, dedicated its new bethel. H. H. Spilher was the successful pastor. President Latchaw officiated. R. H. Bolton and the Woodworths assisted in the services. The rededication of the bethel at Marysville, Perry county, Pa., occurred October 23, 1887. The pastor, H. W. Long, secured the services of M. M. Foose for the occasion. At Camp Hill, Franklin county, Pa., a new bethel was built in the Summer of 1887, J. W. Kipe being the pastor. It was dedicated by Wm. Palmer, November 27th. The bethel at Boiling Spring, Macón county, Ill., which had been occupied for thirty years, was destroyed by fire in October, 1887. Hayes Chapel, Ida county, Ia., was built in 1888. J. W. Riddle, missionary among the Cherokee Indians, Indian Territory, built a bethel at Sallisaw, costing $670.00. It was dedicated May 27, 1888, by C. Manchester. Remodeled so as to "look like an entirely new house," the Landisville Bethel, Lancaster county, Pa., built in 1843, was rededicated under F. L. Nicodemus, pastor, April 29, 1888. The preaching on the occasion was by C. Price and J. B. Lockwood. Under the supervision of S. Smith, a German and English preacher, a bethel was built at Cove Station, Huntingdon county, Pa. It was dedicated May 6, 1888, by F. L. Nicodemus. The bethel at Orrstown, Franklin county, Pa., having been "renovated, thoroughly renewed, embellished and beautified within and without," was rededicated by G. W. Getz June 10, 1888. The ordinances were observed in the evening, the pastor J. T. Fleegal, being in charge of the services. The rededication of the bethel at Reedsville, Wayne county, Ohio, occurred July 22, 1888. S. Kline was the pastor; President Latchaw filled the pulpit. W. G. Steele succeeded in building a bethel at Peter's Run, Ohio county, West Virginia, which was consecrated July 29, 1888. N. M. Anderson did the preaching. On the Hillsdale Mission, at Bright's appointment, Mich., a new bethel was dedicated under the labors of J. F. Slough, pastor, August 26, 1888. J. M. Cassel did the preaching. The dedicatory services of the new bethel built at Woodland, Marshall county, W. Va., were held September 23, 1888. I. D. Cousins was the pastor. The Eldership held its session in the new building, and N. M. Anderson preached the dedicatory sermon. L. F. Chamberlin officiated at the dedication of the bethel at Showman, Iowa, August 26, 1888. At a meeting in the Methodist house of worship at Markleville, Madison county, Ind., a number were converted and desired to be organized into a church of God by the pastor, H. H. Spilher. This they were not permitted to do in the M. E. house. They withdrew and organized in a private house. They resolved to build a bethel, which cost $1,800.00, and was dedicated by President Latchaw August 26, 1888. The corner-stone of the Vander Avenue bethel, York, Pa., was laid by W. Rice on September 2, 1888. The self-denying pastor, O. J. Farling, pushed the work to completion, and the house was dedicated November 25, 1888, by G. W. Sellhammer. Cost, $1,500.00. The town site of Riley, Riley county, Kans., having been changed so as to be on the Rock Island Railroad, the bethel built some years before was removed to the new location. It was dedicated September 23, 1888, by C. S. Bolton, assisted by the pastor, J. M. Klein. At Henrietta, Blair county, Pa., J. M. Waggoner, pastor, a new bethel was built, which was dedicated by G. Sigler on December 16, 1888. The Mt. Carmel Bethel, Northumberland county, Pa., was dedicated by W. Rice on December 23, 1888. The house had become too small under the pastoral labors of F. Y. The church at Ft. Scott, Kans., was organized late in 1888, after a revival meeting conducted by J. C. Forncrook. A lot was bought and work begun on a house of worship. Weidenhammer, took place February 3, 1889. The preaching on the occasion was by Wm. Rice. Under W. J. Komp, a bethel was built, which N. M. Anderson and S. B. Craft consecrated May 19, 1889. Roaring Spring, Blair county, Pa., lost its bethel by fire, February 24, 1889. Under M. M. Foose as pastor, the work of rebuilding began at once, and on December 1, 1889, Geo. Sigler officiated at the dedication of the new bethel. The Blooming Grove Bethel, Ohio, Jos. Neil pastor, was dedicated by Latchaw May 12, 1889. After extensive repairs under F. W. Spiher pastor, a bethel was built, which was dedicated September 23, 1889, by John Vincent. The Pleasant Prairie Bethel, 3 miles from Independence, Ia., built in 1854, was replaced by a new edifice in the Summer of 1889. Failure to raise sufficient money to pay all bills occasioned the postponement of the final act of dedication at an earlier date. The Progress Bethel, Dauphin county, Pa., was rededicated under the labors of C. C. Bartels on December 1, 1889. The pastor, W. J. Grissinger, preached on the occasion of the rededication of the bethel at Mt Joy, Pa., December 8, 1889. The East Steelton Mission, Dauphin county, Pa., under the labors of D. W. Keefer, pastor at Highland, laid the corner-stone of its house of worship December 22, 1889. The building was finished, and was dedicated February 23, 1890. Geo. Sigler preached the sermon. At Breakneck, Fayette county, Pa., the Union Bethel was dedicated on December 1, 1889. W. R. Covert preached in the morning and Dr. Morgan, Baptist, in the evening. A house of worship known as Silver Creek Bethel, in Fulton county, Indiana, on the field served as pastor by J. W. Stringfellow, was dedicated January 5, 1890, by J. Bumpus and I. W. Markley.

While the churches gave these unmistakable indications of material progress, the spiritual work was not neglected. A large percentage of the new houses of worship built during this period was in new localities, where churches had been organized. But Church extension work was diligently carried forward in other localities. In New England but little progress was made. One church was organized in New Brunswick. Several new names were added to the ministerial Roll of the Eldership, and the original mover in the work in Maine, John Dennis, was called to his final reward. H. Mills, the most active worker, was becoming discouraged. The ministry and churches of the Eldership lacked the interest in, and loyalty to, the Church of God of the General Eldership which he realized and manifested. Most of them had been Free Baptists, who were dissatisfied for sundry reasons, and withdrew. The broad platform of the Bible as the creed, and the name "church of God," appealed to them. The influence of this teaching spread into Massachusetts, and the churches of Pittsfield constituted themselves into "the church of God of Pittsfield." The New York "Independent" declared that "the people of Pittsfield have got hold of a most important idea." There were numerous revivals in Maine and New Brunswick, and the local churches were in a fairly prosperous condition.

In East Pennsylvania Eldership the principal church extension work was at Altoona, where a mission was established in December, 1886, to be in co-operation with the first church. The Henrietta church was added to the Morrison Cove circuit. At Shamokin, Northumberland county, work was begun in 1883, and a church was organized which was making fair progress during this period under the labors of S. Smith and C. Kahler, successive pastors. In Clearfield county the field was enlarging, and new points were being added to the two circuits. The Lower York Mission, near York, Pa., added several new points under the labors of O. J. Farling. But the principal work in the Eldership consisted in the strengthening of the churches through revivals and improving their material conditions.

West Virginia was fruitful territory. The older organizations were aggressive, and were measurably strengthened. The work in Ohio and Brooke counties was carried forward with energy and good success. Raleigh and Kanawha counties, in the south-western part of the State, were being occupied and churches organized. A small church organization existed in the city of Wheeling. The whole territory of the Eldership in West Virginia appeared to be ripe for an abundant harvest.

The most promising fields for Church extension work were in Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and the Indian Territory. In Nebraska the work was carried forward in the counties of Howard and Greeley, by Eli Stark, who located in Howard county in 1885, and in the Fall of said year organized a church of thirty-one members. Another church was organized by him in Greeley county, in October, 1885. George W. Misener preached in Serman and Custer counties, and organized several churches. In Kansas, E. L. Latchaw removed to Ness county and began work, with a good measure of success. Stafford county was also the scene of active mission work by J. N. Smith and C. S. Bolton, as was also Pratt county immediately to the south. Thus the area of cultivated ground in Kansas was considerably enlarged, and the work pushed into the south-western part of the State. Ft. Scott, in Bourbon county, on the Missouri boundary line, became a center of interest in 1887. J. W. Keplinger had been preaching in the town, and had the assistance of D. Blakely and G. J. Bartlebaugh. The securing of a lot on which to build a Bethel was undertaken in the Fall of 1887, and brought to a successful issue in 1889, the church having been organized under the preaching of C. Manchester and J. C. Forncrook in December, 1888. In 1889 there were twenty-six Church of God organization in the State, scattered through fifteen counties, with an aggregate membership of 610 and five houses of worship.

The work in the Indian Territory during these five years was in the care of J. W. Riddle, E. M. Kirkpatrick, C. H. Ballinger and J. C. Caswell. They labored mainly among the Indians of the Cherokee Nation; but in 1889 Caswell preached in the territory of the Creek Nation. The work was also strengthened by the removal into the Territory of some Church of God families from Texas. By November, 1885, four churches had been organized. In September, 1886, Riddle reported that "three hundred and fifty souls belong to the Church of God in the Cherokee Nation." Kirkpatrick became pastor of three of the churches in the Cherokee Nation. He organized an additional church of thirteen members. In August, 1887, Ballinger succeeded in organizing a church of twenty-six members, and Caswell one of fourteen members. Caswell, in 1889 began work in the Creek Nation. By this time the membership in the Territory had increased to 637, organized into thirteen churches.

There were inviting fields for mission work in half a dozen States where the Church had not yet begun operations. The most inviting of these were on the Pacific Coast. In 1886 J. Garrigus, Oregon, published earnest calls for a missionary. Others who had removed to that State also made appeals for a minister to be sent them. In July, 1886, J. T. Force began work there, and soon had a small band ready to organize a church. In July, 1887, he declared "the field is ripe in Oregon. Send us one, two, or three preachers." In 1888 the Nebraska

Eldership asked the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to appoint J. W. Adams, one of their ministers, missionary to Oregon. In April, 1889, Garrigus appealed again to the Board for a missionary, urging that "now or never" was the time to begin work in that State. In June, 1889, the Board of Missions of the General Eldership considered the appointment of I. S. Richmond, of Illinois; but did not feel justified to make an appropriation.

In the Winter of 1885-6 D. Keplinger, Kansas, removed to Los Angeles county, California, and at once planned to begin missionary work. He opened an appointment in Antelope Valley, to which he soon added several others.

The first call for a minister to come to Colorado was published by Grant L. Woods in 1889. He had removed from Shambaugh, Ia., to Kit Carson county, Colo., and desired the Church to open a mission in said county.

Dakota seemed a promising field for mission work, as Church families from Iowa were moving into the Territory. Among these was A. C. Bixler, who in 1885 started a Sunday-school in his neighborhood. Religious interest was awakened, and he began to hold "prayer-meetings from shanty to shanty." Twenty-five were converted at these meetings, when he sent for C. C. Marston, who preached on baptism and Church doctrines, and baptized nineteen of the converts. H. L. Soule and D. S. Guinter, in the Winter of 1885-6, conducted revival services in a school-house in Lincoln county, now South Dakota, resulting in the organization of a church.

P. Clippinger removed from Kansas to Florida in the Winter of 1886, and began preaching. His field extended along the S. F. R. R. from Sanford to Tampa. He organized two Sunday-schools in 1887; baptized ten believers, and organized a church of eighteen members.

While the era of controversies was apparently passing, and a spirit of greater tolerance was developing in ministers and churches, there yet was a good deal of discussion during this period. Public debates, however, were more infrequent. Only five are reported during this period. The first was conducted in Wetzel county, W. Va., between S. B. Craft, of the Church of God, and Rev. Speers, of the M. E. Church, South. It was held in June, 1885. The subject was Christian Baptism, Craft affirming that "immersion is the Bible act of baptism," and Speers denying. The result was claimed as "a perfect victory for the Church of God and immersion." In April, 1886, A. Wilson had a debate in Page county, Iowa, with Rev. A. L. Cooper, on the following Proposition: "The Church with which I, A. Wilson, stand identified, known by my brethren as the Church of God, possesses all the Bible characteristics which entitle it to be regarded as the visible church or kingdom of God." A. L. Cooper denied. H. Murray, who was Wilson's moderator, reported, that "the decision of the Chairman, who was not a member of either Church, was, with myself, that Elder A. Wilson sustained his affirmative of the entire Proposition well, and did honor to himself and the Church he represents." A "discussion with an Adventist" transpired between W. B. Elliott, Church of God, and W. H. Cain, "advocate of Adventism," at Cookport, Indiana county, Pa., June 14, 1886. The resolution debated read: "Resolved, That the doctrine of the innate immortality of the soul, as understood by the denominations, is untrue, and that conscious, active life in the soul begins at the resurrection of the body, and not at physical death." This Cain affirmed, and Elliott denied. The reporter states that "by previous arrangement, the question was to be submitted to the audience for decision at the close of the debate." But Cain "objected vehemently," and so no vote was taken; but "from the demonstration of the audience it was evident that Elliott had won the victory." At Creagers-town, Md., May 17, 1887, W. Palmer, of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, debated the following Proposition with V. Thompson: "1. Do the Scriptures teach that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment is the Christian Sabbath, having its origin in Eden? Thompson affirmed; Palmer denied. 2. Do the Scriptures teach that the first day of the week is obligatory upon us as the Christian Sabbath? Palmer affirmed; Thompson denied. 3. Do the Scriptures teach the eternal, conscious punishment of the wicked? Palmer affirmed; Thompson denied." Palmer proved himself an effective debater, handling his part of the debate with incisive deliberateness and convincing reasoning. Beginning on September 6, 1887, N. M. Anderson, West Virginia Eldership, had a public debate with R. H. Singer, of the Disciple, or Christian, Church. Six Propositions were debated, to wit: "1. That in connection with faith, repentance and confession, water baptism is a command of the gospel in order to the remission of sins of an alien sinner. Singer, affirmative; Anderson, negative. 2. That hearing, repenting, praying and believing are necessary to the remission of sins, which takes place prior to water baptism. Anderson, affirmative; Singer, negative. 3. That the washing of the saints' feet is an ordinance of the New Testament, instituted by Christ the same night he instituted the Communion, and is binding on all God's people till Jesus comes to judge the world. Anderson, affirmative; Singer, negative. 4. That the Communion of bread and wine was instituted the night of Christ's betrayal, to be observed by the disciples every Lord's day, or every first day of the week. Singer, affirmative; Anderson, negative. 5. That the Church to which I, R. H. Singer, belong is the church of Christ, built by Christ and the Apostles, and is identical in teaching and practice with the Apostles. 6. That the Church of God, which I, N. M. Anderson, represent, is in faith and practice in harmony with the original." "Observer" stated that "an overwhelming majority of people who attended the debate (outside of the Disciples) claim that Anderson gained every Proposition." In Arkansas, at Mt. Olive, in December, 1889, J. M. Howard, of the Church of God, and W. P. Spain, of the Disciple Church, held a public debate on the design of Christian baptism. Spain affirmed that "water baptism to a penitent sinner is for the remission of sins." Howard denied. The debate continued two days, and "in the evening of the second day Spain begged Howard to let him off, and not say anything, he giving up the debate."

Discussions between ministers of the Church, or of mooted questions, in the columns of The Advocate during this period, though less frequent and numerous, still numbered nearly half a hundred. They decreased from thirteen in 1885, to five in 1889. Some were called out by the public debates. Others were for the correction of errors into which inexperienced ministers fell. While still others were on doctrinal questions on which Churches differed on the received views of the Church of God. The latter was notably true of the Sabbath question, agitated by the Seventh-Day Adventists which came in contact with ministers of the Church of God. Also the design of baptism, ever kept prominent by the ministers of the Christian Church. Thus the "Sabbath Question," whether the first or the seventh day should be observed by Christians, was discussed by L. B. Appleton, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership; W. D. Faulkender, a layman of Blair county, Pa., and S. P. Rogers, of Arkansas, in the Winter of 1885-6. They resumed the discussion in the Fall of 1886, joined by N. O. Cofman, a layman of Mendon, O., and J. G. Cunningham, a layman of Fulton county, Pa., and continued it into April, 1887. In April, 1888, John Wilder, Ottawa Lake, Mich., wrote on the subject, defending the first-day Sabbath. He was followed by an anonymous writer by whom the discussion was prolonged into June. The length of these discussions, the poverty of ideas hidden in the multitudes of words, and the long periods over which they were continued seriously detracted from their value, and gave occasion to much complaint. The two conspicuous theories of the Millennium were discussed in 1885, and again in 1886, when Winebrenner's views on the subject were called in question as being no longer the views of the Church. Winebrenner taught the essential points of the pre-millenarian theory; but "there has been quite a change on this subject since his time, and it is a doubtful question to-day whether pre-millenarian or post-millenarian theories have the majority of adherents in the Church of God." The subject of faith cures, divine healing and miracles was given great prominence as a result of the teachings of Mrs. Woodworth and many of her converts. They claimed that all kinds of diseases can be cured by faith, or by the direct intervention of divine power. This view was antagonized by a large majority of the ministers. Such alleged cures were represented as miraculous; but it was insisted that "the day of miracles is past." The discussion continued at intervals during this period. At no time was the doctrine of Sanctification so thoroughly discussed by ministers of the Church as in 1885-7. Mainly it was a defense of the old doctrine on the subject, which was a pillar of the undoubting faith of earlier and simpler days, as against the newer theory of an instantaneous second work of grace. The schismatic tendency of the second-work theory created trouble in certain churches, and the discussion was designed to eradicate this heretical theory and preserve the peace and unity of the churches. This was the trend of a series of articles by W. R. Covert in 1885. He was followed by D. Blakely, who insisted on "the doctrine of the simplicity of moral action," and concluded that "conversion is entire consecration," and that "sanctification" is but another term for consecration. Edification and growth in grace follow, and continue through life. L. B. Appleton discussed the subject from the viewpoint of mental philosophy. Thus the discussion ran its course during the Winter of 1885-6. It was resumed in March, 1887, when some of the advocates of the second-work discussed it experientially. This called out forceful replies from A. Wilson, D. S. Guintier and L. B. Appleton. R. H. Bolton voiced the sentiments of many who objected to the discussion partly on the ground that "much of the writings are unintelligible and with no good effect." He also assured the Editor of The Advocate that he, with many readers of the paper, "desire you to write articles upon this theological question." In compliance with this request, the Editor began a series of ten editorials, running from August 24th to October 26th, in which the underlying thought was the duality of man's being—the "person" and the "nature." The conclusion reached was that the sanctification of the "person" takes place necessarily at regeneration; that of the "nature is progressive," and may not be perfected until mortality is swallowed up of life. S. N. Sorenson, Beloit, Ia., took exception to this conclusion in two long articles, in which he sought to defend the second-work theory. W. W. Roberts, while endorsing the Editor's views, yet had some adverse strictures to offer. Owing to certain erroneous views on the phrase "born of water," preached in Arkansas by members of the Texas and Arkansas Eldership, the proper interpretation of the text was discussed by the Editor and others in the Spring of 1887.

Quite a controversy was revived touching the private observance of the ordinances, introduced in February, 1888, by F. W. McGuire, and participated in by W. H. Oliver, Mrs. M. Woods, S. P. Campbell and E. M. Kirkpatrick. The minority, represented by McGuire and Mrs. Woods, advocated private observance. The discussion continued for nearly a year, and was made the subject of action by some of the Elderships, all of which insisted "that the ordinances should be observed publicly."

The Itinerancy, Amusements, the Perseverance of the Saints, Church Union, Deaconesses, Church Fairs, the Doctrine of the Holy Spirit, Tithing, Christ's Resurrection Body, the Moral Character of Adam and Eve, were among the other more important subjects more or less elaborately discussed.

An important step was taken in the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1887 in the organization of the "Mutual Beneficial Society." The object of the Society was to secure "mutual benefit in case of death" to the members. There is a small annual payment required, and at the death of a member each member of the Society is required to pay $1.00 into the treasury, the total to be paid to the widow or family of the deceased.

An equally beneficent, but more general, project for the aged minister of the Church was suggested in July, 1889. Many had felt the need of some provision of this character, but how to secure it without an extra tax on the membership was the unsolved problem. At the meeting of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, held at Findlay, Ohio, in 1889, Warren Mosher, of near Piercetown, Indiana, submitted a proposition which seemed to meet the case. He proposed "to build a home for indigent ministers." The proposition was approved by the Board, which appointed "I. W. Markley and I. Schrader a committee to confer with Mosher with regard to said institution." Unfortunately the project was not consummated, though the need of such a home has never ceased to be felt.

The churches of God have only to a very limited extent been interested in such Orders as "The Brotherhood of St. Andrew;" yet in the "Order of the King's Daughters," or "Daughters of the King," appealed sufficiently to some of the sisters of a few churches to induce them to form societies of the latter Order. The Order was founded in January, 1886, and has for its main object the development of spiritual life and the stimulation of Christian activity.

The ministers which held pre-millenarian views were quite interested in the "Prophetic Conference" held at Chicago in November, 1886. Fewer, however, attended the Conference than were present at the one held in New York in 1878. The Church has always placed more stress on other and more vital doctrines, though it has ever strongly held, in some form, to the second advent of its adorable Founder and Head.

Because of the proximity of the United Brethren Church to the Church of God in many of the Annual Elderships and the generally friendly relations and similarity in doctrine and ordinances in earlier years, the brotherhood was much interested in the schism which occurred in said Church in 1889. Its twentieth General Conference held its session at York, Pa., in that year. Four "recommendations" had been submitted by the previous General Conference to a vote of the churches. The first related to a revised Confession of Faith; the second, to the amended Constitution; the third to lay representation, and the fourth to the section of the Constitution on Secret Societies. All were adopted by majorities ranging from 39,696 for the fourth item, to 47,760 for the first item. Immediately upon the reading of "the Proclamation of the Bishops," the final "step to be taken to complete all that was requisite to put the amended forms of the Confession and Constitution in full effect," Bishop Wright, with fourteen others, delegates from different annual Conferences, withdrew from the General Conference and organized the Radical United Brethren Church. The Church of God has happily been spared such an experience, owing possibly to the absence of a human Creed or Confession of Faith and greater elasticity in its polity.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE semi-decade of 1890-1895 was marked by certain great religious events in which the churches of God were deeply interested, though not formally connected therewith. The most pregnant one was "The World's First Parliament of Religions," held at the World's Fair in Chicago in September, 1893. It embraced, not the Christian denominations of the world, but representatives of the religions of the world. It was a congress which awakened universal interest, and the topics discussed by theological scholars and eminent laymen were of a character which appealed to very many of the ministers of the churches of God which had kept in touch with the progressive thought of the day. They raised the question: "Is it a milestone in the path of Christianity?" Or: "Is it an indication that the reputed followers of the Anointed One are seeking a religion to suit all mankind, and in which should be amalgamated the faiths of the religious world?" Or: "Is it a sign of the decadence of what has been for centuries believed to be the only true religion?" Almost in fear and awe the churches of God viewed the marvelous phenomenon of Protestant Christianity in its strongest and most pronounced type inviting Roman Catholics and Orthodox Greeks, Pagan and Mohammedan, the worshipers of Buddha and of Confucius, the followers of Zoroaster and the descendants of Abraham, and representatives of all faiths and of no faith, to meet together and discuss the deep problems of their respective religions, or want of religion, in a friendly and even a fraternal way. Besides, topics were discussed which on various occasions had been debated by ministers of the churches of God, such as The Religious Reunion of Christendom, God and Modern Science, Man's Spirituality and Immortality, Religion as Distinguished from a Moral Life, Religion and Music, Religion and Temperance, Arbitration Instead of War. The Advocate by its presentations of the events of the Parliament kept the churches informed and interested. Quite a number of the ministers were present during part of the seventeen days the Parliament continued in session.

The movement toward the federation of Protestant Churches, which assumed prominence in 1890, naturally excited the attention of ministers of the churches of God. It did not appeal to them as a plan or method of abolishing sectarianism, against which they always contended; but as an evidence that the Christian Church was becoming more deeply conscious of the great evils of the divisions into which the body of Christ had been rent. But with the idea of effecting a union of all denominations into one great, universal organization they could have but little sympathy, as it is not in harmony with the scriptural polity of the church. Neither the union, nor the federation, of Churches or denominations, they held, is Christian oneness. Besides, the platform on which they stood precluded any active participation in such a movement.

Nevertheless, the further division of Churches into rival or antagonistic organizations the churches of God deplored. They had always been on friendly terms with local churches of the Evangelical Association, and so when that body was "split in two" in October, 1891, as a result of "the rebellion of twenty-five years' growth," they viewed the result with unconcealed concern. The Association had thus been sundered into two distinct and violently antagonistic parties.

And while they regarded the division as in the main the legitimate fruit of sectarianism; yet they could not remain oblivious to the existence of like dangers among themselves, as disclosed in the secession movements in Kansas and Missouri, and earlier in Michigan, as also in such conflicts of authority as existed in 1891 between the Eldershops in Illinois and Indiana. Not doctrines, nor polity, but personal contentions and unholy ambitions, could prove the puissant cause of schism in a body. It suggested the thought, strongly emphasized editorially, that for Christian men there should be found a remedy for such evils in a well-developed scheme of arbitration.

While as a body the Church did not interest itself in the anniversary of the "Haystack Movement," which contemplated the carrying of the gospel to the heathen of all lands; nor yet in the Volunteer Movement among college students, with the motto:—"The evangelization of the world in this generation"—which held its second quadrennial convention in Detroit, Mich., in 1894, with 1,325 delegates; yet individual workers and some local churches joined with other churches in meetings with appropriate services. The principal benefit the churches of God derived therefrom was the resultant inspiration and enthusiasm in their own missionary work. They realized the ever-present danger, that the banner which the Church had lifted up in the name of the Lord would be lowered by too active fellowship with denominations prominent in these movements.

In 1890 the Presbyterian Church began the revision of its Creed, or Confession of Faith, nearly two-thirds of the 213 Presbyteries having voted in favor of revision. A committee was appointed for that purpose, which did its work during the year, and reported to the General Assembly in 1891. The work to be done was to harmonize the Confession with the altered views and the spirit of the Church as they were then apprehended to be; but "no alterations or amendments are to be proposed which would in any way impair the integrity of the Reformed or Calvinistic system of doctrine taught in the Confession." The antagonism to all creeds by the Church of God gave it a negative interest in this work. It was pointed out that these creeds are not generally believed by the Churches which adopt them; but are accepted largely because of their historical value. They set up a standard of orthodoxy outside of the Scriptures, and become occasions of dissensions and schisms. Hence, the Church in all its past history bore testimony against them. It rarely experienced any trouble by reasons of heresies taught by its ministers. Only one such instance occurred during this period, when the Standing Committee of the Kansas Eldership suspended a minister "accused of preaching doctrines contrary to the Scriptures." The membership of the Church, however, could not be insensible to the allegation that it has some standard of orthodoxy, as well as that a general similarity had developed between it and the surrounding denominations. Hence, the question began to be propounded: "Is there no difference between the Church of God and others, such as the Methodist, or United Brethren, or Reformed Churches?" As Winebrenner much earlier had clearly indicated what these differences are, so again was the duty an urgent one to teach the churches the essential characteristics of the Church of God, and to differentiate it from the denominations. The subject in different forms was discussed at Ministerial Associations. On the question of the union of the Church of God and any denomination, discussed in The Advocate in 1893, and prior at the East Pennsylvania Eldership, the general conclusion reached was, that "we are not in a position to second any effort looking toward union with any denomination." Yet this position so consistently held for sixty years did not develop a spirit of bigotry or exclusiveness. That there is one common brotherhood of believers was cordially accepted, and hence churches of God in many places joined in good faith in holding union evangelistic meetings.

In its specific work among the young people the Church of God manifested this same catholic spirit. While the Methodist Church in the United States organized the Epworth League in 1890, instead of affiliating with the general Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, and the Baptist Church organized its own Young People's Union in 1891, the churches of God regarded this as "a step backward from Christian unity." Local societies were formed during this period in the East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa and Kansas Eldershops, nearly all in co-operation with the interdenominational Y. P. S. C. E. In East Pennsylvania a "Union" was formed of a number of societies, at a meeting held September 15, 1892, in the Nagle Street Bethel, Harrisburg, of which the officers were J. W. Mackey, President; O. P. Parthemore, Secretary, and S. Seymore, Treasurer. Two societies had been organized in the Ohio Eldership in 1892. In Illinois the first society was organized at Decatur, in 1887. A Y. P. S. C. E. Union was organized in 1900. In Kansas societies existed in a few churches in the Winter of 1891-2, one having been organized at Naron, Pratt county, in January, 1892. There was considerable opposition to these organizations of young people in the churches; but the enthusiasm of a few earnest ministers and laymen soon made them popular.

Among the special services inaugurated in earlier years which had about run their course by this time were the Pentecostal meetings. Except in Illinois, where the Eldership continued to control them, they had become entirely local in 1890. In this year one was held in Illinois, one in West Virginia, one in East Pennsylvania and one in Maryland. In 1891 and in 1892 two were held; but in 1893 and 1894 none was published. The passing of this special form of service at about the same date with the beginning of what is called "The Pentecostal Movement" is evidential of the fact that it lacked the elements which made the latter quite celebrated for a brief period. Both were wanting in the factors which tend to permanent stability. It was different with the Sunday-school Conventions, and also the Ministerial Associations. These continued through this period in most of the annual Elderships. In Elderships from West Pennsylvania westward the latter were being held in connection with, and immediately preceding, the sessions of the Elderships. Topics for discussion were doctrinal and practical, and in some Elderships exegetical. A peculiarity of some which were held in West Virginia was the adoption of resolutions after topics were discussed, expressing "the sense of this body that there is taught in this topic" such and such a doctrine or sentiment. In nearly all the Elderships these Associations discussed questions which at the time were in controversy in The Advocate. Among these could be found "The Laying on of Hands in Ordination," "Worldly Amusements," "Gospel Temperance," "Prohibition and Local Option," "The Design of Baptism," "Support of the Ministry," "The Ordination of Women to the Gospel Ministry," "Educated Ministers," "Reasons for the Existence of the Church of God," "Social Parties Among the Young People," "Is the Y. P. S. C. E. Beneficial to the Church?" "Ministers in Politics," "A Doctrinal Test for Membership in the Church," "The Itinerant System," "Tithing," and scores more. In East Pennsylvania Eldership interest declined to such an extent that the Association was discontinued, none having been held in 1894.

Camp-meetings in western Elderships ceased to be held after 1890, with rare exceptions. But in Maine they survived, one having been held at Maple Grove, with fifteen ministers present, in August, 1894, which continued ten days. The camp-meeting held by the church at Washington Borough in 1893 and 1894 became a general camp-meeting under a regularly organized Association. The ministers and churches in East Pennsylvania held quite tenaciously to these meetings in God's first temples, four having been held in the territory in 1892 and in 1893. In 1894, however, there were but two, Washington Borough's Central Manor camp, Lancaster county, and Walnut Grove, Huntingdon county.

The ministry and churches assiduously devoted their energies to the advancement of their spiritual and material interests in the employment of the regular methods and agencies of church work. In Maine conditions were peculiar, and there were indications of an impending crisis. They needed a few strong men from older Elderships, and made repeated and urgent calls. They had strength both as to numbers and talents; but lacked cohesion and unity of purpose, as well as loyalty to the General Eldership. In 1890 the churches in Maine were credited with "twenty ministers and 1,900 church members;" yet H. Mills, one of the most active workers, reported "the outlook in Maine not as hopeful as it was some time ago." The work had been extended southward into Massachusetts, where Dr. J. I. Brown labored. A church was organized in Pittsfield, and one in Lowell. The Lowell church was a missionary church, for "under its direction," J. H. Wilson, in 1890, "commenced mission work in Providence, R. I. He preached at Johnson; Lester Hall, Providence; Central Falls, Haverhill and Bethany, and reported prospects "good for establishing a church of God at Providence." In December, 1890, the Maine Eldership "appointed J. I. Brown missionary to the State of Massachusetts." A "quarterly meeting" was held in the State, in the latter part of December, 1890, at which four ministers were present. In April, 1891, "Dr. J. I. Brown was appointed President of the Eldership in Massachusetts, with power to grant licenses under the protection of the Eldership of Maine." In 1891 the Board of Missions of the General Eldership authorized G. Sigler, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, to visit the churches in Maine and Massachusetts, in answer to the earnest call of Mills and Brown. Brown was heartily in accord with the polity of the Church, and urged the election of a delegate to the General Eldership in 1893. In the Summer of 1893, R. H. Bolton, of Ohio, removed to Maine, followed by his son, John W. They became the general missionaries. But as the former had been subject to discipline by the Ohio Eldership, his reception into the Maine Eldership was a violation of the General Eldership Constitution. The Ohio Standing Committee, April 10, 1894, called the attention of the Maine Eldership to this "irregular and non-co-operative action," and insisted that it be reconsidered. Bolton appealed to the next General Eldership. He had to be debarred from the columns of The Advocate, and began the publication of a paper for the Maine Eldership. These complications apparently hastened the impending disintegration of the Maine Eldership.

In East Pennsylvania there was evident a spirit of improvement and progress in material things. Churches were strengthened in numbers, and inspired with broader and higher aims, and this led to material improvements and efforts at enlargement. And while the territory was not appreciably extended, new points were added to the fields of labor. Work was begun, however, in Lycoming county, at Williamsport, where some colored families had located. The Eldership appointed John Brown to open a mission. He rented the A. M. E. Zion church building, and on December 29, 1889, organized a church. At Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, under the labors of C. I. Behney, the bethel was remodeled and repaired, and was rededicated March 9, 1890. At Mt. Laurel, on the old Dauphin circuit, the building of a bethel was begun and the corner-stone laid on April 13, 1890. The dedication took place August 24, 1890. C. Y. Weidenhammer, under whose labors the church was constituted, preached the first sermon, on Saturday evening. C. C. Bartels was the pastor in 1890, and he secured the services of C. H. Forney for Sabbath morning and evening. Prior to this the membership at this point belonged to the Linglestown church, but had regular prayer-meetings and stated preaching at Forney's school-house. At Donaldson, Schuylkill county, the bethel was extensively remodeled and repaired in the Fall of 1890. On November 16th it was reopened for divine service, F. L. Nicodemus preaching the sermons, assisted in the services by the pastor, S. E. Herman.

Under the labors of J. T. Fleegal on the Lower Perry circuit a new bethel was built, which was dedicated April 6, 1890. The church on the Allegheny Mountains, Clearfield county, town of Brisbin, began to solicit funds to build a meeting-house in 1887; but it was not until 1893 that they were able to carry the work to completion. Then, during the pastorate of C. Kahler, the bethel was finished, and was dedicated by M. M. Foose on July 30th. The bethel at Newberry, York county, with O. E. Houston as pastor, was extensively repaired, and rededicated July 6, 1890, Wm. Rice officiating on the occasion. The church at Steelton built an addition to their bethel and repaired the main building at a cost of $850.00, F. Y. Weidenhammer being the pastor. C. D. Rishel preached the rededictory sermon on July 20, 1890. The large Skating Rink at Hollidaysburg, Blair county, which the church had bought and converted into an audience room and parsonage, was rededicated August 3, 1890, by J. W. Deeshong and J. H. Esterline. Suedberg, Schuylkill county, was a new point on the Lebanon circuit. A good church-house was built there in the Summer of 1890, and was dedicated on September 29th, J. W. Winters being the pastor. After the bethel at Oak Grove, Perry county, was "neatly repaired and beautified," it was rededicated January 18, 1891. D. W. Keefer officiated. Wm. Palmer was the faithful pastor. At Bowmansdale, Cumberland county, the pastor, C. D. Rishel, preached in a warehouse, where on December 7, 1890, he organized a church of thirteen members. They at once bought a lot in the new village, and in the Spring of 1891 began to build a bethel. The corner-stone was laid on May 2nd. The building was completed at a cost of $2,235.00, including ground, and was dedicated August 30, 1891. G. Sigler preached in the morning and C. I. Brown in the evening. In the Summer of 1891 the church at Cherry Grove, Fulton county, began the work of building a bethel to take the place of the school-house formerly used as the place of worship. The house was, however, not finished until in March, 1893, when on the 5th it was dedicated by E. Myers, assisted by C. F. Reitzel. At Brownsville, on the present Walnut Grove circuit, S. Smith pastor, a layman, Levi Anderson, undertook to build a bethel in 1891. He traveled extensively to collect funds, and succeeded in finishing the building ready for dedication on April 24, 1892. G. Sigler preached the dedicatory sermon. All-workers church, Green street, Harrisburg, had the unusual experience of having two rededications of its house of worship in a little more than two years, both under the same pastor, J. W. Deshong. After extensive repairs the first rededication services were held July 5, 1891, when D. S. Shoop officiated, assisted by C. H. Forney. In 1893 new pews were put in the main audience room, and rededicatory services were conducted by B. F. Beck, on September 3rd. The bethel of the church at Columbia, Lancaster county, was repaired in the Spring of 1892, S. C. Stonesifer being pastor. It was reopened on May 15th.

The bethel at Smoketown, York county, built in 1848, was repaired under the labors of H. E. Reeve, and was reopened September 14, 1892. Preaching by O. E. Houston and W. J. Grissinger. Aggressive mission work was begun at Eighteenth and Walnut streets, Harrisburg, by F. L. Nicodemus, in February, 1892. A very successful revival was held in Springdale school-house. The work was of such an extent that in June, 1892, a site was selected on the corner of North and Linn streets, which was bought by H. J. Forney and Mrs. Margaret Calder and donated to the church. Here the Pleasant View Bethel was erected, the entire cost of ground and building amounting to $3,000.00. The dedication took place August 6, 1893, when C. Price officiated, assisted by C. H. Forney, J. W. Deshong and J. Haisleigh. June 12, 1892, the Good Hope Bethel, Cumberland county, built in 1843, after needed repairs, was rededicated by B. F. Beck. Under the labors of their young pastor, C. F. Reitzel, the church at Beavertown, Huntingdon county, repaired their house of worship, which was rededicated June 19, 1892, by Wm. Rice. Walnut Grove Bethel, same county, with S. Smith as pastor, was remodeled and repaired in the Spring of 1892. It was reopened July 24th, when J. T. Fleegal did the preaching. Fleegal was pastor of the Lower Perry circuit in 1892, which included the town of Duncannon. After repairing the bethel, dedicatory services were conducted August 28th, with G. W. Getz as the preacher. At Hepler's, Schuylkill county, where a church was organized in 1847, services were held in private houses until 1854, when a bethel was built. This was replaced by a new building begun in 1892, under the labors of J. F. Meixel and his successor, S. Smith, at a cost of $2,000.00. It was dedicated October 28, 1894, when D. S. Shoop preached the sermons. A mission was started in Altoona in 1892, called the Union Avenue Mission, by certain active laymen of the first church. They succeeded in building a bethel, which on June 4, 1893, was solemnly consecrated to divine worship. Preaching by Wm. Rice and M. M. Foose. With Wm. Palmer as pastor, the church at Landisburg, Perry county, greatly improved their house of worship, which was rededicated by George Sigler on June 11, 1893. After completely remodeling the bethel at Andersontown, York county, at a cost of $450.00, under their energetic pastor, O. E. Houston, the church held reopening services on August 6, 1893, the pulpit being filled by C. I. Brown. Brown was pastor at Camp Hill and Milltown, and had the bethel at the latter point remodeled and repaired in the Summer of 1893. The rededication took place October 22nd, D. S. Shoop preaching in the morning and O. E. Houston in the evening. The colored brethren at Newville began the work of building a church-house for their use in 1893, laying the corner-stone on October 22nd, when J. T. Fleegal and F. W. McGuire officiated. The building was finished in the Summer of 1894, at a cost of $900.00, and was dedicated August 19th. Besides the pastor, J. W. Jones, these brethren were present and did the preaching: J. T. Fleegal, F. W. McGuire, J. W. Deshong and C. Price. A new bethel was built at Smithville, Lancaster county, under the labors of A. P. Stover, in the Summer of 1893, at a cost of $1,419.00. B. F. Beck preached the dedicatory sermon on November 12th, assisted by F. W. McGuire, ex-pastor. For the third time church work was begun in Carlisle, county seat of Cumberland county, in 1893, by the wide-awake pastor, C. D. Rishel. He rented Sipe's Hall, where he preached his first sermon on January 21, 1894. After an address on church organization by C. H. Forney, on January 25th, an organization of a church of thirty-six members was effected. On account of the division in the Evangelical Association, their local church at Carlisle lost its house of worship. It was bought by the church of God, and possession taken in December, 1894. The house of worship at New Grenada, Fulton county, after being repaired at a cost of $514.00, W. S. Smith, pastor, was rededicated by M. M. Foose on December 16, 1894. In proportion to its territory and numerical strength, the Maryland and Virginia Eldership failed to do as much progressive work during this period as had been done in East Pennsylvania, or even in earlier periods in its own history. The bethel at Carrollton, Carroll county, the theater of the first active operations of the Church of God in Maryland, was repaired and modernized early in 1892. It was rededicated by G. W. Seilhammer on May 15th. J. A. Staub was the esteemed pastor. At Mt. Briar, Washington county, G. W. Seilhammer, on June 19, 1892, officiated at the rededication of the renovated and repaired bethel. S. J. Montgomery was the pastor. The Washington county circuit extended across the State line into Franklin county, Pa., and the Frederick county field extended into Adams county, Pa., both by mutual understanding between the two Elderships, though the State line was the boundary. Mt. Hope, Adams county, Pa., was one of the Frederick county appointments. Here a bethel was built under the earnest missionary labors of S. Spurrier, which was dedicated by O. J. Farling October 16, 1892. Montgomery's circuit in 1892 included a point called "Manor," where on the 4th of December the bethel was dedicated by J. W. Kipe and W. H. Engler. Hagerstown, county-town of Washington county, lies almost in the center of Church of God territory. The Eldership was favorably disposed toward missionary work in the place, and steps to that end were taken in 1893. The Standing Committee on December 7, 1893, "suggested that the brethren at Hagerstown secure a lot, raise the money and pay for it, and deed it to the Maryland and Virginia Eldership, and the Eldership will assume the responsibility of erecting a house of worship." While there were no churches of God near Baltimore, Baltimore county, yet members and families from Carroll county, adjoining Baltimore county on the west, occasionally removed to the city. Hence, for fifty years the churches in Maryland were desirous to establish a church in Maryland's largest city. The attempt was again made in 1894. J. M. Johnson, a member at Uniontown, with his family, located in Baltimore. On March 4, 1894, he reported to the Standing Committee that he was actively engaged in missionary work, and requested a license to preach. This was granted, and he was "appointed missionary to work up the interests of the Church of God in Baltimore until the Eldership." On April 4th he reported that they had secured a house of worship at the corner of Cross and Cleveland streets. On April 18th he organized a church in "the bethel of the Church of God," consisting of twelve members.

In West Virginia the work was making progress, more, however, in the way of revivals, the organization of churches southward, and in the gathering of Sunday-schools. In Marion county G. E. Stewart had successful meetings, at one of which there were seventy-six converts, fifty fellowshipped. They had organized six Sabbath-schools. Geo. E. Komp did efficient work in Kanawha county. A new bethel was built in 1891 at Mt. Tabor, 3 miles south of St. Albans, at a cost of $1,000.00, reputed to be "the finest country church-house in the county." It was dedicated September 20th, S. B. Craft preaching on the occasion. The West Virginia Eldership is dissimilar from all other Elderships, in that its territory lies in three States. On October 1, 1891, one of its bethels, called "Centennial," in Greene county, Pa., was dedicated, during the pastorate of G. E. Stewart. August 6, 1893, the bethel at Bellaire, Ohio, was reopened for divine worship. I. D. Cousins was the pastor, and N. M. Anderson, J. S. Marple and J. R. Campbell preached the sermons.

The ministers of the West Pennsylvania Eldership generally labored in a very unobtrusive manner. They had much to contend with, but they were reserved, and with occasional exceptions, made no attempt to secure applause or notoriety. Two of the most serious hindrances to their work about this time were the lax morals on the part of some few otherwise efficient workers and the schismatic doctrine of a second-work sanctification. The latter was zealously preached by several of the ministers, resulting generally "in a division among the brethren" where they were permitted to preach. Thus in Breakneck Valley, Fayette county, where a new house of worship had been dedicated and a special meeting was in progress, one of the advocates of this erroneous doctrine began to preach "a few doors from the church-house." As the Eldership stood firmly in opposition to the doctrine, these men had to be made subjects of discipline when other measures failed to silence them. This discipline was administered not because of any opposition to the doctrine of sanctification, nor to deprive ministers of the right to preach their conscientious convictions; but because their teaching promoted contention and schism in the churches, which are worse than theoretical heresy. But the work of the Eldership made steady progress. It was always deeply concerned about church interests in the city of Pittsburg. It is the geographical center of its territory, whither church families frequently removed from other parts of the country around. Yet church work was most difficult, and the cause suffered many reverses. There were periods when it seemed hopelessly lost, and the Eldership was disposed to cease further efforts. Thus in 1891 "the church at Pittsburg was not supplied with a preacher." "The outlook seemed very dark for the little vine." But the services of W. T. Cross, of Ohio, were secured, and the work was resumed. "The church at Pittsburg ought to be encouraged by the Eldership," was the sentiment which largely prevailed among the brotherhood. Cross was quite successful, for during the year he was pastor "there were twenty-one accessions." But in April of that year the church property was sold, and the struggling little band of self-sacrificing members was left without a church home. In October, 1893, W. H. McKlveen became the pastor. He found "the membership very much scattered, not having a regular pastor much of the time." But work was again begun with commendable zeal; "special services resulted in the conversion of seventeen persons"; "a Y. P. S. C. E. was organized," and "congregations increased, and the Sunday-school more than doubled." Without a house of worship, "yet we are encouraged to believe that at no distant day the church at Pittsburg will find herself in a new bethel erected for the worship of God." The Board of Trustees of the Eldership was ready to co-operate to this end. Work was to be "continued both on Fulton street and in the East End," and "the brethren in the East End" were authorized to lease or purchase ground on which to build a bethel, the Board agreeing to give $2,000.00 toward the building." Meanwhile "a mission of the church on Butler street" was started.

Elsewhere the interests of the Church were being well looked after. At East Liberty, Fayette county, under the labors of Geo. D. Statler, a bethel was built, which was dedicated on July 30, 1893. R. L. Byrnes preached on Sabbath morning. The services continued for a week, special subjects being discussed each evening by as many different ministers. In 1891 Statler was pastor in Jefferson county. A bethel was built at Rathmel, which was dedicated June 21, 1891. S. Woods preached the dedicatory sermon, W. R. Craig and J. A. Hetrick assisting during the day. The Milford Bethel, Somerset county, was built during the pastorate of T. Woods. It was dedicated on June 14, 1891, G. Sigler officiating. On March 27, 1891, the house of worship at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, was destroyed by fire. The church at once proceeded with the work of rebuilding. The cost of the new bethel, with an additional lot, was $10,000.00. R. L. Byrnes was "the faithful pastor," and he secured the services of J. R. H. Latchaw for the dedication, which was held on May 1, 1892. At Emericksville, Jefferson county, the dedication of "the bethel of the church of God" occurred on July 27, 1892. Geo. D. Statler, pastor; dedicatory sermon by R. L. Byrnes, and evening sermon by C. Manchester. At a distance of 7 miles from Barkeyville, Venango county, a bethel known as "Olivet" was built in 1893, under the labors of Herbert Dyke. It was to be dedicated by Chas. Manchester on May 14, 1893, but "owing to the inclemency of the weather," though "the larger part of the indebtedness had been raised," the formal dedication was postponed to June 4th, when S. G. Yahn officiated. This was a new point, where Manchester, in the Winter of 1891-2, had held a series of meetings and organized a church of forty members. The new bethel at Butler, county seat of Butler county, was dedicated September 17, 1893, with "three sermons during the day." A new house of worship was built at Maple Summit, Fayette county, on J. H. Means' circuit, which was dedicated September 17, 1893. The preaching was by S. G. Yahn, Sabbath morning; R. Vanaman, afternoon, and S. Woods, evening. Pine Grove Bethel, Indiana county, was completed in January, 1894, though the beginning was made in 1888. It was dedicated February 18th, R. L. Byrnes preaching Sunday morning, and W. B. Elliott on Saturday and Sunday evenings. J. F. Smith was the pastor.

In Ohio, with the overshadowing importance of Findlay College and its insistent demands for funds, less attention seemed to have been given to local church interests. Consequently the work was not making the progress which had been anticipated. Fewer houses of worship were built, or old ones remodeled and repaired. Yet there were devoted and earnest pastors, who labored with gratifying success. Among these was S. Dickerhoof, who in 1890 was pastor of a field in Wood county. At Bloom Center the church erected a new bethel, at a cost of \$1,400.00, "a credit to the cause of God, to the good people of the neighborhood and the church and pastor." It was dedicated by J. R. H. Latchaw August 24, 1890. Rededication services were conducted by J. M. Cassel, of the Walnut Creek Bethel, on W. C. Fuller's circuit, August 10, 1890. A new house of worship was built at Hopewell, Seneca county, with G. A. Bartlebaugh as pastor, which was dedicated August 17, 1890, J. M. Cassel officiating. Under the labors of W. T. Cross a meeting-house was purchased at Carey, Wyandot county, "formerly occupied by the English Lutherans," a church was organized, and after needed repairs the house was dedicated on December 14, 1890. Preaching by J. R. H. Latchaw. The total cost of the property, including repairs, was \$1,400.00. A Methodist house of worship, located  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles west of Findlay, Hancock county, was bought in May, 1891, and was christened "Bethel of the church of God at the Infirmary." It was repaired and rededicated June 7th, when W. N. Yates delivered the dedicatory sermon. The bethel at the Union appointment, Mercer county, was rededicated August 23, 1891, when W. N. Yates preached the sermon, J. F. Slough being pastor. The church at Folmer, Paulding county, had a peculiar experience in building its house of worship. The work was begun in 1887, and was so far advanced that the same year the house was "occupied for religious services; yet in October, 1891, it was "not fully completed." In September, 1891, W. R. Covert was there to dedicate it; but the heavy rains prevented. October 4, 1891, R. H. Bolton was secured by S. S. Hunter, the pastor. The church was poor, and it resorted to "a roast ox dinner on Saturday, the proceeds of which were to go towards the indebtedness of the bethel." "The ox roast dinner affair was to be continued on Lord's day," but the rain interfered. Bolton "recognized the hand of providence in this matter." A new church organization was effected at Center, Putnam county, February 1, 1892, by R. H. Bolton. The Eldership having assumed a debt of over \$500.00 resting on the Wooster bethel, Wayne county, the house was repaired under the labors of J. W. Bolton, and rededicated May 15, 1892, by J. R. H. Latchaw. He also officiated at the dedication of "a neat and substantial house of worship" at North Bridgewater, Williams county, December 11, 1892. It was built under the labors of J. W. Clark, at a cost of \$1,800.00. The Center Bethel, near Belmore, Putman county, was dedicated January 15, 1893, Latchaw "conducting the dedicatorial exercises." The new house of worship, known as the Jackson Bethel, near Hoytsville, was dedicated by W. N. Yates September 23, 1894. J. W. Kingston was the pastor. E. Poling was instrumental in building a bethel on his field of labor in Henry county, 3 miles west of Holgate, which was dedicated by W. N. Yates on December 2, 1894. Yates had become the successor of Latchaw as President of Findlay College, who had "renounced the authority of the General Eldership of the Church of God, and left the Church."

Progress in the Southern Indiana Eldership was hindered on account of the spirit of insubordination which developed in several of the churches where the Woodworth element predominated. Several ministers were involved, and their licenses were "revoked." The falling away of many of the Woodworth converts also had a very depressing effect. However, those who were true and loyal members of the churches labored faithfully under these adverse conditions. At Anderson a church was organized February 28, 1891, of twenty-seven members. They bought a lot, and also a large school-house which they removed on to the lot, repaired it and seated it with pews, and held the dedicatory services in February, 1892. At Shiloh, Daviess county, a new bethel was built under the labors of J. Vinson, which was dedicated by J. W. Neely on June 19, 1892. At Mt. Zion a small, frame house of worship was erected in the Summer of 1892, which was dedicated on October 2nd. In 1893 a lot was secured in Indianapolis by the pastor, J. Vinson, and his mother, on the corner of Le Grande avenue and Leonard street. A bethel was built thereon, which on October 7, 1894, was dedicated by W. R. Covert.

On W. W. Lovett's field of labor, in the Indiana Eldership, the bethel at Auburn was dedicated April 27, 1890. The dedicatory services were conducted by J. A. Wood. The Mt. Tabor bethel, on J. W. Stringfellow's charge was rededicated September 21, 1890. J. Bumpus preached on the occasion. The church at Ft. Wayne was reorganized by Ernest H. Shanks in January, 1891, with twenty members. A Sabbath-school was also started. A few more members were added in February, 1891. Shanks strongly urged the Eldership to sustain the mission, giving a number of reasons why the work in this central city of the Eldership should be made permanent. On November 1, 1891, W. N. Yates and the Reformed church pastor dedicated the new Union Chapel, near Turkey-Creek, Steuben county, built at a cost of $1,500.00. It was built jointly by the church of God and the Reformed church at that place. The Thorn Creek Bethel, on the circuit served by G. T. Kimmel, was dedicated November 29, 1891. In 1893 a new house of worship was built at Blue River appointment, on the circuit of which Geo. E. Komp was pastor. It was dedicated June 21, 1894, by I. W. Markley. With M. S. Hemminger as pastor, a bethel was built at Paddytown, Wabash county. Disappointed by the minister who was to officiate at the dedication, Hemminger preached the sermon on January 6, 1895.

In Michigan the work was in a rather stagnant condition, if it was not actually retrograding. A few self-denying ministers had the consciousness of duty well performed, while others were quite inactive. Their justification was want of adequate support. In Calhoun county there was even opposition to organizations, as well as to a paid ministry. The south-eastern counties of the State were included in the Ohio Eldership territory. Here, in 1890, C. N. Belman was the pastor. Under his labors the bethel at Ottawa Lake was built and dedicated October 26th, for which he secured the services of T. Koogle. The bethel at Sodus, where Isaac Crago, of Indiana, labored, was repaired, and on July 6, 1890, was rededicated by W. W. Lovett.

The Illinois Eldership was especially interested in the work of the church in Springfield, where at the opening of this period E. H. Baker was the zealous pastor. He labored against serious obstacles. As elsewhere, the elements brought together during the Woodworth meetings were not homogeneous, and contentions were not uncommon. There was also great lack of stability, as well as defects in moral character. In Springfield they were divided, one church having a "meeting-house" on the corner of Seventh and Mason streets, where Baker was pastor, and another one worshipping on Third street. The former enjoyed a revival after New Year's, 1890, with over twenty converts, and was reported "doing well." At an ordinance meeting in March fifty participated in the first ordinance and seventy in the second. But Baker left Springfield in the Fall, and the work was much neglected. At Lodge, Platt county, a new bethel was built under the labors of C. Manchester. He had organized the church the previous year. The dedication services were conducted by Mary Berkstresser, on September 14, 1890. In Shelley county, under the labors of O. B. Huston, the Pleasant Grove Bethel was built in the Summer of 1890. It was dedicated August 10th, W. B. Allen preaching on the occasion. At Hazel Dell, Cumberland county, where Mary Berkstresser was pastor, a house of worship was built, which was dedicated December 7, 1890. W. I. Berkstresser was the preacher. W. B. Allen officiated at two dedications in the month of February, 1891. A new bethel was built in a community in Schuyler county called "Richland," which was set apart for divine worship February 8th. Allen was assisted by W. A. Smith. The other one was located in the adjoining county of Brown, and was named "Mt. Zion Bethel." It was dedicated February 15th. E. Parks was the efficient pastor. In March, 1891, the building of a new house of worship was begun in the village of Buffalo, where B. F. Tilley was pastor. He was succeeded by John Ritchie, during whose pastorate the building was finished. Mary Berkstresser and her brother W. I., officiated at the dedication. At Wabash, Clark county, a new bethel replaced a "delapidated one" in the Summer of 1892, with D. H. Rupp as pastor. It was dedicated November 20th, with an ordinance meeting in the evening. W. B. Allen preached on the occasion. I. S. Richmond, who was "deservedly popular on his field," the Plum River circuit, Jo Daviess county, succeeded in having a house of worship built at Morseville, and also a parsonage. The bethel was dedicated May 28, 1893. It replaced a union house, which was destroyed by fire in the preceding Winter. M. S. Newcomer preached the dedicatory sermon. The bethel in Decatur was repaired at a cost of $300.00, during the pastorate of C. F. Rogers. It was rededicated by E. H. Baker on July 30, 1893.

The progress of the cause in Iowa seems to have been impeded during this period by causes which are not now readily discernible. The spirit of emulation, which often becomes an added force in the attainment of ends sought even in sacred things, was largely lacking. The approaching General Eldership of 1890, which was to meet at North Bend, Johnson county, in May, stimulated the "Tabernacle Committee" to greater diligence in its work. This tent was to be used for the entertainment of this body. In February, 1890, the Committee met at North Bend, presided over by John Huff, when final arrangements were made for the purchase of the tent. The new bethel at Millersburg, where D. Long was pastor, located "in a very good belt of country of well-to-do farmers," was built in the early Summer of 1890. It was dedicated by Wm. Vance July 6th, who spoke principally on the subject of Christian Union. Harmony Bethel, "an old camping ground for the Church of God," was originally built in 1859. A new Bethel was built in the Summer of 1890, during the pastorate of D. Long, which was dedicated by J. R. H. Latchaw November 16, 1890. It cost $1,500.00, including work "done gratuitously" by the brethren. In the extreme north-western county of Lyon, and in O'Brien and Woodbury counties, considerable work was done in the Winter of 1890-1891. D. S. Guintar was the pastor. "After years of continuous working and waiting and hoping and praying the crowning day came at last," wrote J. R. H. Latchaw after the dedication, "when the church of God at Ida Grove had a house of worship." Ida Grove is the county-seat of Ida county, the center of a settlement made up largely of Pennsylvanians, who were induced to buy farms and locate there by A. X. Shoemaker. They began the enterprise of building a Bethel in 1883; but the leaders "demanded a $12,000.00 or $15,000.00 house." For this reason "the project fell through, and was not seriously revived until 1891, when the corner-stone was laid. The house was finished and the day of dedication set for June 26, 1892. Latchaw preached in the morning and H. L. Soule in the evening. Total cost, $4,800.00. At Carroll, the shire town of Carroll county, the need of a house of worship was felt in 1891, when one brother offered to give $500.00 for that purpose. But the church decided first to buy the Evangelical property, church building and parsonage. "They proposed to repair and refit the house," but after careful investigation they concluded to build a new house. This was finished and ready for dedication, at a cost of $2,700.00. M. S. Newcomer officiated at the dedication, in August, 1894.

The work in Nebraska during the present period suffered considerably on account of drouths. Ministers could not be adequately supported, and many of the churches were discouraged. "More aggressive work must be done" was the prevailing sentiment in the Eldership; but the means were lacking to enable pastors to devote all their time to preaching. Fields were consolidated, so that there were but seven circuits in 1894, instead of the twelve in 1891. The territory was too extensive to enable the ministers to do most effective work. There were churches and preaching points in the following counties: Hitchcock, Sheridan, Gage, Saline, Polk, Custer, Frontier, Lincoln, York, Sherman, Dawson, Clay and Logan. Notwithstanding the poverty and weakness of the churches, they were actuated with a true missionary spirit. If the rule is to be applied, that "organizations are to be judged by their products, and not by what they claim for themselves," then these churches must be accorded sincere commendations for their persevering endeavors to sustain and advance the cause. They had a State Woman's Missionary Society, and local societies in a majority of the churches. A. Wilson was the General Missionary in the employ of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. In 1891, and again in 1892, he reported two new church organizations. He succeeded in the erection of a house of worship, "built of sod," 24x34 feet, at Huxley, Custer county, in 1892. It was known as the "Cedar Bluff Bethel." That Church work could be maintained at all in many sections of the State speaks strongly of the zeal and devotion of the brotherhood. Wilson labored principally in the southern and western parts of the State. "Crops," he wrote in the Fall of 1894, "are cut short all over the State more or less." "In large portions of the western part of the State there are no crops whatever." "It is hard on Church work." Many families left the State, and in some instances churches were disorganized.

In Kansas, except in a few counties bordering on Nebraska, conditions were more favorable than in the latter State. The regular Church work was vigorously carried on, and additions to the membership of the local churches numbered upward of two hundred each year. The employment of a general missionary was a popular idea, and part of the time J. C. Forncrook labored in this capacity. A "tabernacle" was proposed, so that evangelistic meetings could be conducted in towns where no suitable buildings could be rented. In 1890 there were twelve charges, two of them stations—Ft. Scott and Topeka. These were in the following counties: Crawford, Labette, Verdigris, Rice, Riley, Pratt, Republic, Norton, Fulton, Shawnee and Ness. In 1892 Dickinson and Geary counties were on the list, and in 1893, Phillips. The circuits had to be rearranged, and sometimes two thrown together for want of a sufficient number of ministers to supply all the fields. In 1892 there were sixteen appointments; in 1893, thirteen, and in 1894, fourteen. The missionary spirit possessed ministers and churches. A State Woman's Missionary Society was formed in 1890, and the sisters engaged zealously in the work. Only a few houses of worship, however, were built. The one at Englevale was dedicated August 9, 1891. W. T. Turpin was the pastor, and J. C. Forncrook preached the dedicatory sermon. There was general interest in the work at Ft. Scott, the county-seat of Bourbon county. In 1890 the Board of Missions of the General Eldership appointed Forncrook missionary at Ft. Scott. He held a successful revival meeting in a Hall, at which there were fifty reported conversion. He had the assistance of E. H. Baker, an evangelist of Illinois. While the new Bethel was not yet finished, services were transferred to it in November, 1890. The original estimate of the cost of the Bethel was $1,800.00; but owing to "a blow down," and installing of a bell and a heating furnace, and other extras, the total cost was $2,350.00. It was dedicated November 23, 1890, E. H. Baker doing the preaching. Another point of absorbing interest as a center of Church work was Topeka, Shawnee county, capital of the State and county town. Mrs. Woodworth held a revival meeting there in September, 1891. By her invitation C. S. Bolton went there in November to take charge of the work. He baptized 124, and organized a church of over 100 members, which increased to 222 within the year. Also a flourishing Sunday-school, and a Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. At their first ordinance meeting over 100 participated. While the church at once resolved to build a Bethel, the work was delayed, so that when in 1894 W. T. Turpin took charge they worshiped in a leased two-story brick building. The "church was passing through the fire," and much of the heterogeneous material was consumed.

An effort was made in Missouri in January, 1890, to divide the Eldership, and organize two Elderships in the State. The fields of labor were so located as to be widely scattered, some being in the northern counties; some along the Mississippi river on the east, and some in the south-western counties. The work, too, was in a prosperous condition, with early promise of sufficient strength to sustain two Elderships. A Petition was accordingly circulated for signatures, to be presented to the General Eldership in May, 1890. The church at Hannibal, Marion county, organized in 1888, was "enduring severe persecutions," and "wading through deep waters" in 1890. Earnest calls for help were published. There were schismatics in the fold, and a spirit of insubordination to the Eldership which threatened the life of the church. It was going through an experience similar to that of other Woodworth churches. Mrs. Woodworth began her evangelistic work in St. Louis in July, 1890. Meetings were held in her Tabernacle until the weather became too cold, when a Hall was secured. The reports stated that "from 75 to 100 were at the altar at one time," and "4,000 to 5,000 people attending the meetings nightly." On August 31, 1890, C. S. Bolton "baptized 54 believers." A church was organized, composed "largely of persons of German extraction." H. H. Spither became the pastor in the Fall of 1891. During his pastorate a Bethel was built at a cost exceeding $7,000.00. It was dedicated by J. R. H. Latchaw August 14, 1892. C. S. Bolton was General Missionary in the State by appointment of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. He was present, with the pastor, J. M. Klein, when "Center Bethel," at Osborne, was dedicated, November 9, 1890, by J. R. H. Latchaw. Good work was done by Bolton in Pettis county in the Winter of 1890. Other ministers labored faithfully in Hickory and Perry counties. In Sullivan county, where A. J. Hill was pastor, the Ivy Hill Bethel was built in the Fall of 1892. He officiated at the dedication January 22, 1893. He also succeeded in building the White Water Bethel, where a church was organized in 1891. C. P. French and J. N. Smith were to dedicate it December 24, 1893; but failing to get there, Hill officiated. The Doe Run Bethel was dedicated by Hill and Smith on May 13, 1894. The Hawkeye Bethel, Sullivan county, was built and dedicated under the labors of G. L. Bowman, September 2, 1894. H. W. Allen preached on the occasion. A State Woman's Missionary Society was organized. One of the effects of the Woodworth meetings was the call of women to the ministry. Two were licensed by the Standing Committee in March, 1891, one of them living at Hannibal. In 1893 thirty organized churches belonged to the Missouri Eldership, ten of which had their own houses of worship. It was believed that the Church in the State had fine prospects for continued and permanent growth, and had "nothing to fear except the outcroppings of the spirit of disloyalty."

The planting of the Church of God in Arkansas, Indian Territory and Oklahoma, except in the northern parts, is properly to be credited to the brethren of the Texas Eldership. And while the work languished in Texas, some Church of God families and ministers removed into Arkansas, Indian Territory and Oklahoma, and began work there. During part of the present period B. Ober was the General Missionary in Texas, appointed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. He preached in Collin, Cook, Lamar and Sebastian counties. In 1891-2 E. B. Nelson was laboring in these counties as General Evangelist of the Texas Eldership. Ober removed to Oklahoma, locating at Arapahoe, Custer county, in September, 1893. He began preaching there in 1894, when the citizens united in the building of a school-house "on the corner of my place," says Ober, to be used "for public school and preaching." C. Brundage, August, 1893, located at Arlington, Lincoln county, Okla. At that time he stated "the Church of God is not yet in an organized form in Oklahoma; but he knew of half a dozen Church of God families which had secured homesteads in the Territory. He began to preach at different points, and urged the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to send a missionary there. B. R. Parks began preaching in north-western Oklahoma in the Winter of 1893-4. In April, 1894, he organized the first church of God in a log school-house in Woods county, on the Kansas State line. It consisted of twelve members, with Henry and J. M. Bosley elders. They at once also organized a Sunday-school. H. W. Allen organized the first churches of God in Dewey county, at Leedey and Burmah, about the same time. In 1890 the Board of Missions of the General Eldership sent D. Blakely, of Missouri, to the Indian Territory as General Missionary. In 1891 J. C. Caswell was appointed by the same Board missionary to the Creek and Choctaw Nations, and E. M. Kirkpatrick to the Cherokee Nation. In April, 1893, a church was organized by Caswell at Davis Chapel, Creek Nation, of thirteen members. Kirkpatrick effected an organization at Hanson in 1894. In Arkansas J. W. Riddle was the General Missionary in 1890, and in 1891 he was restricted to northern Arkansas, and D. S. Summitt was appointed to southern Arkansas. A bethel was built near the Texas line, and dedicated in December, 1891. In February, 1890, J. W. Riddle "enjoyed a precious revival meeting at Ft. Smith, Ark.," after which he organized a church of twenty-one members. Work was also carried on among the colored people. In 1892 a colored church was organized at Webb City, Ark. There were also churches at McLain's and at Montreal. The total membership in 1893 was 105, with 8 preachers. A body of colored people, known as the "Christian Friendship Church," had been formed in 1892. They had 32 ministers, 20 churches, all in Arkansas except one, which was at Sulphur, Texas, and a membership of 600. They opened negotiations with the Secretary of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to become identified with the Church of God. A. C. Cromly, leader among the colored ministers of the Church, antagonized this movement, insisting that the Christian Friendship Church must join the colored churches of the Texas and Arkansas Eldership.

In the Fall of 1889 A. W. Reeder, of Ness county, Kas., removed to Moscow, Idaho, in Latah county, adjoining Washington, and the third county south from British Columbia. He strongly urged Church of God families to locate there and build up an organization. In 1892 W. F. Howard also located in Idaho. He joined Reeder in calls for a minister, as "openings are good to begin Church work." But most of the emigration was to Oregon, and a little later to Washington. J. F. Schoch, a minister of the Illinois Eldership, removed to Oregon in the Fall of 1889. He found a few other families within a radius of 30 miles. He began preaching in a school-house near his home. J. Garrigus had also located near Greenville, Oregon, and made strong appeals for a missionary. J. W. Force preached at North Yam Hill and other points. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1890 appointed M. S. Newcomer missionary to Oregon. He reached the home of J. Garrigus and preached his first sermon July 20th. The meeting was continued several weeks, resulting in a number of conversions, and on August 3rd the first church of God was organized by him in Oregon, consisting of thirteen members, with J. Garrigus as elder, and R. S. Bullock, deacon. Newcomer, however, resigned; but by that time there were at least eight preachers in Oregon and Washington, so that it was thought an Eldership could be organized. In 1891 J. F. Schoch was appointed General Missionary by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, and continued for several years. He organized the church at Buckley, Ore., in the Winter of 1892-3. The ministers which met at Fir Grove, Ore., in October, 1891, in the capacity of an Eldership, appointed four of their number to circuits. They held Ministerial Associations each year in connection with the Eldership, and in 1893 one extra session. A church was organized in Salem in 1893, and on February 6, 1894, one was organized at Aumsville. The church in Salem had members of German and French descent, as well as Americans, and one of their number who was licensed by the Eldership could preach in English and French. At Oak Grove a church of seven members was organized in 1894. Less work was done in Washington during this period. R. A. Slyter preached in Clark county in 1892, in the Methodist house of worship, with good prospects of organizing a church. At Nooksack a church was organized in 1894. J. F. Schoch's labors as missionary extended into Washington. The Ministerial Association held its session at La Center in 1894. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership in 1890 appointed D. Keplinger General Missionary in California. He began work in the latter part of the Summer of 1890, and by 1893 he had three regular preaching places, and had arrangements made to open a fourth. His territory was mainly in Los Angeles county, in the southern part of the State. The Church families lived so far apart, and the work made such slow progress, that it was difficult to effect organizations. More Church families had emigrated into several of the counties in the central and northern parts of the State, but were also too much scattered for economical and efficient Church work.

The church at Louisville, Ky., was maintaining its existence, but in March, 1890, it was rather a "scattered flock," when H. H. Spither, Indiana, held a three weeks' meeting, when "a number were converted," and the membership increased again to fifty. He reported that "the church's prosperity is assured."

In the Winter of 1890-1891, E. M. Kirkpatrick, missionary in the Indian Territory, came eastward into Tennessee, and began Church work in the western part of the State. He did not remain long enough to do permanent work.

A good beginning in Church work was made in Colorado in September, 1894, by I. H. Greene. He began a meeting on September 20th at Rand, Larimer county. He and his wife "stood alone" when the meeting began; there "was not one that would even kneel." At the close of the meeting he "organized a church with twenty-four members." They at once began the work of "building a church, 20x36 feet." It was dedicated January 20, 1895. January 13, 1895, Greene organized a church of ten members at Walden, Larimer county.

The era of public debates was about ended in the middle and eastern sections of Church of God territory; but in the south-western section, where the Disciples and Missionary Baptists were relatively strong, their disputatious spirit made it sometimes necessary to defend the doctrines and practices of the Church in oral discussions. For sharp, irritating, acrimonious debates even among themselves, the Baptists in the south-west were somewhat notorious. W. T. Turpin, on the evening of June 16, 17 and 18, 1890, debated the ordinance of Feet-washing with a Mr. Bramblet, of the Missionary Baptist Church. It was held in Crawford county, Kansas. The congregation was to vote on the merits of the arguments presented by the disputants. But at the close of the debate "the opposition objected to this." A compromise was agreed upon. All members of the Church of God and of the Baptist Church were excluded. Then "the vote stood twenty for the Baptist side and sixty for the Church of God." In Nebraska C. S. Kilmer held a public debate at Arnold, Custer county, with a Disciple minister, "on washing the saints' feet." This was in March, 1891. Kilmer was "a clear and able defender of the doctrines of the Church of God." August 6 and 7, 1891, "a discussion was held by J. M. Howard, of the Church of God, and J. T. Evans, of the Missionary Baptist Church, at Oak Grove, Franklin county, Ark." The following were the propositions debated: First day—"Resolved, That the Missionary Baptist Church, of which I am a member, was set up by Christ, and will be perpetuated till his second coming." Evans affirmed. Second day—"Resolved, That the Church of God, of which I am a member, is the church of God according to [its original] organization." Howard affirmed. There were three judges, "one a member of the Church of God, one a member of the Missionary Baptist Church, and a gentleman who was no professor of religion, and acted as umpire. The first allegation he gave to Howard, and the second to Evans." But on the Sunday morning following the debate he stated that "Evans did not make one point in his defense." "This gave us one of the grandest victories we have had in the State of Arkansas." B Ober had a good reputation as a debater and he was regarded "a power in defense of the truth." In January, 1892, at Uniontown, Ark., he held a public debate with E. Randolph, of the Disciple Church. "It ended in a complete triumph for Ober." J. C. Caswell in debate was alert, resourceful and aggressive. He held a debate with a Missionary Baptist on October 6-8, 1892, the proposition being the rather common one at that time, which was thus worded: "The Church of God, of which I am a member, possesses the characteristics which entitle it to be the true Apostolic church, and its name was the church of God." His opponent affirmed the same of the Missionary Baptist Church. Caswell claimed that his opponent "was so completely whipped that he could not stay to preach for his congregation." A debate continuing six consecutive nights was held in Clare county, Mich., beginning August 7, 1893, between M. D. Rogers, of the Church of God, and J. A. Carpenter, of "the Josephite Branch of the Mormon Church." Three propositions were debated, viz.: "1. That Joe Smith was a prophet of God." "2. That the Church of God, of which I, M. D. Rogers, am a member, is in harmony with the church of Christ and his Apostles of 1800 years ago." "3. That the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the church of Christ and his Apostles of 1800 years ago." The decision on each proposition was submitted to the audience, and on each one was unanimously in favor of Rogers. At the Star school-house, Bates county, Mo., a debate was conducted "night and day beginning Tuesday evening, February 20, 1894, till Thursday night, March 1st, except Sunday." The disputants were J. H. Ohlhausen, of the Church of God, and J. T. Young, of the Mormon Church. These were the propositions: "That Joe Smith was a prophet called of God." "That the Book of Mormon is an inspired book, and entitled to belief as much as any book of the New Testament." "That the reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is identical in faith, church organization and practice with the Old and New Testaments." "That the Church of God is identical in faith, church organization and practice with the Old and New Testaments." During the third week in October, 1894, J. C. Caswell debated during four consecutive nights with ——— Collier, of the Disciple Church, at Enterprise, Indian Territory. The propositions debated were: "1. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the Apostolic Church is God's?" "2. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the Apostolic Church is Christ's?" The first was affirmed by Caswell; the second, by Collier. "A unanimous vote of the congregation decided a victory in favor of Caswell."

The period from 1890 to 1895 was somewhat fruitful in discussions, rather than debates, in the columns of The Church Advocate. Often called out by questions submitted for editorial answers, they also were made topics for Ministerial Associations, at which there was frequently debating which was exceedingly illuminating. As these questions presented issues which were canvassed by ministers and churches in different localities their discussion was regarded as a valuable contribution to the Church's current literature. This was especially the case with questions handed down by the General Eldership on which the annual Elderships were requested to act. This was the case in the Fall of 1893, when the question of a Life Certificate of Ordination in place of the Annual License was to be considered and recommendations adopted to the General Eldership in 1896. Three questions of general interest were revived in connection with the Woodworth revival meetings. These were Faith, or Divine Healing; Trances, and Second-work Sanctification. The prevailing sentiment of the Church was antagonistic to the views and practices of Mrs. Woodworth and her followers. While certain phenomena reported at her meetings were difficult to explain to the common reader, the fact that they are not peculiar to religious experiences, and that they lack essential evidences of their supernatural character discredited them with thinking people generally. Trances were discarded as phenomena of no value, and as lacking New Testament recognition. The second-work theory was readily disproved by a more scientific exegesis of New Testament proof-tests. And thus gradually these unsound views gave way to a more rational and Scriptural explanation of experiences which could readily delude certain classes of believers. The value of a Church periodical as a defender of the things commonly believed by a body of people was seldom more forcibly exemplified. This is true also of another theoretical innovation which was advanced and mooted during 1890 and 1891, and which disturbed the peace of some of the churches. It was the novel question among the churches of God of the duty and privilege of prayer by penitent sinners. The suppliant cry of the penitent for pardon had been heard with approval and delight by ministers and churches of God for over sixty years. So that this antagonism to a sentiment that was claimed to be age-old and apostolic proved quite repugnant to the churches everywhere. On account of a reversal of the order of the ordinances of some churches in Arkansas, this subject was revived, and was discussed at Ministerial Associations. It was also critically examined, and the arguments refuted, in two editorials in November, 1890, and again in July and in December, 1891. The organic union of Protestant denominations found few advocates, and was vigorously disputed as "a pleasant dream," but as in no wise being the oneness of Christ's followers for which he prayed. It was not the union the ministers and churches of God stood for in the early years of the Church. Laymen and the administration of the ordinances was discussed at several periods. It was conceded that ruling elders have the right to assist in administering the Communion. And even the administration of baptism was considered defensible, but not advisable, as against the Baptist position. The innovation of sitting during prayer in public service was generally resisted by the ministry. At no time was the itinerancy so generally discussed as in the Fall of 1892 and the Winter following. The Ohio Eldership had decided to try the call system. In East Pennsylvania a strong sentiment developed in its favor, and a discussion followed in February, 1893, under the head of "The Stationing Committee," in which F. W. McGuire took the lead. He claimed that an Eldership should not do that which the churches themselves can do. And as they can select their own pastors, the Stationing Committee should be abolished. He had several opponents who vigorously disputed his premises and conclusion. The most notable debates during this period were the one on the "First Resurrection," in the Winter of 1890-1891, and that involving a change in Eldership titles in 1892-1896. The former was mainly between F. W. McGuire and the Editor. It had its origin at a Ministerial Association, where, by request, the Editor gave his views on Rev. xx. 1-6. These were reproduced in an editorial, which was answered by McGuire. The discussion involved the correctness of the pre-millennial theory of the Second Advent, but centered on the question of a first resurrection. Hence the first two editorials discussed the question, "Is there a first resurrection?" These were answered by McGuire in the affirmative. Then followed four editorials on a "Simultaneous Resurrection," and one on "Revelation" as "A Symbolical Book." McGuire replied in five articles on "The Resurrection of the Just." The Editor then discussed in order in two editorials "A Little Chilastic History;" "No Two Resurrections in Dan. ii. 2;" "Simultaneous Judgment," and five editorials on "The Angel in Revelation xx. 1," and one on "The Advent and the Resurrection." Four other writers participated in the discussion. D. Blakely wrote against the Editor's views in answer to the question, "Is there a First Resurrection?" S. Morrett followed in the same line of thought. C. Price wrote two articles on "Rev. xx. 1-6." And Michael Newman, one of Winebrenner's first converts, wrote two articles in defense of the pre-millennial theory. It was an exceptional discussion in that it was entirely devoid of personalities. The debate on Eldership titles was protracted and thorough-going. The question slumbered from 1872 to 1893, and was revived unintentionally and unexpectedly. At the session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership held at Lancaster in 1892, a committee consisting of C. H. Forney, G. Sigler, B. F. Beck, J. M. Carrell and D. S. Shoop was appointed "to revise the Constitution." This committee agreed to change the title so as to read, "The East Pennsylvania Association of the Churches of God." It also authorized Forney to present the matter before the General Eldership in 1893, and request that body to grant the East Pennsylvania Eldership permission thus to change its title. This was done; but the General Eldership directed that prior to the meeting of said body in 1896 the Editor should take the initiative in the discussion of the question, which should then be voted upon in 1896. Accordingly the Editor opened the discussion on April 11, 1894, and closed it May 20, 1896. He laid down the rule, that he would discuss the question affirmatively, and publish no contributed articles until he had finished. Then every one in order should be permitted to write one or two articles giving his views for or against the proposed change. After all shall have written who desired to do so, the Editor would review articles dissenting from his views. The Editor published six editorials, closing his discussion on May 20th. Thirteen contributors furnished articles, which were published in consecutive issues of The Advocate. F. W. McGuire agreed with the Editor in the change from "church" to "churches," but was not in favor of "Association." N. M. Anderson endorsed the Editor's position. W. C. Leonard preferred "Assembly." W. H. Cross was "bitterly opposed" to the change of title. C. H. Grove stood squarely with the affirmative. So also did J. G. Cunningham, a layman. M. S. Newcomer was opposed to any change, but simply demanded that the Editor answer his own arguments submitted, as he claimed, to the General Eldership in 1872. D. B. Zook's views coincided entirely with the Editor's. S. V. Sterner favored "churches" and "Assembly." H. C. Coppeland wrote against "Association." So did G. W. Wilson, and "Advocate." J. C. Caswell wanted no change made. The articles in opposition were then reviewed at length by the Editor. He relied on the rule made at the opening of the discussion to allow G. Sigler, S. Morrett, C. F. Reitzel and F. W. McGuire to publish articles in opposition, and C. H. Grove to reply to Sigler. Thus ended a discussion more widely representative than any preceding one. It was not "a storm of human passions" after which "always comes a purer atmosphere, making a wider horizon possible, and giving a new impulse for advance;" but a calm, dispassionate and logical exchange of reasons on a fundamental question in church polity.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE last five years of the century furnished convincing proof of great changes silently effected in the religious life of the American Churches. Causes which in the main were occult and elusive had been at work for two decades, and were now recognized chiefly in the results they were producing. They gave decisive evidence of the power of action as contrasted with that of mere declamation and discussion. The forms of activity were multiplied and intensified. The spirit of fraternity was deepened. Liberality in doctrine as well as in practice became more universal. But revivals of earlier days grew more infrequent as a rule. Nor was the spiritual good of all these diversified forms of activity and of organization perceptibly increased. Rather the reverse. Conversions during at least a part of this period were comparatively fewer than during many former periods. Decrease in church attendance was lamented. The Methodist press of the country deplored the fact, that during the ecclesiastical year 1897-8 the increase of membership of said Church was "alarmingly small as compared with other years." The new forms of activity, with the fever for big evangelistic revivals, produced unfavorable results, in that more than sixty per centum of the reported converts never became members of Churches, and the Churches were being built up more of a disproportionate number of unsaved members. For the Church of God the question was frequently raised, "Are we not as a Church retrograding?" It was evident that adverse influences were operating, not evil in themselves, which made progress and success more difficult. In view of these facts, and the general stagnation and spiritual deadness of Churches "prodigious efforts" were made in the Winter of 1896-7 "to secure a general and powerful revival in this country." The "consummate generalship of Mr. Moody was employed in making every provision for a successful campaign. The ablest lieutenants the country afforded were at his command, and the pastors put themselves and their customary church services largely at his disposal. But the revival did not come!" Among the churches of God there were some local revivals of considerable power. But apparently the hidden forces at work had ended the period of the great religious awakenings of earlier years.

In the territory west of the Missouri River, the work of the churches was seriously hindered in 1894-6 by the failure of crops, especially in Nebraska. A. Willson, who traveled in the counties of Frontier, Hitchcock, Lincoln and Custer, Nebraska, reported the brotherhood as suffering for the necessities of life, and being in great destitution. This was general in those sections. Geo. W. Minzer represented conditions in Sherman and Blaine counties as equally serious. As other Churches represented in those sections sent relief, as well as various Orders, so the churches of God east were appealed to for help. During the Winter season food, clothing as well as money were needed. Under such conditions no church work could be done, and many families which could get away returned to their former homes in States further east. The "unreasoned and unscientific banking and currency system, as it has since been called, is held responsible to a large extent for developing and promoting panics. It is held to be "responsible for the commercial, industrial and social disasters which flow from panics, which attack directly or indirectly every home in the nation." One of these financial panics occurred in 1897, and as usual interfered with religious work. Even if "it was entirely unnecessary and unwarranted by natural conditions," as affirmed by United States Senator N. W. Aldrich, it could not preclude the natural effects. Even the revivals which followed previous panics were not realized. Churches in larger towns and cities suffered most, but the sympathetic effect was felt everywhere.

It is doubtless true, if not everywhere conceded, that the growing liberality and spirit of fraternity among the Churches, largely the outgrowth of the Christian Endeavor movement, did not conduce to the growth of the weaker bodies of Christians. As with individuals, so it has been thought of Churches, as Browning says: "Make life a ministry of love and it will always be worth living." Christian love and fraternity made almost any denomination a congenial Church home. The Church of God has always been non-sectarian, non-exclusive and catholic in sentiment; but its fundamental principles have prevented it from taking an active part in projects of organic union and consolidation. Even the confederation movement has not appealed so strongly to its leaders. But it could not stand aloof from the Christian Endeavor movement. This had enlisted nearly all the Churches, and at the close of the century there were 59,712 local societies in the United Societies, with a membership of 3,582,720. The Methodist Church had its Epworth League, the Baptist and United Brethren Churches had their Young People's Christian Unions, the Lutheran Church had its Luther League, and so had other Churches their own general organizations. Not so with the churches of God. Yet many pastors entered heartily into this movement, and local societies were organized in a majority of the Eldershops before 1900. In 1897 the number was about ninety. In several of the annual Eldershops, as East Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois, State Unions were organized. In March, 1893, a Christian Endeavor Department was started in The Church Advocate, with M. M. Foose as Conductor. He proved quite efficient, but his incumbency, as indeed his ministerial career, was short. He died June 16, 1896, in the prime of life and at the height of his usefulness as a minister and pastor. He had been ordained in 1884, when thirty-five years old. Beloved by his Eldership, sitting in the darkness of a deep sorrow, he resolved to perpetuate his memory by erecting a monument over his grave. He was President of the Church of God State Union of Christian Endeavor Unions. C. I. Brown was his successor to conduct the Christian Endeavor Department in The Advocate. Not only did the Christian Endeavor societies of the churches of God affiliate with societies of other Churches in general county and State conventions; but they were represented at the National Convention at New York, Detroit and Nashville, and a few were in attendance at the sixteenth International Convention, at San Francisco, Cal., July, 1897.

It is philosophical to think that there is more than a revulsion from sectarianism in the efforts at union or consolidation of Churches, or Church Federation.

Sectarianism is more directly antagonistic to a spirit of liberalism and of Christian brotherhood. As this spirit began to predominate it was an easier task to formulate bases of union, or for one Church to become consolidated with another and larger Church. In some such way twelve denominations disappeared from the United States Statistical Report of 1896, and four denominational families also disappeared. Hence, the discussion of the unity of Christian denominations, according to Dr. Charles H. Small in 1898, "is not only in the air, but it is in conventions, assemblies, conferences and in newspaper and magazine articles." And these discussions bore fruit because the spirit of fraternity already existed. Already in a prior General Convention the Protestant Episcopal Church presented "a basis of union" for all the denominations. For several years a committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly carried on a conference with the Episcopal Commission on this basis. The Disciples of Christ later issued a declaration of essentials in four articles as a basis of union, and made in a spirit of brotherly love and harmony. In 1895 the National Council of Congregational churches presented proposals in four articles "as a basis of unity." In April, 1896, a conference of Congregational and Christian churches in Ohio was held to further union on this basis. In 1897 a strong movement was organized to reunite the Northern and Southern Presbyterian General Assemblies. In 1898 the commissioners of the Methodist Episcopal Churches, North and South held sessions to carry into effect the "plan of federation" of the two bodies. Indeed the organic unity of Protestant Christianity was so evidently not "Christian unity as proved by the Scriptures," that the logical judgment of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler was very generally accepted; that "Christian unity I go for; Church union, on any basis, looks like an 'iridescent dream' at present." The Church of God could not be unconcerned about these movements. But no official action of a specific character was taken during this period. But the question was quite frequently and extensively discussed in print. More particularly the federation of Churches, was the subject of editorials and contributed articles in The Advocate. But even this "uniting in a league" with the denominations was not approved to any extent, as it contravened the most fundamental principles of what was conceived to be the church of God of the Scriptures. The few who seriously contended that "the Church of God is a denomination," and some who were disheartened, were favorable to either federation, consolidation or merging with some larger body. The voice of the Church has been consistently against the thought that the Church of God is a denomination, and this was emphasized in 1897 in protests against the habit of so stigmatizing it. A partially successful effort was made in 1897, at union between the Church of God in the Indiana Eldership and the "White County, Indiana Conference of the Church of God." But while this spirit of union and federation was thus potently at work, divisions and schisms also occurred, so that in 1896 seventeen denominations were reported in the official statistics of the Government which were not known in 1890. With only two of these was there much affinity on the part of members of, or churches of God. These were the Evangelical Association and the Salvation Army. The division of the former body occurred in the previous period, but the litigations continued into the present period, and were subjects of interest to the Church of God. They were among the discordant notes in the harmony of sound produced by the advocates of union and federation. The division in the American branch of the Salvation Army occurred in 1896, when the American Volunteers formed a distinct and separate organization, with Commissioner Ballington Booth as Commander-in-chief. It has Articles of Faith, administers the Lord's Supper and baptism by ordained officers, and permits membership in churches. The equality of men and women in service and in office is fully recognized. This Article became of interest to the churches of God in the controversy over the ordination of women to the ministry and as delegates to the Annual and General Elderships. While the General Eldership never expressed itself explicitly on either question, leaving it wholly with the Annual Elderships, it did so implicitly, by receiving licensed women as delegates. The question of women as representatives in the Methodist General Conference was also agitated at this time. With the churches of God this was not the direct issue; but, should women be ordained to the ministry? Or, as it was also stated, is it in harmony with the Scriptures to elect women as elders? This was discussed in 1896, as against those who contended that "in the church there can be no male and no female." In 1897 the question was in controversy in this form, suggested by a minister in an Eldership which licensed women to preach: "Upon what texts of Scripture does the Church of God base its practice of ordaining women to preach?" Interest was added to this discussion by the formal ordination to the ministry of Mrs. Ballington Booth in January, 1898. She was ordained a minister of "the General Church of God by the laying on of hands on the part of her husband, assisted by three other officers of the Volunteers of America." Mrs. Woodworth, licensed minister of the Southern Indiana Eldership, was still actively engaged in revival work, though less constantly, and apparently with waning power. At Fostoria, Ohio, in the Winter of 1896-7, she held a very successful meeting, when "the number of conversions was 400; number of persons healed of various diseases, 200; received into church fellowship, 26." Sentiment against her views on "divine healing," however, seemed to have been steadily growing, and in June, 1897, the Board of Missions of the General Eldership notified the Southern Indiana Eldership to "withdraw all official relations from Sister Maria B. Woodworth, or it will refuse to make any further appropriations" to fields in said Eldership. This action was resented by the Standing Committee of said Eldership. The Eldership itself, however, took a more conservative course, and required Mrs. Woodworth to labor more within the bounds of the Eldership. The Board of Missions in November, 1897, rescinded its action of June, 1897, after receiving a "protest" against it from the Indiana Eldership.

The interest in mission work, and especially foreign mission work, was greatly stimulated by the departure, in the Fall of 1896, of Miss Clara Landes, a minister of the Iowa Eldership, for the mission field in India. A Department in The Advocate had been started, devoted to the work of the Woman's General Missionary Society, which was in charge of Mary Berkstresser. It was also the purpose of another movement to inspire new zeal in the churches, viz.: To begin "the Centenary Memorial Mission," in 1897. Its character was not clearly defined. In general terms it was "to raise an Ebenezer of praise to the Giver of All Good for his gracious leading of the Church thus far." And specifically, "to place a memorial for Winebrenner in this his centennial year." It was proposed that contributions be made by all the churches during "the Harvest Home month," Thanksgiving, and during December, 1897. Elizabeth R. Gable, Ida Grove, Ia., formerly of Lancaster, Pa., was author of the project. It was during this period that the United Brethren Church perfected arrangements to celebrate its centennial, from September 25, 1899, to September 25, 1900. Because of the deep and abiding interest the churches of God always manifested in the temperance question, it could not but join in the world's sorrow over the death of Neal Dow, October 2, 1897. Dow and John B. Gough were the two most widely known men in this country whose fame rested mainly on their labors in behalf of the temperance cause, and the world's debt of gratitude was devoutly acknowledged. Then the brilliant evangelistic star of Dwight L. Moody was eclipsed by death on December 22, 1899. From him hosts of ministers had received inspiration in their labors as revivalists, and learned valuable lessons. He was one of God's chosen vessels of honor and power.

The interest in their own intellectual improvement and better equipment for their work was seen in the number of Ministerial Associations held each year. In 1895 seven were reported, with their programs. In 1896, fifteen. In 1897, eleven. In 1898, twelve. In 1899, sixteen. They served another great purpose—promoting a more general uniformity of views. This made them a bond of unity for the whole body, for not only were the same mooted questions under discussion at nearly all these gatherings, but conclusions reached did not differ materially. Then the community of thought fostered through the press was another great factor in preserving the unity of the churches. Thoughts are the parents of deeds, of character and of life. The Association was a better place than the Eldership to discuss those questions which the General Eldership handed down, or questions on which the annual Elderships and the churches were to act. The range of subjects was quite extensive. But no special propaganda seems to have been admissible. Any attempt to use an Association to exploit peculiar ideas was not tolerated. When the Christian Endeavor movement became most aggressive, early in 1895, different Associations discussed the Church's attitude toward it, and its inter-denominational character. The new ideas concerning feet-washing, such as its private observance, the separation of this rite from the Communion, refusing Communion to those who did not observe feet-washing, were sure to be on Ministerial Association programs. In connection with the so-called "divine healing" was also discussed the purpose, or design, of Christ's miracles. As the Church had no published standards of doctrine, it was becoming more important year after year to know "how to promote unity in preaching among the ministry." This suggested the placing of many doctrinal subjects on the programs. In all these the Bible was made the ultimate touchstone of orthodoxy, and all human authority was negligible. Elderships which held their Ministerial Associations immediately preceding their annual sessions not infrequently discussed questions in the Associations which were to be voted on in the Eldership. This was the case in 1895 with the subjects of Eldership titles, imposition of hands in ordination and life certificates. In only a few of the Associations was there a vote taken on any question under discussion, and no reports published of positions taken by the disputants, except in few instances. There is a seriousness in the subjects of the sixty-one Associations of these five years which impresses every reader of the programs. No capricious, fanciful, freak topics, such as too often appeared in pulpit announcements, can be found on these programs. During 1899 there were subjects discussed which evince a consciousness of the close of the century. Among these were: "When will the Millennium begin?" "How to attain a higher plane of spiritual life," "The Second coming of Christ," "Is the kingdom of heaven now here?" While the current discussion of Church union and federation is reflected in the question, "What defense have we for our distinct and separate organization as a Church?"

The camp-meeting fires were burning low at this time. Twenty-three camp-meetings in the territory of the General Eldership were held in these five years. One was held in Iowa, in 1896, 3½ miles south-east of Grandview; one in West Pennsylvania, near Butler, in 1896. Each year one was held at Linwood, Md. The balance were held at Conewago, Walnut Grove, Stoverdale, Central Manor and Mahantango Valley. At all these meetings only eighteen conversions were reported. They were considered "not successful" from that point of view. In too many instances they were regarded as Summer resorts, so that one, in 1895, was advertised as "by no means a pleasure resort." To others Christian people were invited for recreation, as preferable places for such a purpose than Summer resorts. The religious services and the preaching were, however, spoken of as spiritual and instructive, and the labors of the ministers were much appreciated and highly commended.

For Church ingatherings this was not a notable period. However, commendable and encouraging progress was made in different Elderships. On the Pacific Coast the borders were extended. J. F. Schoch was General Missionary, under appointment of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, during the greater part of this period. Organized work was carried on in California, where in 1895 R. P. Bushy, after receiving license from the Standing Committee, was laboring at Los Angeles. This part of the State was declared to be a part of the Oregon and Washington Eldership, and later the whole State. D. Keplinger and E. E. Cory also preached in southern California. In Oregon and Washington the work was pushed with energy, and was "in a fairly prosperous condition." Without giving the names, it was reported in the Fall of 1895 that "a number of churches were organized." Several additional counties were entered by missionaries. At Salem, Ore., there were two church organizations effected, one English and one French, with also some Germans. The building of a bethel under the labors of G. W. Kemp was determined upon in September, 1896. A lot was secured, and appeals made for funds. Two ministers were laboring in Salem in 1897, and seven in other sections of the territory. "Everything was encouraging all over the field spiritually." There was a great deal of "financial embarrassment" experienced. Most of the ministers were obliged to do manual work to support their families; but the Church was "gaining ground," so much so that in 1899 there were eleven fields of labor, two in California. J. W. Force had "prospects of organizing seven churches, and building at least one bethel." Mary E. Madill labored in Washington county, Ore., in 1897-8, and organized a church at Ray school-house. The great need was houses of worship, which the small churches organized did not have the means to build. In 1899 a mission was established in Tillamook county, Oregon, on the coast. Spokane Mission, in the eastern part of the State of Washington, was added to the fields of labor. The century closed with a hopeful outlook.

Despite the destitution resulting from the drouth, the work in Nebraska was pushed forward with commendable spirit. For four years A. Wilson was General Missionary, employed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, and O. S.

Kilmer the fifth year. Wilson was an experienced missionary, and he spared not himself in his energetic efforts to advance the cause. He also interested himself in the amelioration of the temporal condition of the suffering people. As conditions improved the prospects for successful Church work brightened. But 1895 was a discouraging year. A number of "organizations were scattered, and some became extinct." The Barada bethel was sold. No new territory was occupied. Work, however, was continued in the following counties: Gage, Saline, Clay, Polk, Sherman, Sheridan, Custer, Logan, Lincoln, Frontier, Furnas and Hitchcock. Holt county, in the northern part of the State was added in 1897-8. But several counties in which work had been done in earlier years do not appear on the Journals. On the territory still occupied conditions improved after the drouth. In 1896 there were numerous revivals, with many conversions. New churches were organized, and a few extinct ones were resurrected. Missionary societies were organized, and the sisters were actively engaged in this line of church work. In some of the churches Societies of Christian Endeavor were also formed. In 1897 there were fewer revivals, as also in 1898 and 1899. The money panic did not have much effect in Nebraska, outside of a few of the largest towns, and the revivals which so often accompany or follow financial and industrial depressions were not realized throughout the Eldership. There were, however, some churches organized in 1897, but no new territory added. The years 1898 and 1899 proved even "less prosperous, and not so much good was done." Custer county, in the center of the State, was at this time the "stronghold of the Church of God in Nebraska," the sections originally occupied in the south-eastern part of the State having lost ground. The building of houses of worship during this period was a difficult undertaking, and no reports of new bethels are on record. Services were held in school-houses and private dwellings. Some of these were sod houses. The Eldership on two occasions held its annual sessions in a sod school-house.

The Kansas Eldership in 1894 became enthusiastic over the proposition to carry on evangelistic work by means of tabernacle services in places where no churches of God had been organized. The tabernacle was bought before Spring of 1895, and had a seating capacity of 500 persons. J. C. Forncrook, General Worker for the State, was given the charge of the work. He had agreed to remain in Kansas one more year, and with his daughter Florence, and the assistance of other ministers, he entered upon the work. The success was less than was expected, the great and constant problem being the finances. Forncrook found that "the denominations in the towns visited would not contribute of their means to build up churches of God." The Board of Missions did not understand, or did not keep, its contract as understood by the Kansas authorities, and so there was insufficient support for tabernacle work. The Standing Committee in February, 1897, offered to sell the tabernacle to the Board of Missions of the General Eldership; but the offer could not be accepted. This foreshadowed other failures, so that at the General Eldership in 1899, the Standing Committee petitioned that body to release the Eldership from paying its delinquent assessments. The reason assigned was general: "In consequence of disaster to the Church work in Kansas, due to causes, largely, over which we had no control, thereby discouraging the workers." The work in Topeka also proved a depressing failure. The membership, by June, 1895, when F. F. Manchester took charge, had fallen below sixty. Meeting with some success at first, he soon found that existing conditions were too antagonistic to inspire confidence. Discouraged, he resigned the charge, and the Standing Committee in May, 1897, petitioned the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to take the work in hand. The Board's negative answer, with a statement of money it had paid to keep up the work, showed that it had dwindled to almost nothing. It had paid $100.00 in 1894; $300.00 in 1895; $400.00 in 1896, and $600.00 was asked in 1897. In September, 1896, the Eldership licensed Lizzie Dupree, a colored sister, who began mission work in Topeka. In October, 1897, she was appointed a general mission worker among the colored people in Topeka and elsewhere. She succeeded in organizing a small church in the city, and asked for the furniture of the house of worship of the white brethren for use in her mission house. But at some points success attended the labors of ministers, so that in 1898 there were ten fields of labor, 31 preaching places, 21 churches, 277 conversions, 194 accessions, and the pastors received $1,523.00 support. The missionary spirit was buoyant, and a State W. M. S. was kept actively at work; some local societies were organized, and the Eldership appointed two of its ministers, who had removed to Colorado, missionaries in that State. But the fields of labor were reduced from twelve circuits and two missions in 1895, to nine circuits and the two missionaries in Colorado in 1899. But some of the churches prospered, and some new ones were organized. A house of worship was built at Ozark, or Union Center, Crawford county, which was dedicated May 26, 1895, under the pastoral labors of W. H. Kepford. It cost $1,700.00, and was dedicated by J. C. Forncrook, assisted by W. T. Turpin. A bethel was built at New York Valley, Woodson county, where T. B. More was pastor. It was dedicated December 1, 1895, W. T. Turpin officiating. In Barber county, under the labors of W. H. Cross, a church-house was built during the Winter of 1896-7, and was dedicated February 7th. Cross had W. T. Turpin as assistant pastor. A parsonage in Rice county was sold "because there was no longer any use for it." It was located on Little River. The Harrison Chapel, after extensive repairs, was rededicated July 10, 1898. This was on W. H. Cross' field, and W. T. Turpin officiated at the dedication. J. W. Kingston, pastor at Fort Scott, officiated at a dedication at Geuda, 5 miles north of Ashton, in Sumner county, on June 26, 1898. T. B. More was the pastor. At Arma, Crawford county, on W. T. Turpin's field of labor, the corner-stone of a new bethel was laid November 19, 1898. The work was carried to completion during the Winter, and on April 30, 1899, the dedication took place, W. H. Cross preaching the sermon. In the evening the ordinances were observed.

After the Indian Territory was separated from the Texas and Arkansas Eldership, in 1892, it was always associated ecclesiastically with Oklahoma Territory, until it lost its identity in the State of Oklahoma. The latter was opened to settlement in 1889. It is "the beautiful land," with a climate said to be delightful most of the year. And while both the beauty and fertility of the Territory were exaggerated, yet it has always been regarded as a very desirable place for settlement. And when it was thrown open for settlement Church of God families and a few ministers from Texas, Arkansas, Kansas and States eastward as far as Pennsylvania emigrated thither and secured Government land. It thus became good missionary territory, and along with the Indian Territory became a promising mission field. In 1895 E. M. Kirkpatrick was appointed by the General Eldership Board of Missions to the Indian territory, and enjoyed some successful revival meetings. At the same time B. Ober was preaching at two regular appointments in Custer county, Oklahoma. In September, 1895, he "completed a good sod house, 18x30 feet, covered with shingles, for use as a church and school-house." There were other ministers who did efficient work, so that in the Fall of 1895 eleven organized churches, with eight fields of labor, were reported in the two Territories. In 1896 Kirkpatrick labored among the Cherokee Indians; in 1897 he was again General Missionary in the Indian Territory, J. W. Riddle and B. Ober, in Oklahoma. In 1898 Ober was missionary in southern Oklahoma; J. C. Caswell, in northern Oklahoma, and Kirkpatrick, in the Indian Territory. The year 1896, with one exception, showed good results. Churches were organized at Shady Grove, Nelson school-house; Dripping Spring and Timpered Ridge, Creek Nation; at Illinois Station; near City of David and Five Points, Cherokee Nation, and Mud Springs, Choctaw Nation. The church at Sallisaw Bethel, Indian Territory, became extinct, and the house of worship was sold. In 1897 churches were organized at Salt Creek and Adel, Lincoln county, Oklahoma; Wanetta and Pleasant Valley, Oklahoma, and at South Bethel, Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory. The work was less successful in 1899, so that reports were meager. In 1898 the cause suffered a serious check in the death of J. W. Riddle, at Wanetta, Oklahoma. He was one of the most earnest and active missionaries in the employ of the General Eldership Board of Missions. He was converted in 1867, and united with the Missionary Baptist Church, by which he was ordained in 1874. In 1877, while laboring as a missionary for the Missionary Baptist Church he heard G. T. Bell expound the doctrines of the Church of God, and was converted to the faith, and at once became an aggressive missionary of the Church. Dissensions arose among the churches in Oklahoma over ordinances, church organization and doctrine. "Non-ordination, non-organization and second work of grace heresies are held among them," was the charge. And some of the churches suffered loss, and were weakened, before these teachers of error could be separated from them. In Texas the prospects were not encouraging. In Arkansas, in 1895, "the religious interest in the northern and southern parts of the territory was not good." But in the central part prospects were brighter. One church was organized in Montgomery county, and one at Mt. Olive, in Logan county. Thirteen ministers preached regularly for the churches of the Eldership. In 1896 a church was organized at Friendship, Scott county; one at Mountain Home, Garland county; one at Rose Creek, Perry county, and one at Shady Grove, Washington county. There was less work done during 1897-9, when it was conceded that "religion is at a very low ebb throughout our bounds," and, "The cause of Christ seems to be languishing." Only a few churches were organized during these years, and some were unsupplied; yet there were thirteen fields of labor in 1898. The colored churches and ministers in Arkansas were active, and the "outlook was good in every respect." There were too many preachers for the number of churches and members, and it did not promote active co-operation, nor efficiency of service.

In Missouri conditions during this period were somewhat cloudy and unsettled. The assistance extended to the work was confined to the years 1897-9, during which several general missionaries were in the employ of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. In 1896 H. W. Allen was the appointee for southern, and W. H. Hickman for northern, Missouri. This arrangement was continued in 1898. In 1899 G. L. Bowman was the missionary of the Board in Gentry and Sullivan counties. The success of Mrs. Woodworth in St. Louis gave quite a degree of inspiration to the brotherhood in the State. She had organized a church which by January, 1895, numbered five hundred, with a fine house of worship. H. H. Spiher had become pastor, and there was a closer bond of fellowship with the Southern Indiana Eldership than with the Missouri Eldership. On January 1, 1895, joined by Spiher and a few officials of the church, offered to the Standing Committee of the Southern Indiana Eldership a transfer of the church (but not the bethel) to said Eldership. This offer the Committee accepted, and so St. Louis became identified with the Southern Indiana Eldership. In 1897 F. T. Shore applied for, and received, license from the Standing Committee of the Southern Indiana Eldership, and at the same meeting of the Committee, with forty-two others, requested to be organized as the Second Church of God in St. Louis, or the "Park Avenue Church of God." It was so organized on January 6, 1897, and also became a church of the Southern Indiana Eldership. The work in the State was greatly impeded, and became burdensome to the ministry, by inadequate financial resources. There were fourteen charges in 1895, but three of them were unsupplied. And of the same number in 1896, five were unsupplied. By 1899 fields of labor had to be reduced by consolidation to ten, and then not all the churches had pastors. The churches, too, under this arrangement could not be served to good advantage, as they were so widely scattered as to make the work arduous and less fruitful. In a measure to overcome these unfavorable conditions general workers were appointed. In 1896 P. L. French was Eldership General Evangelist. In 1897, with "religious conditions fairly prosperous," J. B. Murphy was the General Evangelist, and H. W. Allen and W. H. Hickman, State Missionaries. In 1898 it was alleged that "there is an indisposition on the part of ministers to be active, and to put forth efforts to revive the work." But eight ministers were ready to engage in the active work as pastors of fields of labor, leaving some of the churches unsupplied. These conditions account for the fact that Church extension work languished; few, if any, new organizations were effected, and there were no new enterprises inaugurated. However, the sisters were active. In 1896 they organized an Eldership Woman's Missionary Society, and were quite active during the following three years, encouraged in 1899 by the State Missionary, H. W. Allen, and the General Evangelist, Thomas Scott.

While there was a church of God at Canton, South Dakota, of which H. L. Soule was pastor, neither he nor his church would unite with the Iowa Eldership. Their partly-finished brick bethel was used for services in 1898, and A. E. Keppord and D. S. Guinter conducted a successful meeting toward Spring. Soule had become "independent," following tendencies manifested while in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and objected to all forms of ecclesiastical organizations above the local church. Guinter lived in Canton, but as a member of the Iowa Eldership he served the Spirit Lake charge, Iowa, in 1898.

Conditions in some sections of Kentucky and Tennessee were favorable for Church work. Through the efforts of G. L. Chapman, of Missouri, and ruling elders T. G. Ferguson and R. M. Chapman, of Kentucky, a church numbering seventy-five members was organized at Ivy Hill, Ky. It had built a good country bethel, but had no pastor. It conducted prayer-meetings and a Sabbath-school, and held ordinances services. At Nashville, Tennessee, L. B. Shannon and his church organized themselves into a church of God. They, however, did not hold fast to the faith, and "some of them went off to the Pentecostal People; part of them went into other Churches, while several remained faithful, and stood alone for the Church of God."

A hopeful and somewhat aggressive spirit prevailed in Iowa during this period. The evangelistic services in 1895 and 1896 seem to have had an inspiring effect. A tent was used during the Summer and early Fall. Some of these meetings were sensational. Francis A. Sharp and George Stone pitched the tent two miles north of Columbus Junction the first week in September, 1895, and "had a grand meeting from the beginning," with "powerful results." "A number at different services fell under the power." The result was the organization of a church of thirty-five members. Sharp organized a church at River Junction. The tent used had a seating capacity of three hundred. In 1896 similar tent services were held by Mrs. M. Sutliff, State Evangelist. Her methods and preaching were similar to those of Mrs. Woodworth. At a point known as "The Valley," assisted by Clara Landes, she held protracted services in 1896 with good success. With the use of the "Tabernacle" she also held what was known as "the Donavan camp," at which eighty-two converts were reported. The Eldership, and especially the faithful church at North Bend, Johnson county, were always cherishing an ardent expectation of seeing the Church of God firmly established in Iowa City. To this end the North Bend church was ready to make sacrifices. In the Summer of 1895, N. Zeller, S. Green, M. Snively and J. Snively, of North Bend church, bought a brick house of worship, 60x35 feet, in Iowa City, for the use of the church. Under William Burch, pastor, the house was prepared for dedication, and appropriate services were held August 4th, when L. F. Chamberlin preached. Then in Muscatine, under the labors of Chamberlin, they enjoyed a rich harvest of souls in 1896, when there were seventy-two conversions. It was quite a successful year. Churches were organized at Spirit Lake, Glidden and Mikeville, and were received into the Eldership in September, 1896. Especially in Carroll county was the work prospering. Mrs. Woodworth and Emma Isenberg had conducted revival services in Carroll county, a few years earlier. Their efforts were followed by the labors of J. K. Nelson, W. H. Kepford and E. W. Moyer, who cared for the converts and presided over the churches organized. At Glidden, with a church numbering 115, a Bethel was built, costing $2,500.00, which was dedicated June 28, 1896, J. C. Kepford officiating, assisted by G. W. Elliott and J. K. Nelson. The church at Carroll now numbered 150, and the one at Dedham 40. The latter erected a new house of worship in 1898, costing $1,500.00, under the labors of W. H. Kepford. It was dedicated August 14th by E. W. Moyer. In Cedar county, at a point known as Green Grove, a Bethel built "over thirty years ago" was replaced by a new house in the Summer of 1896, which was dedicated November 29th by G. W. Elliott. The devoted pastor was E. E. Heltibridle. The church located three and one-half miles south-east of Grandview, Louisa county, which had worshiped in a school-house, in the Summer of 1897 built "Lone Tree Chapel," which C. Manchester dedicated August 27th. I. Ossman, pastor; George Stone and D. Long assisted in the services. The latter was pastor of the Newburg charge, where rededicatory services were held September 4, 1898. In Calhoun county the work was in charge of J. W. Ault. A new house of worship was built in 1898, at Twin Lake, which was set apart for divine worship on September 15th. The morning sermon was preached by J. C. Fornbrook; the evening sermon by D. S. Guinter. The Eldership year 1897-8 was characterized by "good progress," and "four new churches were organized, and the membership has been materially increased." The first church organized in Des Moines had been received into the Eldership by the Standing Committee on November 13, 1895; but it did not secure title to the church property until December, 1898. At the Eldership in 1898, L. H. Belles reported the organization of the second church in Des Moines, located in South Des Moines. G. W. Elliott organized a church at Omega Center. In 1899 a Bethel was built in Wright county, and one or two in other localities. New church organizations were also reported. The Bethel in Wright county, near Galt, was built by "the few brethren and sisters living there," some of them of the Wilson family, as "a son of A. Wilson, and his brother-in-law, Jay Bowington, and their wives, who were the prime movers. In the latter part of December, 1899, A. Wilson officiated at the dedication. At the close of the year 1899 the total number of churches in the Eldership was 44; houses of worship, 32; membership, 1,610; fellowshipped during the year, 131.

While in Illinois "the outlook was encouraging," and "the churches generally in good spiritual condition," yet the rate of progress was very slow during the present period. At a few points the work retrograded. At Streator, in September, 1895, the church property was on the market, as the church had been disbanded. The mission work at Mendota had to be abandoned, and the property sold. Still "the interest in Church work was good," and at the close of the year 1896 not only did "general harmony prevail," but among the churches there was "reasonable advancement." This year the church lot of the old Union Bethel, in Clarke county, was sold, and the proceeds were applied toward the erection of a new bethel, which was dedicated on November 15, 1896, under the labors of F. K. Mansfield. The preaching on the occasion was by D. H. Rupp and C. F. Rogers. In 1897 a new bethel was built at Frederick, Schuyler county, which was dedicated on June 6th. It was a newly organized church, the fruits of a revival held during the Winter by C. A. Schaaf. C. F. Rogers preached the sermons on the day of the dedication, the evening sermon being followed by an ordinance meeting. Rogers also officiated at the dedication, on Sabbath morning, at Hildreth, in Edgar county, August 8, 1897. The pastor, F. K. Mansfield, preached on Saturday evening, and W. R. Johnson on Sabbath afternoon and evening. There was quite a missionary spirit in the Eldership, which deepened following the departure of Clara Landes to India. But it did not manifest itself in Church extension work in the State. Between $400.00 and $500.00 was raised annually, divided equally between frontier and Illinois Mission Funds. The Illinois Fund was used to assist in supporting pastors on weak charges, there being no mission fields so designated by the Stationing Committees of the different sessions of the Eldership. The number of fields of labor varied, there being twenty in 1895; twenty-three in 1896; twenty-one in 1897; twenty in 1898, and nineteen in 1899. Part of this period the Eldership kept a general missionary in the field. It was maintained there were four prevailing causes of weakness in the churches, to wit: 1. Admitting unconverted persons into fellowship. 2. Lack of discipline. 3. Worldliness. 4. Insufficient support of pastors.

In the Michigan Eldership both the temporal and spiritual interests seemed in a state of declension in 1895-1900. While at times the "outlook was hopeful," yet most of the period seemed unfruitful. Ministers spoke of "the isolated and discouraged condition of many of our brethren in the Eldership," and of the "need of earnest and faithful and honest laborers," as also of "the conditions in our Eldership" as not being good. The number of charges varied from thirteen in 1895 to nine in 1899. In 1895 one new church was organized, with nine members, and the total number of accessions to the churches during the year was reported to have been 138. In 1898 another new church was organized; fifty-one were baptized during the Eldership year 1897-8, and forty-four received into fellowship. In other years the reports indicated that "some advancement in the work was made during the year." Quite an interest developed in 1895, and was maintained during the following years, in the work of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Eldership. At Benton Harbor a new bethel was built by the church, as before that they worshiped in rented rooms, and "labored under great disadvantage." "A neat and respectable building was erected" during the Winter of 1897-8, and was dedicated March 27, 1898. J. Bumpus, of Indiana Eldership, preached on the occasion, assisted during the day by J. E. Moffit and the pastor, J. R. Onaweg. At Seville Center, Gratiot county, work was started on a new house of worship, and the corner-stone was laid on July 8, 1899. S. S. Teed was the pastor, and he arranged for preaching on the occasion for Saturday evening, Sabbath morning and evening, followed by an ordinance meeting on Sabbath evening. The new bethel at the Spencer appointment, in charge of D. L. Wiles, Mt. Calm county, was dedicated late in November, 1899. W. J. McNutt was the preacher on the occasion.

The Indiana Eldership regarded the "prospects for the Church within its borders brightening, and the churches growing in strength numerically and spiritually." There were nine fields of labor in 1895, and the same number in 1899. During the ecclesiastical year ending October, 1899, there were 156 conversions reported, 70 baptized and 149 received into fellowship. One church property was sold in 1896, located at River Dam. Sunday-school work was zealously carried on, and a healthy interest developed in the work of the Woman's Missionary Society. At Lockwoods, DeKalb county, four miles south of Auburn, a new bethel was erected, under the pastoral labors of George E. Komp, which was dedicated August 11, 1895, by W. W. Lovett. Under Komp's labors another bethel was projected and work begun, at Helmer, Steuben county. The house was finished under M. S. Hemminger's pastorate, and was dedicated on December 22, 1895, by M. S. Newcomer. The Mt. Tabor bethel was built during the Summer of 1898, under the labors of E. Tatman. The dedicatory services began on Saturday evening, August 13th, with a sermon by George E. Komp. On Sunday morning J. E. McColley, Jr., preached, and in the evening J. W. Bloyd. The bethel at Collamer, Whitley county, after extensive alterations and repairs, was rededicated January 1, 1891. The pastor was J. W. Bloyd.

In the Southern Indiana Eldership there was a decidedly deteriorating tendency manifested during this period. Under the stimulating influence of several strong personalities there were surface indications of revived vitality; but the blighting effect of the reaction which followed the Woodworth revival wave could be discerned everywhere. In 1895 there were eleven fields of labor; in 1899 there were seven. Reports from some of the fields in 1896 showed "a gain in membership," and in 1897 and 1898 "the state of religion was in a reasonably fair condition, and a few were saved." In 1896 the church property at Curtisville was sold. The church at Anderson in 1898 had become so weakened that an appeal was made to the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to appoint a missionary to Anderson, Greensburg and Williamstown. The mortgage on the Anderson property was foreclosed and its sale finally effected. The Board of Incorporation of the General Eldership in 1897, in order to save the property at Muncie, proposed to assume the debt of $1,500.00, on certain conditions. As these were not complied with, the church building, costing about $10,000.00, fell into the hands of creditors, and was ultimately sold to the United Brethren Church.

A hopeful spirit, based on reliant faith, pervaded the atmosphere in the Ohio Eldership during this period. Results of persistent endeavors to advance the various interests of the Church may not always have vindicated this faith; but it gave courage and fortitude for the labors and sacrifices demanded. The greatest miracles are wrought by faith. Decisive victories on the battlefields of the world were won by the faith of generals in themselves and their soldiers. Geniuses have penned their most wondrous poetry or worked marvels with the brush or chisel by faith in their ability to create masterpieces. Yet the net outcome viewed at this distance is not so inspiring. Several new houses of worship were built, but fewer were reported in 1899 than in 1895. The south-east corner of the State of Michigan was included within the boundaries of the Ohio Eldership. Here C. N. Belman opened an appointment in 1893, and organized a church at Ottawa Lake, or Pleasant Hill. During the Fall and Winter of 1894 the young church, under Belman's labors, erected a bethel, "on the county line north of Ottawa Lake and south of Deerfield, Mich." It was dedicated January 20, 1895, by W. N. Yates. The work at Fostoria, Seneca county, Ohio, where Mrs. Woodworth had quite a revival, was making irregular progress. In 1895 it was in charge of G. A. Bartlebaugh, when the work of building a bethel was started. The church was financially weak, and in April, 1895, it received permission to canvass the Eldership territory for funds to build, on the condition that the property be deeded to that body. The corner-stone was laid September 7, 1895, when M. S. Newcomer preached. But becoming financially embarrassed, the work was hindered, so that in November, 1897, T. Koogle was appointed to look after the financial interests. The creditors threatening to foreclose, a committee of the Eldership was named to visit them, which succeeded in having the claims quieted, and the work was resumed under the labors of E. Poling as pastor. He was succeeded by W. P. Small, under whose supervision the work was completed, and the house was dedicated on June 23, 1901, G. Sigler officiating. The church, however, had worshiped in the building during several years previous to the dedication. A bethel was built at Durbin, Mercer county, during the Summer of 1895, under the labors of L. Rothrock. It was dedicated by W. N. Yates on September 15, 1895. The bethel at Madison, or Basswood appointment, was old and dilapidated, and the church, having no pastor during the year 1896, decided to build a new one. The Eldership donated "the old house which was at West Liberty," and the new bethel was finished when in the Fall of 1896 J. F. Slough became pastor. It was dedicated by Charles Manchester on January 9, 1897. He also dedicated the new bethel at Olive Branch, on the Belden appointment, where J. A. Witham was pastor, on August 29, 1897. The building, besides gratuitous labor, cost $1,300.00. A house of worship, afterward known as "Scott Bethel," was bought in 1899, which was repaired and remodeled, and dedicated August 27, 1899. The services of J. A. Witham were secured for the dedication, by the pastor, S. S. Hunter. Mrs. Anna G. Witham also "preached during this meeting." An effort was made in 1898-9 to renew Church work at Mansfield, Richland county. On February 24, 1898, T. W. Bellingham was sent there by the Standing Committee "to work up the interest in Mansfield." During his pastorate he secured the services of C. B. Fockler, with his tent. The effort was successful, as thirty-seven converts were reported, and twenty-seven believers were baptized. These desired to be organized into a church. Two church properties were ordered to be sold, and two church lots: The Evergreen Bethel, January 15, 1896; the Ferguson Bethel, December 7, 1898; the "ground at the Blanchard Bethel," and the lot at West Auburn. The membership varied, according to the Eldership statistics. In 1895 the number reported is 2,781; in 1896, 2,528; in 1897, 2,758; in 1899, 2,598. In 1895 there were 75 churches, 86 houses of worship, 838 conversions, 640 accessions, 398 baptized, and aggregate salaries, $8,149.00. In 1896 there were reported 58 churches, 730 conversions, 572 accessions, 320 baptized, and aggregate salaries, $8,583.00. The statistics for 1897 give 71 churches, 758 conversions, 612 accessions, 191 baptized, and aggregate salaries, $6,497. In 1899 there were 75 "churches and preaching points," 76 bethels, 507 conversions, 360 accessions, 183 baptized, total salaries, $6,847.00. During 1899 mission work was carried on at Scott, Lima and Delphos. The two churches at Canton were consolidated.

In the West Pennsylvania Eldership much effective work was done between 1895 and 1900 to give greater stability and permanence to the churches, and to develop a steady interest in all forms of Church activity. The organization of Woman's Missionary Societies and Christian Endeavor Societies in the local churches received special attention. Systematic plans for raising funds for local and general use were matured and put into effect. The numerical increase of membership was, however, slow, although the churches enjoyed revivals, and additions were relatively numerous. But the net growth was very small. Some years the aggregate membership even decreased, so far as reports indicate. Thus in 1896 there were 2,482 members; in 1897, 2,389. The number of churches was the same in both years. The number of converts reported in 1896 was 563; in 1897, 648. Baptized in 1896, 281; in 1897, 349. The number of accessions in each of these two years was 463. Salaries paid in 1896, $7,454.00; in 1897, $8,044.00. The number of charges varied from 26 in 1895, to 29 in 1899. There were eight new houses of worship built and dedicated, increasing the number from 42 to 50. At Markleysburg, Fayette county, where T. Woods was pastor in 1895, a new house of worship was built jointly by the church of God and the Baptist church. It cost $1,640.00, and was dedicated on August 18, 1895. J. C. Cunningham preached on Saturday evening; Rev. Wood, Baptist, on Sabbath morning, and J. Smith Marple, on Sabbath evening. The church at Bagdad, Westmoreland county, had been organized in a school-house, January 4, 1895, by George D. Statler. He began preaching there about a year previous. The newly organized church at once decided to build a small bethel, with a seating capacity of 150. It was finished, and ready for dedication on August 25, 1895. The pastor delivered the first sermon, on the evening of the 24th; D. A. Stevens preached on Sabbath morning, and H. H. Spier, on Sabbath evening. The house of worship, known as "Mt. Nebo Bethel," Fayette county, was dedicated August 16, 1896, by S. G. Yahn. The donation of two acres of ground for the building and cemetery was made by George Craig. The pastor to whose arduous labors the success of this work was largely due was S. P. P. Young. At Hill View, Fayette county, where S. P. P. Young was pastor, Lovina Gesecky donated two acres of land on which to build a house of worship. It was ready for dedication on December 27, 1896, when Young preached on Saturday evening and Sabbath morning, and W. B. Elliott on Sabbath evening. At Claridge, Westmoreland county, under the labors of W. B. Elliott, a bethel was built in the Summer and Fall of 1896, with a seating capacity of 250. It was dedicated on January 1, 1897, when W. H. McKlveen preached on Saturday evening from Matt. ii. 2, and on Sabbath morning from Ps. lxxxiv. 11. Elliott preached in the afternoon, and McKlveen again in the evening, after which the ordinances were observed. The church in Pittsburg always had a precarious existence, and was finally disbanded where it had maintained a struggling existence for many years. W. H. McKlveen began work in the city in 1893, and in 1894 a location was secured in the East End, where services were conducted in a Hall. In 1895 steps were taken to build, ground having been bought on the corner of Spahr and College avenues. The bethel was completed, with a parsonage attached, at a cost of $14,000. It was dedicated on October 4, 1896. At Jacob's Creek a new bethel was built during the Winter of 1897-8, under the pastoral labors of W. B. Elliott. It was dedicated on May 22, 1898, S. G. Yahn officiating in the morning, and R. L. Byrnes, in the evening. The Mt. Tabor Bethel, Fayette county, was built in the Summer of 1898, under the labors of S. P. Fulton. S. G. Yahn preached the dedicatory sermon on September 25, 1898, and was assisted in the services during the day by the pastor, and by James Means, J. C. Boyd and W. S. Sanners.

The value of hope has been stated forcibly in these words: "The greatest thing which any one of us can give to any other of us is hope; the next greatest thing is that courage which enables us to labor toward the realization of that hope; the next greatest thing is formulated knowledge which will help us to thus labor with intelligence." Through some agency the ministers and churches were inspired to work hopefully in building up and extending the cause in the West Virginia Elderships. And yet at this distance the results of their labors year after year were not the most encouraging. In the building of houses of worship the public record is almost barren. A union house, costing $600.00, was built by the church of God and the Methodist church at Liberty, Putnam county, and dedicated August 29, 1897. The morning sermon was preached by Rev. Alley, of the M. E. Church; the afternoon and evening sermons, by T. Woods, of the Church of God. During the day, owing to the large crowds, the services were held in the grove adjoining the bethel. At Blairsville, Ohio, West Virginia Eldership, North, under the labors of S. M. Parry, a new bethel was built in the Summer of 1898. It was dedicated by B. D. Edeh on December 11th. This Eldership at different times found an independent, or insubordinate, spirit developing among churches. The Constitution empowered the Standing Committee to suspend a church for this offense. Accordingly on January 1, 1898, said Committee "suspended the church at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, from the Eldership until May 8, 1898, or until the church agrees to be governed by the Eldership or the Standing Committee." The church availed itself of its rights, and appealed to the General Eldership. Fortunately the matter was amicably adjusted at the Eldership in the Fall of 1898. Two church properties in the West Virginia Eldership, North, were sold. One at Metz's Crossing, in 1897, and one at Green Valley, in 1898. The boundaries of circuits were so frequently changed that it was difficult to induce churches to build parsonages. The matter received special attention in 1895, and the Eldership was petitioned to make boundaries more permanent. The territory of this Eldership was "large, and much of it unoccupied, so that it was customary to appoint general missionaries, or general evangelists, to labor on unoccupied territory." The fields of labor were, however, not increased in number, though some of them were enlarged. Thus there were twelve circuits, with thirty preaching points, in 1895; while in 1898 there were only nine. The number of conversions in both Elderships was quite large in proportion to the membership. In 1897 a total membership in the Southern Eldership was reported of 368; fellowshipped, 201; salaries, $432.59 on the eleven fields of labor. In 1898 the number of conversions in the Northern Eldership was 228; fellowshipped, 214; total salaries, $1,124.83. The "price of each sermon," the Clerk naively recorded, "was 91 cents." The usual disparity in the number of conversions, or fellowshipped, and the number baptized is seen in this Eldership. In 1898, when 214 were fellowshipped only 93 were baptized. The West Virginia Eldership, South, had eleven fields of labor in 1895, which were reduced to eight in 1898, and increased by one in 1899. There was aggressive missionary work done, as a general evangelist or missionary was kept in the field, who organized local missionary societies and preached on the mission circuits. There were four missions in 1897. The total number of preaching places in the Eldership was as high as forty.

During this period the Maryland and Virginia Eldership sustained some irreparable losses in the deaths of several ministers and the removal of a few to other Elderships. Some of the fields of labor could not be supplied satisfactorily, and the progress of the cause was retarded. In 1895 there were ten fields of labor, with at least thirty-four preaching places. In 1899 there were eleven appointments, but no increase in the number of preaching points. The largest number of places designated for pastors to preach at was in 1896, when there were thirty-six. Under the labors of A. W. Philhower a church of thirty members was organized at Rocky Springs, and a bethel was built in 1896, at a cost of $600.00. It was dedicated November 22, 1896, when S. J. Montgomery preached one sermon from Eph. ii. 19-22, and one from II. Chron. xxix. 31. An ordinance meeting was held in the evening. This church was received into the Eldership, upon report of a committee, in the Fall of 1896. T. B. Tyler was doing substantial work in Washington county, Maryland, and Franklin county, Pa., part of which was included in his circuit. Under his labors a bethel was built at "The Corners," Franklin county, Pa., which was dedicated January 1, 1899, by S. J. Montgomery and A. W. Philhower. Also at Blair's Valley, under Tyler's supervision, a house of worship was erected in the Summer of 1899, which was dedicated by G. H. Bowersox and J. W. Kipe on October 22, 1899. In 1897 a church was organized at Cotoclin, which was formally recognized by the Eldership of 1897. The Eldership had for years been desirous to have work inaugurated in Williamsport, on the Potomac river. There was regular preaching at Harper's Ferry, which, like Williamsport, had acquired notoriety during the Civil War; but the project of establishing a church in the latter town had hitherto met with little success. However, on September 3, 1899, the hopes of the Eldership were realized, when T. B. Tyler organized a church of God in the Town Hall, which was rented for a term of years. He set forth in plain, clear terms the doctrines of the Church of God before organization was effected. At the Eldership in 1899 this church was received. The Eldership gave much attention to mission work and the organization of a Woman's Missionary Society, and a number of local societies were organized. Nearly every year a general missionary was appointed, J. A. Saxton serving in that capacity several years.

Whether there was a general receding wave of prosperity in the Christian Church could not be conceded, judged by a purely mathematical standard. But there were not wanting evidences at the close of the century that the era of the most marked advancement in Church growth in America, as in Europe, was past. The proportion of Church members to the total population was so large that slower progress was inevitable. Perhaps, too, the old proverb was being realized, that "the sun will put out the fire." Worldly prosperity added fuel to the fire of love of the world, and the love of God and worldly love can not stand together in intense degree. In East Pennsylvania during the last semi-decade of the century, like in the other Elderships, there was less accomplished than during some earlier periods. No new territory was occupied. Progress consisted in the growth of local organizations, the increased activity of societies, the intellectual advancements made by the ministry, the formation of several new churches, the building of nine new bethels and the repairing, enlarging and remodeling of at least twelve church houses. A new and prosperous church was organized at New Cumberland, Cumberland county, and a mission church was organized in Dover Hall, Philadelphia, but it was short-lived. At Central Manor, Lancaster county, a thriving church was formed in 1895, largely the fruit of the Central Manor Camp-meetings. The church at Washington Borough deservedly received the credit for building a house of worship for this new church, which was considered its ward. It was built in the Summer of 1895, Ira A. MacDannald being the energetic pastor, at a cost of $1,500.00, and was dedicated August 4th. The morning sermon was delivered by C. H. Forney; the afternoon, by H. Whitaker, and the evening by C. I. Brown. The rededication of the bethel at Lisburn, Cumberland county, took place September 8, 1895, when J. W. Deeshong officiated. Wm. Palmer was pastor. In 1895 F. L. Nicodemus secured Dover Hall, Marshall street, Philadelphia, for religious worship. He "organized a mission on the first Lord's day in November," and at once began Sunday-school work. The pastor regarded the enterprise a "success, and its future bright." A church was organized before New Year, and all the arrangements made for permanent church growth. But it was decreed otherwise, Nicodemus, as another "warrior knight of Christian fame," prior to the ides of March, 1896, fell mortally wounded. The church at Washington Borough, Lancaster county, dedicated its fine new house of worship on December 29, 1895, I. A. MacDannald being the worthy pastor. Preaching on the occasion by C. H. Forney, from Acts iv. 12. After "expending $495.00 on inside repairs," led by the faithful pastor, A. P. Stover, the church at Bainbridge reopened its bethel for divine services on September 27, 1896. C. I. Brown preached morning and evening, respectively from Luke xxiv. 32, and

Matt. xxii. 42. A new house of worship was built at Weishampel, Schuylkill county, in the Summer of 1896, under the pastoral labors of I. Hay. It was dedicated November 15th. In 1897 A. P. Stover was pastor at Mt. Carmel, Northumberland county. He at once agitated the project of building a new bethel, and on June 27th the corner-stone was laid by J. W. Deshong. The house was dedicated November 21, 1897, with D. S. Shoop, F. Y. Weidenhammer and the pastor occupying the pulpit, Shoop preaching the sermons, while Weidenhammer and E. Myers preached during the week following. Building and ground, including ground for parsonage, cost $3,800, toward which there was realized from sale of the old church property the sum of $1,500.00. After undergoing extensive repairs, the bethel at Wormleysburg, Cumberland county, was reopened on July 18th with appropriate services. C. H. Forney officiated at 10.30 a. m., and C. H. Grove, at 7.30 p. m. With J. M. Waggoner as pastor, the church at Progress, Dauphin county, repaired its bethel, which was rededicated September 5, 1897, C. H. Forney delivering an address on "Aggressive Christian Work." Having "undergone considerable repairing, both inside and outside," with C. C. Bartels as pastor, the church at Rohrerstown, Lancaster county, reopened its bethel September 12, 1897. The bethel at Auburn, Schuylkill county, after "considerable repairing, beautifying and cleansing," was rededicated September 5, 1897. E. Myers was the pastor. The Newburg, Cumberland county, bethel, where J. A. Staab was in charge, was rededicated September 26, 1897, by C. I. Behney. At Fairview, Lancaster county, a new house of worship was erected in the Fall of 1897, at a cost, including one and one-half acres of ground, of $1,217.36. The dedication services were held on December 19, 1897, when the sermons were delivered by Ira A. MacDannald. J. Berkstresser was the pastor. In Carlisle, Cumberland county, the resolute pastor of a small church of colored people, Alfred Young, determined to build a bethel for his people. The corner-stone was laid September 12, 1897, by C. H. Forney, who preached from Mark i. 38. "The neat brick structure" was completed at a cost of $850.00, and was dedicated December 12, 1897. The morning sermon was delivered by C. H. Forney, from Acts iv. 12. J. H. Esterline, of the First church; Rev. Holland, of the A. M. E. Church; Rev. McCord, of the Baptist Church, and Marshall Walker and J. W. Jones assisted the pastor during the day. Mission work at New Cumberland, Cumberland county, was placed in the care of the Board of Church Extension by the Eldership in 1897 and the pastor of the East York circuit, H. Whitaker. The Board, with its proficient President, F. W. McGuire, at once went to work, and on November 26, 1897, began to lay plans for the building of a church house. It enlisted the aid and co-operation of the Eldership Y. P. S. C. E. Union, and in the Spring of 1898 began the erection of the bethel, the corner-stone of which was laid July 24th, J. W. Deshong delivering an address based on Ps. lxxvii. C. H. Grove and H. F. Hoover assisted in the services. The house was finished and ready for the dedicatory services November 13th. On the evening of the 12th the church was organized, when C. C. Bartels delivered an address. On the 13th C. I. Brown preached at 10.30 a. m.; J. T. Fleegal, at 2.00 p. m., and T. H. McAfee, at 7.00 p. m. The most celebrated event in the building of church houses during this period was the erection of a commodious and costly bethel on Germantown avenue, Philadelphia, under the successful labors of W. N. Yates, pastor. The corner-stone was laid May 22, 1898, the address on the occasion being delivered by G. Sigler, who spoke on "Our Responsibilities Commensurate with our Opportunities." The dedicatory services were held December 4th, and "continued throughout the following week." The preaching was by former pastors, viz.: G. Sigler, 10.30 a. m., and B. F. Beck, 7.30 p. m., Sabbath; J. W. Miller, Monday evening; J. H. Esterline, Tuesday evening; "Temperance Rally," Wednesday evening; "Neighbors' Night," Thursday evening; Y. P. S. C. E. meeting on Friday night. The total cost of "building, furnishings and yard improvements" was $15,200.00, of which $7,200.00 was paid and subscribed by the end of dedication week, leaving a three-year mortgage of $8,000.00 on the property. O. J. Farling, a missionary of persistent energy, succeeded, with the co-operation of the small band of brethren, in repairing the house of worship at Mt. Olivet, York county, in the Spring of 1898. The dedication took place May 22nd, when J. W. Deshong preached the sermons. During the pastorate of J. A. Staab the house of worship at Sandy Hollow, Perry county, after extensive repairs, was "reopened for the service of God" on June 5, 1898. J. H. Esterline preached on the occasion. After "repairing and beautifying" the bethel at Columbia, Lancaster county, at a cost of $450.00, under the charge of T. H. McAfee, the reopening services were held on April 9, 1899. C. I. Brown preached at both services, using as texts 1 Sam. vii. 12, and 1 Chron. xxix. 3. On July 8, 1899, the church at Plainfield, Cumberland county, after expending $300.00 in improvements and repairs, rededicated its house of worship. The pastor, Wm. Palmer, was assisted in the services by J. H. Esterline and A. H. Long. The preaching at the reopening services at Landisville, Lancaster county, was by F. W. McGuire, pastor, in the morning, and I. A. MacDannald, in the evening.

The age of disputations and debates was about ended. Public debates were growing less in number year after year, and pulpits and press devoted less time and space to polemics, and more to the questions of practical piety. The first public debate of this period had this peculiarity, that the disputants were both members of the Church of God, and ministers in the same Eldership, viz.: G. M. Virgin and L. F. Murray. The debate was held at Red House, W. Va. Three resolutions were debated: "1. That in the resurrection there will be two classes, the sanctified and the justified." Virgin affirmed; Murray denied. "2. That the sanctified will be resurrected to immortality, eternal life, and the justified will be resurrected to life and placed on trial for eternal life." Virgin affirmed; Murray denied. "3. That infants, and all not included in the household of faith, will also be resurrected and placed on trial for eternal life." Virgin affirmed; Murray denied. A. Wilson accepted a challenge made by a "Seventh Day Adventist to debate the following proposition: 'Do the Scriptures teach that the first day of the week is the Lord's day, or Christian Sabbath?'" The Adventist was willing "to meet any man in Nebraska" on this question. The debate was held at Independence school-house, Frontier county, Neb., and began January 11, 1897, and continued five evenings. "Before the discussion was over Wilson had his opponent lying helpless at his feet." During the months of January and February, 1897, C. H. Forney and Rev. F. L. Kerr had a discussion in the "Penbrook Times," Penbrook, Dauphin county, Pa., on Infant Baptism. W. R. Covert, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, had a protracted debate with Moses Hull on Spiritualism, which he reported quite fully for The Advocate through the Winter of 1897-8. He denied the following: "That the phenomena and philosophy of modern spiritualism are in harmony with history, reason and the Bible." Covert possessed nearly every element of a successful debater, some of them not generally approved; but he was a disputant of strong powers, and delighted to be in the arena of controversy. On Monday evening, April 14, 1899, he began a debate with Rev. Wilfred M. Kellogg, of the Protestant Methodist Church, to "continue six evenings of two hours each." Covert affirmed that "John the Baptist immersed Jesus in the river Jordan." He denied that "Holy Ghost baptism is the only Christian Baptism." And he affirmed that "only those who have been born again, or received the Holy Spirit, and have been properly taught, are the true scriptural subjects of baptism." Covert was admirably equipped for such a debate, and won a signal triumph. In August, 1899, G. L. Chapman, of the Missouri Eldership, had a public debate with J. H. White, of the Primitive Baptist Church. The following resolution was debated: "Resolved, That salvation from sin, or eternal life, is unconditional on the part of man, and independent of the written or preached word of God." This Chapman denied, and upheld his denial with logical reasoning, reinforced with abundant quotations from Scripture.

Discussions in the columns of The Advocate were becoming increasingly unpopular. And that not because they occurred more frequently, were more prolonged, or more acrimonious; but because of a change in public sentiment. As a result, controversies were forbidden by the General Eldership in 1899. Prior to that the most prominent during this period were on Divine Healing, Ordination; Church Polity, Observance of Ordinances, Sanctification, the Mourners' Bench, the Christian Sabbath, the Millennium and Divorce. The advocates of Divine Healing, or Faith Healing, were not inclined to enter the arena of controversy; but testimony was given, with an occasional controversial article. It was one of those exceptional subjects which required little direct defense. The phenomena so often observed at religious services held by those who believed in divine healing weighed more than any labored argument. And it was a long-pending discussion, revived again and again during 1896, 1897 and 1898, but gradually subsided, and faith cures became largely discredited. The discussion of ordination with the laying on of hands was revived in 1896. In argument those in opposition usually had the advantage; but the natural human tendency to forms, liturgies and ceremonials can not be reached by argument. An ordination service is impressive, and argument was finally hushed by a practical compromise in the adoption by nearly all the annual Elderships of an ordination service minus the imposition of hands. For some possibly latent and unaffirmed reasons, questions pertaining to the ordinance of feet-washing were occasionally revived. Some always contended that it was a fact prophetic of an ultimate abandonment of the ordinance. Especially when one of three phases of the controversy were under discussion—the private observance of the ordinance, the spiritual nature of the service, or its parity with baptism as a rite to be observed but once by each believer. The advocates of these phases of the subject were generally held under suspicion. The discussion of sanctification was revived in 1897 and again in 1898. In the latter year the Christian Sabbath was discussed at considerable length owing to the persistent and aggressive activity of Seventh Day Adventists. The divorce question in 1899 was discussed with great interest by nearly all Churches, and was a prominent subject at Eldership sessions as well as in The Advocate. The State and National Governments were devising new legislation, and had appointed Commissioners on uniform divorce laws and reduction of the number of causes for which divorces were to be granted. The Canteen problem became a live issue in religious circles when Congress passed the Anti-Canteen Act. Army officers in many instances were strongly opposed to the measure, insisting that such legislation would not decrease drinking by soldiers, but would lead to conditions far worse than had previously existed. As a rule temperance advocates, and prohibitionists especially, could not dispassionately read, or listen to, arguments in favor of, or apologies for, the continuance of the Canteen, and resented the thought of a religious journal having the temerity to do so. Hence the discussions in these papers were often characterized with crimination and bitterness, which The Advocate did not wholly escape.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE year 1900 was one of the world's great review periods. It was a year of retrospect. When it was finally decided that it closed the nineteenth, and did not begin the twentieth, century, historical data of every description were explored and compared to determine the degree of progress which had been made. True, it was an artificial line of demarkation, for whether time be counted by seconds or by centuries, it is not done by the clock of our solar system. Time is a measured portion of infinite duration; measured by God's handiwork. It is poetic to say:

"Our Fathers' God! from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand."

The earth and sun measure the ceaseless flux of time, giving the rotations of day and night, the revolving seasons and the rounded year. But there is room for moons and decades, for semi-centennials and centennials. And much time was given by writers and public speakers during 1900 to measure the progress of the Church, the Nation, the world, the race. In some lines of inquiry the discovery was made that as population increases and becomes more dense, man is less governed by reason, and more by sense and suggestion. The psychology of the crowd reveals a tendency toward extravagant, irrational and nonsensical things; a disregard for established order, and a craving for novelties. It was observed that in this respect religion had lost much of its sacredness and solemnity. There was a large increase in Church membership, the total as reported in the Statistics of Religious Denominations in the United States being 26,971,933, or a little more than one in three of the whole population. There were 165,000 Christian ministers, who received about $100,000,000 in salaries. But Church growth was slow, and Church attendance disproportionate to the population. Compared with former years the spirituality of Churches was at a lower degree, and there was much barrenness. Organizations of a religious character, however, were constantly increasing, and there was a degree of activity never before witnessed. With it, unfortunately, came a tendency to lay less stress on Church doctrines, and to condone that skepticism touching fundamental doctrines which earlier would have been denounced as heresy.

Outside the Christian Church the progress of the century was marvelous. The testimony of publicists was to the effect, that the political changes wrought during the nineteenth century surpassed those of any other since the fall of Rome. In the field of invention and engineering achievements it could be seen at a glance that the century was pre-eminent over all others. Nearly all the developments in the science of chemistry, including analytical and synthetical chemistry and the chemical laws of definite proportions, are limited to the nineteenth century. In the line of adventure and exploration the history of the century reads like a romance. In literature, art, music and the fine arts generally the hundred years now ending witnessed a progress which is simply not to be measured. The material changes of the world in a hundred years are great beyond appreciation. The increase in population of the globe may be a matter of inference or deduction from the increase of the United States from less than 6,000,000 to more than 76,000,000; the United Kingdom from 16,000,000 to 39,000,000, and corresponding if not equal increases in other civilized lands. The moral advancement of the world as distinct from the religious and spiritual is a subject grateful to review. There are those who question it; but this is not reasonable when facts are marshalled in the presence of a true standard. Slavery has been abolished, prison reform has been effected, education has made immeasurable strides, law and justice have been more surely established upon their thrones, social relations have been imbued with light and charity and love. In fact there has been on every hand such a forward movement toward the realization of the universal brotherhood of man as a dozen centuries before had scarcely dreamed of or hoped to see. These are steps which unmistakably indicate "the sure progress of the world toward that day when 'comes the nobler Eden back to man,' and when 'springs the crowning race of humankind.'"

These were, however, not conditions which served to make the work of the churches of God and their ministry less difficult and more successful. While not reactionary in any sense, but partaking of the progressive spirit of the age, they were but little troubled with the liberal and rationalistic tendencies of the age. Here and there a church abandoned to some extent old methods and practices, or a minister now and then affected some leaning toward tenets of the New Theology; yet officially the body contended earnestly for the faith of the fathers. Rarely were there departures from the faith originally at the root of defections from the Church. Walls of partition are so low now they are virtually obliterated by the trailing vines and sweet-scented flowers of charity and brotherly love. With the hunger for large things, smaller bodies of Christians are under constant strain to maintain their separate entity. But a review of the work of the first semi-decade of the new century shows with what Christian patriotism and heroism they wrought for the cause to which they were consecrated. The increased interest in the reading of the Bible and Bible schools was first signaled by the introduction of Bible Readings. They became a regular thing at camp-meetings. Some of the Elderships abandoned their Ministerial Associations, notably East Pennsylvania. In a majority of the Elderships they were held the day before the annual session, with an occasional mid-year meeting. At least fourteen Elderships had Associations in 1900. Nearly all these continued during this whole period. Between the General Eldership of 1902 and 1905, more doctrinal questions were discussed, but always intermingled with questions of a practical nature. The old questions as to the subjects and design of baptism, the order of the ordinances, and their private observance; ordination, including that of ruling elders; the distinctive doctrines of the Church, and Rules of Co-operation were frequently on the programs. A number of topics were discussed in all the Associations. As occasionally a minister was ready to admit that "the Church of God has sister Churches," the question, "Is the Church of God a sect?" reappeared at different Associations. And so the allied question: "Are the churches of God apostolic organizations?" The contentions and troubles following the action of the General Eldership in 1902 with reference to the Woman's General Missionary Society gave occasion for the discussion of different phases of the subject at Association meetings. These even included the Legislative Powers of the Annual and General Elderships, the binding character of our Rules of Co-operation, as well as our missionary interests in general. In this line, too, was the question discussed by one Association in 1904: "Is the moral issue involved in the W. G. M. S. controversy of sufficient importance to justify the [former] W. G. M. S. in an effort it is making to maintain its position?" There were serious danger of so inflaming passions by these discussions as that the unity of the body became endangered. It however soon became evident that subjects of this character should be left for discussion by the Annual Elderships, if not largely by the General Eldership which had power to act in the premises. With the multiplication of church organizations the question of Departments of Church Work became an interesting topic. In the south-west the question of second-work sanctification, formal reception of persons into church fellowship and kindred questions were in order. Amusements were frequently in controversy as Christian people more and more engaged in, and frequented places of, worldly entertainments. It was a serious, practical question. Not remote from this was a revival of the old question of the adornment of the body. Vanity, pride and extravagance in dress in early years had been unreservedly denounced. But for years the pulpit and press were generally silent. Extremes to which the world went in bodily adornment, followed by the nominal church, created some alarm, and an effort was made to lead the more spiritual part of the churches to follow the inspired teachings on this subject. With the decrease in old-time revival work, the Associations not infrequently discussed "Evangelistic Work—Its Uses and Abuses." Also, "The Personality and Office Work of the Holy Spirit."

Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor Conventions received much attention. The interest in Sunday-school work was steadily maintained in all the Elderships, and a majority held annual Conventions. In connection with these, one day was usually devoted to Christian Endeavor work. Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Ohio and East Pennsylvania were most active in Christian Endeavor interests. In East Pennsylvania the Christian Endeavor Union, which had started a Christian Endeavor Church Extension Fund in 1898, continued its active work in this line, contributing annually toward new Church enterprises. As to camp-meetings, the exceptional ones require some notice. The Central Manor and Walnut Grove Camp-meetings had become permanent institutions. Results in the way of conversions were very limited. The Maryland camp-meeting, under the management of the Linwood Camp-meeting Association, was still held in 1900. In July, 1900, J. V. Smith, pastor, announced the beginning of "a camp-meeting at the Moore school-house, in a tent, by Mrs. M. B. Woodworth, in Naron township, Pratt county, Kans." The project of holding a camp-meeting near Elm Hall, Mich., in 1901, was changed into a grove meeting for want of sufficient encouragement. A camp-meeting under the supervision of J. H. Cummings, pastor, was held in September, 1902, at Blue Lick, Saline county, Mo. Tents were furnished by the management at $2.00 during the meeting. C. H. Ballinger, in July, 1904, held a camp-meeting at Stone Bluff, Creek Nation, I. T. "There were a number of conversions and five accessions to the church." One was baptized by Ballinger, "and others will be." The project of a General Eldership, or National camp-meeting, which had slumbered for many years, was revived by the Southern Indiana Eldership at its session held at Cross Roads Bethel, Greene county, Ind., October, 1902, when a resolution was adopted "favoring the organizing of a National Camp-meeting and 'Chautauqua,' or 'Forum,'" and inviting "sister Elderships to join in with us."

Pentecostal meetings, long waning, were the exception, and gradually ceased during this period. One was held at Pleasant Valley, Ill., in 1900, and one under direction of the Standing Committee in Southern Indiana. In 1901 the Mt. Carroll church held one, and in 1902, the church at Lanark. In 1903 the small church in Stony Creek Valley, Dauphin county, Pa., was the only church which held this special service.

The period was not fruitful in conversions, except in isolated cases. This fact was general. It was lamented especially by the revival Churches. It is indicated by the statistics. No accurate statistics for all the Elderships are available, but those of Elderships which are measurably accurate show a small per cent. of increase in the membership. The total increase of membership of all the Churches in the United States in 1901 was reported at 929,675; but relatively small as this increase was, much of it was attributed to a large abnormal growth of the Catholic Church. This seems to be confirmed by the total gain in 1902, which was but 403,743. Seven denominations reported an aggregate loss of 44,326. Dr. H. K. Carroll, who prepared "The Statistics of the Churches of the United States" annually for "The Christian Advocate," New York, gives the following figures for the churches of God: 1901—ministers, 460; churches, 580; communicants, 38,000. He gives the same figures for 1904, making the gains and losses balance each other. There are three special reasons for these facts, along with the general reasons for a small percentage of net increase in all Churches. In 1903 and 1904 the total net gain was about 1,500,000 for all Churches. The question was everywhere discussed: Why this small increase in Church communicants? It was a subject debated at Ministerial Associations and in The Advocate. And with greater concern because of its possible bearing on the future. It became obvious that Church growth numerically could not keep pace with that of earlier decades. In 1904 the population of the United States was given at 82,000,000; communicant Church members, 30,000,000. More than one-third of the population was in the Churches. Among other reasons assumed to account for the undesirable facts were these: Too much superficial revival work, and consequent reactions, had set the people against the old methods of making converts. That the Churches lost courage, patience and faith. That the Church membership had more largely become property-holders—become rich—and so had naturally become more conservative, less aggressive. That sin had assumed so many attractive and apparently innocent forms as to beguile and ensnare many Church members. Carnal amusements weakened the power of the gospel. The spirituality of the Churches had declined to an alarming extent. That the preaching had become too intellectual, and that the emotional element in human nature, so powerful a factor in earlier years, had become neglected and eliminated. That the spirit of the age and the general atmosphere which prevailed in society was antagonistic to vital piety. The manner and methods of modern preaching; the disposition to interest and amuse, were much discussed, and along with the admittedly large and increasing proportion of unconverted and carnal Church members were held responsible for lack of power to reach and save the unconverted. Notwithstanding, quite aggressive and successful work was done in some of the Elderships. In East Pennsylvania much of this work was under the direction of the Board of Church Extension, which aided in gathering funds and in supervising the work. This was the case at West Poplar Street, York; at Rowenna, Lancaster county, and at New Cumberland, Cumberland county. At York, the self-denying pastor, J. H. Martin, began work on West Poplar Street in 1899, and in 1900 organized a church of ten members. They at once bought ground for a church and parsonage, with special terms if the Bethel were built within a year. The work was at once begun, and on July 8, 1900, the corner-stone was laid, I. A. MacDannald preaching on the occasion. The building was completed and ready for dedication December 2, 1900. O. I. Brown delivered the morning sermon, and T. H. McAfee preached in the evening. F. W. McGuire was on hand as President of the Board of Church Extension to help along with the work the week following. The church at Kimmel's, Schuylkill county, after extensive repairs, rededicated their house on May 13, 1900. J. F. Meixel was their faithful pastor, and he had secured the services of J. M. Waggoner, a former pastor, and J. M. Fahl, of the German Eldership, for the occasion. Mission work in Philadelphia was always considered of the first importance in the interest of the First Church. Hitherto it lacked both means and a good opportunity. The first enterprise had failed after the death of L. F. Nicodemus, pastor. With the zealous assistance of C. D. Rishel and G. H. Knox, two local ministers in the city, a new mission was started prior to 1900. It had no permanent location, but when it secured a Hall at Twenty-six and Cumberland streets, it had considerable success, having a Sunday-school of over one hundred and a church nucleus of nearly twenty. Proper encouragement and financial assistance, which failed, might have made this work a success. The rededication of the Bethel at Mt. Joy, under C. I. Behney, pastor, took place November 4, 1900, after undergoing considerable repairs. O. I. Brown preached from John i. 29. A. H. Long assisted in the services. A new Bethel was built at a small mining village called Ashland, in Clearfield county, under the labors of the faithful pastor, H. D. Boughter, which was dedicated November 25, 1900. C. H. Forney preached morning and evening, and C. H. Grove in the afternoon. On the Saxton charge, Bedford county, J. A. Staub, pastor, the Bethel at Fairplay was repaired and rededicated December 9, 1900, by O. E. Houston. At Bethlehem, Clearfield county, the work of building a Bethel was begun under the labors of the pastor, W. H. Snyder. The corner-stone was laid by H. D. Boughter on May 12, 1901. After commencing the renovation of the Green Spring Bethel, Cumberland county, the storm nearly wrecked the building. Through the persistent efforts of the pastor, E. Myers, means were gathered and repairs completed at a cost of nearly $500.00. On August 4, 1901, the house was rededicated, C. I. Brown and J. H. Dohner preaching the sermons. The church at Martinsburg, Blair county, with its beloved pastor, O. E. Houston, early in 1901, secured a new lot for a bethel and bought the adjoining property for a parsonage, thus securing a location for the new bethel to be built on the corner of two prominent intersecting streets. There they built a beautiful, attractive and convenient house of worship, which was dedicated July 20, 1902, C. H. Forney preaching morning and evening. Besides the pastor, J. M. Waggoner, J. A. Staub, C. H. Grove, Rev. Wharton and Dr. Gwynn participated in the services throughout the day. After spending $1,000.00 in repairing, remodeling and refurnishing their bethel, the church at Highspire, Dauphin county, held rededicatory services February 15, 1913. J. W. Ault, pastor, secured the presence of C. I. Brown to preach the morning sermon, and C. F. Reitzel, the evening sermon. C. H. Forney delivered a dedicatory address, concluding with the prayer of dedication. After suffering serious loss "when the waters had overwhelmed us," and months of anxious waiting, praying and laboring, the church on Main Street, Steelton, succeeded in erecting a new and attractive house of worship, which, including bell and furniture, cost $9,500.00. J. R. Stonesifer, pastor, had labored diligently to carry this work to completion, collecting quite an amount of the funds from thirty-four churches of the Eldership. On Sunday morning, May 3, 1903, C. H. Forney delivered the dedicatory sermon, from Acts viii. 37. C. I. Brown preached at night, from Deut. viii. 2. An extensive revival, under the labors of W. H. Shade, was enjoyed at Fairplay, Bedford county, and a church of forty-four members organized in November, 1903. The bethel at Auburn, Schuylkill county, was repaired under the pastorate of S. N. Good, and had a rededication on May 1, 1904, when C. H. Forney preached at both services. The mission enterprises of the East Pennsylvania Eldership were energetically pushed during these years, co-operated with by the Board of Church Extension. There were fourteen charges receiving help from the Board of Missions, while the Board of Church Extension assisted in building new bethels and freeing others from burdensome debts. The work at Rowenna, Lancaster county, was mainly in charge of the latter Board. It was a new point, connected with the Bainbridge and Maytown field. A lot was bought and a bethel built at a total cost of about $1,800.00. The corner-stone was laid on May 15, 1904, when addresses were delivered by T. H. McAfee, A. H. Long and H. S. Hershey. The house was dedicated August 21, 1904, C. H. Forney preaching in the morning, and C. I. Brown in the evening. I. A. MacDannald, T. H. McAfee and C. F. Reitzel assisted in the services during the day. The Board of Church Extension was still interested in the work at New Cumberland, Cumberland county. J. A. Detter, pastor, with the united co-operation of the church, repaired the bethel, and rededicated it June 19, 1904, when J. C. Forncrook officiated. The devoted pastor, C. I. Behney, and the church at Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, made repairs to their bethel at a cost of $500.00. The pastor had accorded to him the honor of preaching the sermons on the day of rededication, June 5, 1904. The most modern, attractive and elaborate house of worship and parsonage combined within the territory of the Eldership was built by the church at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, being finished in the Summer of 1904, at a cost of $35,000.00. The credit of this fine enterprise is due to the zealous pastor, C. I. Brown, and the co-operation of the self-sacrificing council and church. The splendid edifice was dedicated on September 25th, when C. H. Forney delivered the dedicatory sermon, and W. N. Yates preached the evening sermon. With H. S. Bickel as pastor, the church at Milltown, Cumberland county, completely remodeled its house of worship, and it was rededicated by I. A. MacDannald on December 11, 1904. A unique service under the auspices of a committee appointed by the Eldership, known as a "Reunion," was held by the churches at Williams Grove, Cumberland county. A large representation of the various fields of labor was in attendance. Four addresses were delivered, two in the forenoon and two in the afternoon. The themes and speakers were: Philosophic Basis of Ordinances, C. H. Forney. Our Plea and Mission, George Sigler. Churches of God in North America, J. C. Forncrook. The Truth Treasured and Transmitted, S. G. Yahn. The meeting was also partly of a social and recreative character.

Very little material progress is recorded in the Maryland and Virginia Eldership for 1900-1905. One house of worship was extensively repaired, at Broad Fording, Washington county. It was rededicated by J. D. Clark and W. H. Engler on November 16, 1902. At Wakefield, Carroll county, where the meritorious T. B. Tyler was pastor, a handsome new brick bethel was built. It was dedicated July 10, 1904, J. D. Clark officiating in the morning, and L. F. Murray in the evening. A unique dedicatory service followed the evening sermon. The pulpit was set back a few feet; the open Bible was laid on the place where the pulpit had stood; the pastor, Murray, and the members of the church kneeled around the open Bible, and Murray made the dedicatory prayer.

In the West Virginia Eldership, North, the church at Martin's Ferry, Belmont county, Ohio, built a new, handsome, frame bethel, under the leadership of A. J. Stanley, pastor, which cost $2,100.00. It was dedicated December 17, 1901, Thomas Woods preaching on the occasion. Other ministers present were Lucas, Shimp and Rader. The Centennial Bethel, built in 1876, Greene county, Pa., was replaced with a new building in the Spring of 1904, at a cost of $2,200.00. In June C. Manchester was there to dedicate it; but rains interfered, and failing to raise sufficient money to pay the debt, the dedication was deferred until October 30th, when W. R. Covert preached, collected the needed funds and dedicated the house of God. N. M. Anderson was the devoted pastor. In the territory of the West Virginia Eldership, South, the material part of the work seemed stationary. One house of worship, at Mt. Tabor, was repaired, and rededicated September 25, 1904, under the pastor labors of R. L. Workman.

The West Pennsylvania Eldership had extended its work into Garrett county, Md., the extreme western section of the State. Here A. W. Snyder was laboring with considerable success. On two successive Sabbaths S. G. Yahn dedicated two houses of worship. The first was at Liberty, where the pastor, J. S. Boyd, had done excellent work during the year, greatly improving the bethel. The dedicatory services were held August 17, 1902. G. W. Byrnes, J. O. Martin and W. B. Elliott assisted in the services. The second was at Latrobe, where the church had erected a new house of worship, which was dedicated August 24th. The church had been organized in 1901, under the efficient labors of the pastor, R. B. Bowser. R. L. Byrnes, the diligent and faithful pastor of the church at Brackenridge, succeeded in enlarging and greatly improving the house of worship at that place, at a cost of $1,450.00. On February 15, 1903, the dedicatory services were held, S. G. Yahn preaching in the morning, and J. L. Updegraph in the evening. A very successful revival meeting was held at Grange, Jefferson county, by J. W. Huffman in the Winter of 1902-3. There were sixty-five converts, of which number, on March 4, 1903, thirty-five entered into an organization of a church of God. They rented a Hall, but also at once began the work of building a bethel. This was completed, and was dedicated May 8, 1904, by S. G. Yahn, Forney O. Eakin meanwhile having become the pastor of the new church. The Fairview church, Westmoreland county, having decided to build a bethel in the village of Kecksburg, began work in the Summer of 1904. Led by their enthusiastic pastor, the work made good progress, and on August 7th the corner-stone of a $4,000.00 building was laid by S. G. Yahn, assisted by W. J. Umstead and W. B. Elliott. The dedication took place on New Year's day, 1905, when Wm. Harris Guyer officiated. W. B. Elliott assisted, while J. L. Updegraph preached in the evening.

Successful work in certain lines was accomplished in Ohio during this period; but it was disappointing in its character and extent. In 1903 the official Minutes showed a decrease in membership in the State of 539, and there was a sense of depression among the aggressive ministers and churches. These were struggling heroically in a number of localities, and were rewarded with a fair measure of success. A bethel built at Haysville, where A. C. Osborn was the pastor, was dedicated June 17, 1900. J. A. Witham preached on the occasion. The two churches at Canton having united, they at once entered upon the work of repairing and beautifying their house of worship, led by their assiduous pastor, W. E. Turner. The rededicatory services were conducted by C. Manchester, May 27, 1900. At Flat Rock, Paulding county, a new bethel was built under the labors of S. S. Hunter, pastor. It was dedicated by T. Koogle, June 17, 1900. At Killbuck, near West Salem, under the faithful leadership of its pastor, A. C. Osborn, the church repaired its house of worship, which was dedicated by S. Kline and T. W. Bellingham on September 1 and 2, 1900. On June 18, 1901, the Standing Committee authorized T. Koogle to sell the church property at New Washington, and the Trustees to execute a deed. A church building owned by the United Presbyterians at Belmore, Putnam county, was bought by the church at that point in the Summer of 1903. W. P. Small was the loyal pastor and leader in this enterprise. T. Koogle officiated at the dedication, September 14, 1902. With W. P. Burchard as pastor, the church at Ohio City made needed repairs on its house of worship, which was reopened on May 10, 1913, J. F. Slough officiating. The house of worship at the Union appointment, Mercer county, was removed to a more eligible site, and extensively repaired, under the labors of the consecrated pastor, S. D. Harlan. The rededication took place on July 31, 1904, when Chas. H. Gatchell preached the sermons. On the St. Joe Mission, with A. C. Osborn as pastor, the house of worship at Nettle Lake was dedicated October 23, 1904. The ministers preaching on the occasion were J. F. Slough and J. A. Witham.

Two houses of worship were dedicated in Michigan during this period. Under the pastoral labors of D. L. Wiles the bethel at New Haven Center, Gratiot county, a new stone edifice was built during the Summer of 1901. It was dedicated by O. Manchester on December 22, 1901. The church at Saville Center, where W. J. McNutt was the efficient pastor, followed by M. S. Hemminger, built a bethel in 1904, which was dedicated September 18th, J. E. Moffitt officiating. The work was apparently contracting, or fields were consolidated, as in 1901 there were fourteen charges, which were reduced to nine in 1904. Efforts to quicken the energies and increase the activities of churches and ministers were made; but conditions were adverse, and small results followed. Funds were scarce; ministers inadequately supported, and only a small amount of missionary money was received.

In the Indiana Eldership there was revived activity in certain forms of religious endeavor. There were, however, reports of only two church dedications. E. Tatman, pastor at Disko, reported a dedication at said place, which took place September 22, 1901. J. E. McColley preached the sermons. In 1902 Tatman was pastor at Akron, where a new brick bethel was erected. This was dedicated by J. E. McColley on November 2, 1902. Annually the Eldership was assured, however, that "quite a number were converted and added to the churches on the different fields of labor; that the churches are in a fair condition spiritually, and that there had been quite an advancement in all lines of Church work." An unusual temporary impetus was given to the work by two simultaneous propositions favorably acted upon in 1903, and consummated in 1904. The first was the consolidation of the Indiana and Southern Indiana Elderships into one body. The second was the organization of "the Indiana Eldership Assembly," on the general principle of a Chautauqua. It was endorsed by several other Annual Elderships, and in its incipency seemed pregnant with good results. Its first meeting was held at Syracuse, Kosciusko county, just prior to the "first annual meeting of the Indiana Eldership of the churches of God, united." It continued from Wednesday, September 21, 1904, to Sunday, the 25th. I. W. Markley was the chief promoter of the enterprise, and arranged the program for the first Assembly, and "conducted the meeting with signal success." "Lectures, music and recitations constituted the principal attractions."

There was much to interest and excite that transpired in the Southern Indiana Eldership in its final semi-decade. W. R. Covert could complacently regard himself as hero in these events, including the final consolidation of the Indiana and Southern Indiana Elderships in 1903-4. Other prominent events, in which he was earnestly seconded by H. H. Spiher and others, were the receiving into the Eldership through action of the Standing Committee, February 12, 1900, of F. O. Bumpus, "who presented a regular license of the Missionary Baptist Church, Junction City, Ky."; and also J. A. Manes, minister of "the General Baptist Presbytery of the Flat Creek Association of Indiana." The former was made General Evangelist of the Southern Indiana Eldership, and the latter was appointed pastor of the church at Matamoras. The most memorable event was the final consummation of a proposed union of the Church of God, White River Conference, sometimes called New Dunkard Church, at Idaville, White county, with the Southern Indiana Eldership, and the appointment of Covert as its pastor. It was comparatively a strong church, of nearly one hundred and fifty members. On February 12, 1901, it voted to join the Eldership. It was an old church, first organized in 1844, and was one of a dozen similar organizations united in an Association which as early as 1897 was almost unanimous in its action to become a part of the Southern Indiana Eldership. But sentiment changed, and only the Idaville church came into the Eldership. A lawsuit followed to get possession of the property, which in September, 1902, was decided in favor of the Idaville church. A dedication, reported by R. M. Pine, in January, 1900, who preached on the occasion, took place at Fairland, December 17, 1899. This new bethel was built under the labors of Jacob Jonas, pastor. A new bethel was built on Eel River, Clay county, under the pastoral labors of G. W. Miller, costing $1,000.00. It was dedicated in June, 1903, when H. H. Spiher preached in the morning; E. M. Love, in the afternoon, and

W. R. Covert in the evening. At one time Mrs. M. B. Woodworth's influence dominated this Eldership, and her methods, views and practices largely prevailed. Covert vigorously antagonized her vagaries; churches gathered under her preaching disintegrated and died, and her position became untenable. In May, 1900, she returned her license to the Standing Committee, and resigned her membership in the Southern Indiana Eldership.

Conditions among the churches in the Illinois Eldership were regarded as "in a good, healthy state." There was "a spirit of progress and advancement throughout the Eldership." Some new church organizations were reported at several annual sessions of the Eldership; but the fields of labor do not indicate an enlargement of the territory, as in 1900 there were twenty-one, and in 1904, nineteen. Material progress was indicated in the payment of debts on houses of worship, and also in the new bethels which were erected. The Eldership had a Church Extension Fund, and through this assisted some of the general enterprises. Among these was the project started in 1901 to secure "a tent to be used for missionary campaigning in Eldership territory." In 1902 an appropriation of $100.00 was made out of the Church Extension Fund toward paying for the tent. I. S. Richmond was given charge of the matter, who was "to raise $200.00 additional by canvassing the churches." He so far succeeded that he announced his purpose "to begin tent meetings at Lodge" in the Spring of 1903. The Y. P. S. C. E. had "become a potent factor in the upbuilding of the churches of God in this Eldership." It held its fifth annual Convention of two days in June, 1904, at Martinsville. In the Winter of 1903-4 the great catastrophe whereby "from five to six hundred men, women and children were burned, crushed, suffocated and trampled to death" in the destruction of the Iroquois Theater, Chicago, intensely excited religious circles all through the State, as it shocked the whole country. The pulpits, as well as the press, discussed the awful calamity. It was given a religious turn, as some ministers insisted, in a somewhat ambiguous manner, that "the fire that burned these six hundred people was God's fire." As such catastrophes so often called out skeptical sentiments, the pulpit combatted these, answering the question, "Is there a God?" This perhaps especially in view of the fact stated, that "nine-tenths of the victims of this horror were women and children." Can Providence be justified? Is there a reasonable explanation of such catastrophes? These and kindred questions the pulpit had to answer to protect the interests of the church and to fortify believers against infidelity. They resolved themselves into the age-old problem in theology: "Is it possible for finite man to construct a theodicy which will justify the divine providence by reconciling the existence of evil with the goodness and severity of God?" Kant said it is impossible. The mission at Mendota having failed, the property was sold and the proceeds covered into the Eldership treasury by the agent. The church at Martinsville, under the pastorate of J. W. Kingston, built a new bethel, costing $4,000.00. It was dedicated November 11, 1900, W. N. Yates preaching morning and evening. The church at Mt. Pleasant, two miles from Charleston, organized about 1875, concluded to abandon the house built in 1876, and erect a new bethel a mile nearer town. With O. B. Huston as pastor, they succeeded in building a house at a cost of $3,000.00, which J. Bernard dedicated November 4, 1902. The new bethel at Melrose, Clark county, where W. H. Cross was pastor, was set apart to the worship of God on September 20, 1903.

The spirit of the Iowa ministry was aggressive, but not so hopeful, during this period. With the churches they labored diligently, but under rather disheartening conditions, to hold fast what they had, and if possible extend the borders. But while their zeal was rewarded in a few instances, in other places the work languished. There was considerable decrease, according to statistics, in the total membership of the churches. Some four or more churches became extinct, while others were classed as "non-supporting." Yet earnest efforts were made to secure funds to support the work, and some missionary labors in Minnesota resulted in the organization of at least one church. There were elements of discord which hindered the progress of the work. The most serious of these was the missionary controversy, which became somewhat acute as the time approached for the holding of the General Eldership in 1902. The embers of some of the old controversies were also still alive. Among these was the question of unfermented wine for Communion purposes, to which the Eldership was committed. The churches were not all in sympathy with this view, and insisted on using fermented wine. Several pastors resigned their appointments, and were sustained by the Standing Committee, which declared the churches to be in error. To secure better co-operation and inspire greater activity, every field of labor in the Eldership was to be visited at least once during each year by some member of the Standing Committee. Much interest was awakened in Des Moines county because of the semi-centennial services of the beginning of Church work in said county. In 1850 William Vance removed into said county from West Pennsylvania. Among other places where he began preaching was Harmony, largely a settlement of families from Westmoreland county, Pa. There he succeeded in organizing a church on April 14, 1851. On April 14, 1901, he preached the memorial sermon, from John xii. 26. A new town called Royal, in Clay county, was laid out about 1900. It was within the territory in which Conrad Fatland was laboring. With the faithful co-operation of the brethren and friends he succeeded in building a house of worship in Royal, costing $810.00. It was dedicated on June 2, 1901, by G. W. Elliott. The church at Mt. Ayer, served as pastor by D. Long, some years before had suffered the loss by fire of their house of worship. In February, 1901, they resolved to begin gathering funds to rebuild, as the rented house of worship could no longer be had. They received permission to canvass other churches for assistance. The house of worship at Greenmound, where D. Long was pastor, was dedicated December 8, 1901. J. C. Kepford preached on the occasion. In their misfortune, the church at Pleasant Grove, Louisa county, with their pastor, A. B. Chamberlin, manifested the sum of heroic qualities, when the day after their bethel was destroyed by fire they resolved to begin at once the work of rebuilding. The calamity befell them November 13, 1904, and on August 13, 1905, their new bethel, costing $2,000.00, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. L. F. Chamberlin preached from 1 Kings ix. 3-5.

In Nebraska there was but slow growth during this period. In some sections of the territory no progress was made. The spiritual condition of most of the churches was good. There was an evident feeling of spiritual heaviness, of heart-sinking, at the deferred realization of hopes cherished. Means were limited, so that missionary enterprises either suffered, or could not be entered upon. The indomitable missionary, A. Wilson, went to the Pacific Coast. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership failed to keep any missionaries in the territory of the Eldership. The fields of labor varied from eleven in 1901, to seven in 1904. This in itself does not mean a contracting of the territory, but a rearrangement of charges so as to supply all the churches. Often single churches were supplied in this way by ministers who largely supported themselves. Opportunities for successful work abounded. The fields were inviting the reapers. Great things were possible. But the men, and more especially the means to support the men, were wanting. The machinery of the Eldership was adequate, and was well worked. Funds were instituted; but the receipts did not flow in. There were seven different funds in 1901, but the total amount of money in them was $239. An assessment was regularly made, one-fourth for the Contingent Fund and three-fourths for the Missionary Fund. The aggregate was as low as $66.00. There was all possible activity in every department of healthy church work. There was an Eldership Woman's Missionary Society, whose ambition was to organize a society in every church. The standing and influence of the Church in the State were excellent. Perhaps an indication of this may be seen in the unusual fact that in January, 1903, a former Catholic priest, Leo B. Vander Haden, and a member of the M. E. Church, W. R. Hodges, applied to the Standing Committee for Certificates of Ordination, which were granted. The former was at once "appointed to do evangelistic work in the territory of the Nebraska Eldership," and the latter "to do evangelistic work wherever he finds an opportunity to do good within the bounds of this Eldership." Earlier, in July, 1902, two churches which "were formerly allied with the Free Baptist Church," reorganized "under the name, polity and doctrines of the churches of God," and "asked to become part of the Nebraska Eldership." These were the church at Mills, Keyapaha county, with a membership of twenty-nine, and the church at New Hope, same county, with a membership of twenty-two. With these churches came three applicants recommended for license—G. W. Snodgrass, George Graham and Sister N. S. Trout. These applications were favorably considered, and the churches were to be under the pastoral care of these licentiates. During these five years the work was carried forward in the following counties: Polk, Richardson, McPherson, Gage, Custer, Lincoln, Logan, Keyapaha, Holt, Clay and Saline.

The Board of Missions of the General Eldership employed missionaries in Kansas each year during 1900-1905. Especially was Ft. Scott well provided for, as O. A. Newlin was the alert and earnest missionary at that point from 1900 to 1903. Several other missionaries labored on other fields. A hopeful spirit pervaded the Eldership and churches; but funds were inadequate to do the best permanent work. In 1902 the eleven pastors received only $882.00 from their fields. But in 1904 the amount had increased to $1,420.00. While the number of church organizations increased from thirteen in 1902, to fifteen in 1904, the number of "preaching points" fell from nineteen to fifteen. There was a remarkable falling off in these two years on three other items in the statistics. Conversions in 1902, 233; in 1904, 71. Fellowships in 1902, 425; in 1904, 85. Total membership in 1902, 675; in 1904, 575. Though results do not indicate it, there was commendable activity among the sisters, as they maintained a State W. M. S., and sought to have an organization in every church. Still one of the enthusiastic pastors, at the close of the year 1904, exclaimed: "Praise God for the growth of the Kansas Eldership!" This more in view of the additions to the Roll of Ministers, which was full of promise had there been means available to keep them at work. Material evidences of prosperity were not wanting. The bethel built at Englevalle in 1891 had not been dedicated because of a debt resting upon it. This was provided for, and on February 17, 1901, the house was dedicated by O. A. Newlin. This good work was accomplished under the labors of the spirited pastor, W. E. Tuttle. The church at Riley having "disbanded," the Standing Committee on September 14, 1901, ordered the property to be sold. This was also the case with a church in Ness county, and on December 19, 1902, the Standing Committee ordered the bethel to be sold, and the proceeds to be used toward building a house of worship in Pratt county. At Maple Grove, under the pastorate of A. J. Leonard, a new house of worship replaced one destroyed by fire in 1901. It was dedicated by O. A. Newlin on February 23, 1902, with "all bills paid and receipted." W. E. Tuttle and A. Miller conducted an eight-week revival at Mulberry after New Year's, 1902, and organized a church of one hundred and twenty members. The building of a bethel was at once determined upon, and the corner-stone was laid March 8, 1902, by O. A. Newlin. The house was completed, at a cost of $1,300.00, and was dedicated by Newlin and J. F. Thomas on August 17, 1902. While the white church at Topeka had become extinct, and the mission among the colored people of the city, conducted by Elizabeth Dupree, did not prove a success, in the Summer of 1902 Missionary Dupree collected money, bought and set up a tent, and began work anew. She succeeded in organizing a small church of white people, who were "willing to have a colored woman for a preacher." Here, as in some other sections, the "second-work agitators made considerable trouble."

The Kansas Eldership assumed jurisdiction over Colorado, but it was not able to do much work there, not being financially strong enough to care for the fields in Kansas. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership came to its assistance, and in 1900 appointed P. L. French missionary to Colorado. In 1901 it appointed French to the territory around Parachute, and G. E. Komp to eastern Colorado and western Kansas, Komp also being the appointee of the Kansas Eldership. In 1904 W. T. Turpin was appointed "Missionary in Colorado" by the Illinois Eldership, and also by the General Board of Missions. H. S. Wayne, Parachute, Colo., secured the presence and labors of A. Wilson, of Nebraska, in the Spring of 1900. He had a revival two and one-half miles south of Parachute, and organized a small church. French reached there in October, 1900, and had successful meetings at the same point and at Rifle. When Komp arrived at Clover Meadow in 1901, he found a church there of forty members, worshipping in a school-house. In February, 1901, he labored at Lamar, where a small church was formed. An appointment was opened at May Valley, three miles from Clover Meadow, so that when in 1902 W. T. Turpin took charge he had "four regular appointments." The Kansas Eldership in 1902 appointed W. T. Broad to Parachute. The small churches in Colorado were quite active, and organized Sunday-schools and C. E. Societies. There was a surplus of ministers and hopeful openings, but the funds were not available to properly sustain the work.

Missouri was still in the main a mission field during this period. This the General Board of Missions fully realized, and it did all it reasonably could to help the Eldership to care for the work. It had from one to three ministers in its employ in the State during these five years. J. F. Thomas was the missionary in south-western Missouri in 1900 to 1903. G. L. Bowman was in northern Missouri in 1900-1. In 1902, W. W. Richmond was appointed to Sullivan county, and in 1903 to north-eastern Missouri, with J. W. Primrose to Clinton and DeKalb counties. In 1903 G. L. Chapman began mission work under the General Board and continued during 1904 and beyond. He had the true missionary spirit from the beginning; is earnest, active and aggressive, and intensely devoted to the progress of the cause in Missouri. In 1904 the General Board sent him to the southern part of the State. Of a sanguine disposition, there were times when he anticipated the future with some apprehensions, as when in an article in 1902 he viewed largely the dark side of the question of "What shall be the Progress and Destiny of the Missouri Eldership"? The work did not seem so prosperous then; yet the missionaries were accomplishing some good. A few new churches had been organized by Thomas in 1900, and up to the Eldership in 1901 he reported three new organizations. A spirit of aggressive work pervaded the active ministry, and at times it was inspired with new hope, and made earnest resolves to do greater things. In 1903 a new church was received at the Dover appointment. Many conversions were reported in 1904, and there was commendable activity in the missionary cause. Satan vexed the churches to some extent during 1903-4, when even one of the ministers "pulled off from the Church," and sowed the seeds of discord and division. While they suffered some loss, peace, harmony and co-operation were restored.

The concensus of opinion of ministers in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and of visiting brethren, was that there was a splendid opportunity for Church work, and that the doctrines of the Church were readily received. There were complaints, voiced by B. Ober, Oklahoma, that the territory was too much neglected, especially by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership; while others prayed and pleaded for ministers to come to Oklahoma and build up the Church. But the Board could not answer all calls. In 1901 it appointed J. D. Shoemaker missionary in the Indian Territory, and J. C. Caswell in Oklahoma. In 1902, C. H. Ballinger was assigned to the Indian Territory not included in the Kansas Eldership, and P. L. French to the Kansas part. In 1903 H. W. Allen was the Board's appointee to western Oklahoma, and Ballinger to eastern Oklahoma. Allen was also appointed by the Missouri Eldership. The work at Bartlesville, I. T., had assumed such proportions by 1904 that French was appointed by the General Board to that point; Allen to western Oklahoma, and Ballinger and J. W. Burns to the Indian Territory. The Board authorized its Secretary, S. G. Yahn, in 1904, to visit this part of its vast territory, and in June 4, 1904, he held a conference with missionaries French, Allen, Burns, Richmond and others at Bartlesville, to discuss missionary problems and plans. By this time the church at Bartlesville had completed its new bethel, at a cost of $3,200.00, under French's labors, which was dedicated June 5th, S. G. Yahn officiating. Bartlesville was a thriving town of 2,500 population. Allen, Ober and others were enthusiastic in their praise of Oklahoma, and strongly urged colonization of Church families, as "now is the time to settle in Oklahoma; now is the Church's opportunity to possess the country." W. R. Covert had been called to Bartlesville, a few years prior to the building of the bethel there, and had a successful debate with a Baptist minister, which gave the cause in general quite an impetus. But in western Oklahoma Warner and his "Come-outers" were making the churches of God considerable trouble during this period. "They work under the false guise of Church of God ministers," says Ober, and bring the doctrines of the Church, and its name, into disrepute. To get into the towns where the Church had no houses of worship, the Standing Committee in October, 1902, decided to "secure a tabernacle" for use "in the Indian Territory." E. M. Kirkpatrick and George Kirk were appointed to "receive money and purchase the tabernacle," which was to be "in charge of the Standing Committee for the Indian Territory." In view of the apparently enforced policy of expansion versus concentration in frontier Church work, the question of J. F. Thomas, in July, 1904, is significant: "What is the use for us to want more territory when we do not take care of the territory we already have?"

Limited results followed the labors of ministers and churches in Arkansas and Texas from 1900 to 1905. Two missionaries were kept in the field by the General Board each year, one among the white people and one among the colored people. These were J. H. Whittington, white, in 1901 and 1903; J. M. Howard, white, in 1902, and D. S. Summit, white, in 1904. The missionaries among the black people were J. D. DeGraftenreed in 1901, and in 1904; M. Bonds in 1902, and W. A. Daniels in 1903. Howard reported the organization of a new church in 1903. There were revivals at various points, with accessions to the churches. The Arkansas Eldership (colored) and its churches were not favorable to women as pastors. In 1902, when Elizabeth Dupree, of Topeka, Kans., went to Arkansas to labor among her race, the church in Logan county rejected her "on the ground of being a woman." The Standing Committee not only sustained the church in this action; but it went further, and declared, "that Sister Dupree shall not be pastor of any of the churches on the same ground." Women, however, were licensed, and were also appointed missionaries. The Texas and Arkansas Eldership had some where about twenty or upward church organizations. It was still doing work in Texas, where J. D. Henson was missionary part of the time. The condition of the Eldership was regarded in 1903 as "at least hopeful." The number of appointments varied, being frequently rearranged, and ranging from nine to fourteen. In the colored Eldership exigencies required frequent changes of fields of labor, so that churches might be supplied with preaching by ministers largely dependent upon themselves for their livelihood. They varied from four to six. Considerable work was done in the Indian Territory, where one, two and three ministers labored at different periods.

In the Eldership on the Pacific coast slow progress was made. The churches did little more than hold their own. There was considerable activity in missionary work, as some societies were organized, and an Eldership W. M. S. was provided for. The territory was exceedingly large, and churches were scattered, so that fields of labor were often rearranged, and numbered as high as twelve, with two in California. Troubles originated in the latter part of this period, and one church seceded, and several ministers were involved in serious dissensions. A. Wilson was the missionary of the General Board of Missions from 1900 to 1904, devoting much of his time to the work at and near Salem, Oregon. He was strong in his convictions of truth, and an uncompromising advocate and defender of the churches of God and their polity and doctrines.

Some mission work was done in isolated localities in three different States in the northwest. Families of the Church emigrated to points in Idaho, where A. W. Reeder made his home as early as 1901. The Advocate was "the only Church of God preacher" he had seen in the State. He strongly urged the colonization of Church families in the section where he lived. Later J. C. Caswell located at Priest River, Idaho, and began preaching. He also began work at Newport, where he held a special meeting. He found it "hard work to build up the Church of God in Idaho." "We are progressing slowly." "People do not receive the word as readily here as in the South and East." J. L. McClanahan located at Juliaetta, Idaho, and did some preaching. He was more sanguine, even expressing his "hope for an Eldership in Idaho." Families of the Church in Iowa and Colorado located at Payette, Idaho, about this time, and began church work. In 1902 W. E. Wolfe, of the Michigan Eldership, made Monitowac, Wis., his headquarters, and began preaching, having secured at different times the Presbyterian and the Disciple houses of worship. His Eldership authorized him "to work up a work in Wisconsin." When he advocated feet-washing the doors of these houses of worship were closed against him. He regarded Monitowac "a good place for missionary work." In Minnesota mission work was begun by G. W. Elliott, of the Iowa Eldership, which appointed him State Missionary. Families of Iowa, which were members of the church of God at Alice in 1903, located at Maynard, Minn. There Elliott had a regular appointment in the Presbyterian house of worship. When he proposed to organize a church, after a revival service at which "twenty-two professed saving faith in Christ," "the Presbyterian minister in charge refused us his church to organize in, or to preach any longer in it." They retired to "Brother Beal's house and completed our organization." This on the evening of January 24, 1904. They at once made arrangements to begin the work of building a Bethel, and by March 1st had about $500.00 pledged for that purpose. In the Fall of 1904 this church was, upon petition, received into the Iowa Eldership.

The famine in India, in view of the missionaries and mission interests of the General Eldership, deeply affected the churches. The missionaries were in no immediate danger; but the natives in their district suffered to quite an extent. What would our small gifts be among these thousands? Nevertheless, during the Summer and Fall of 1900, through The Advocate, nearly $1,000.00 were secured for this purpose.

Public debates had become almost a discarded mode of defending truth. But two are on record during this period in which ministers of the Church of God participated. Both were naturally disputatious, and rather invited controversy. The first was held at North Middleton, Cumberland county, Pa., and began at 10 a. m., October 18, 1900, between W. Palmer, pastor of the Plainfield circuit, and W. Knight, pastor of the Church of the Free People, Strattenville, Clarion county, Pa. Two propositions were debated, the first affirmed by Palmer, and the second, by Knight. These were: "The church of God authorized by Jesus Christ, and taught by his Apostles, was a man-made, organized church." "The Christian ordinances, water baptism and the Lord's Supper, so-called, are Jewish ordinances, and are abolished." The second, was held at Bartlesville, Ind. Ter., between W. R. Covert, of the Church of God, and C. B. Grady, Missionary Baptist Church. The debate began on December 11, 1902, and was to continue not less than nine evenings. Four propositions were agreed upon, the first and third affirmed by Covert; the second and fourth, by Grady. These were: 1. "That the churches of God, with which I am in fellowship, are most essentially identical with the churches of God founded by Christ and the Apostles, in name, ordinances, teachings and government, according to the teachings of the New Testament, or word of God, than the Missionary Baptist churches are." 2. "That the Church I am identified with, known in history as the Missionary Baptist Church, is scriptural in faith and practice, and is the church founded by Jesus Christ and his Apostles." 3. "The washing of the saints' feet is a church ordinance, instituted by Christ as such, and ought to be observed by all the saints, or churches of God." 4. "That a man who has been regenerated, or born again, will not, and can not, be finally and everlastingly lost." The debate was called "The Missionary Baptists' Waterloo."

While "controversies" were forbidden in the columns of The Advocate, there was quite a good deal of argumentative or dialectic discussion. It kept the atmosphere pure, and served to confirm the faith of believers in the distinctive doctrines of the churches of God. Some questions were resuscitated periodically, and discussed by new men, and sometimes from new view-points and fuller knowledge of facts. This was true with the various phases of the temperance question, local option and prohibition, as these problems in social and civic relations came before the people, as in 1901, when local option was agitated; in 1903 when the anti-saloon question received a fresh impulse because of the National Anti-Saloon Convention, and prohibition in 1904, when it was a live issue in Congress and before the American people as to the extent prohibitory legislation should be applied to Government buildings, the Capitol, immigrant stations, forts, Soldiers' Homes, Hawaii, interstate traffic, the Indians, Alaska, and the Pacific and Philippine Islands. Likewise the subjects of the Federation of Churches, the Church of God not a sect, baptism and the remission of sins, born of water, order of the ordinances, and their private observance; the mourners' bench, sanctification, the millennium, imposition of hands, the scriptural authority for Elderships, General Eldership Church polity, and authority of said body; church discipline, faith-healing, the so-called second-work, old landmarks, and a number of others were discussed often by new men, or as live issues in certain sections of the territory of the General Eldership. From 1902 to 1905 some of these questions became more practical and vital by reason of the relation of the W. G. M. S. organized in 1890 toward the General Eldership and the W. G. M. S. organized in 1903 to take its place.

Wider differences on doctrinal questions began to develop with this generation of ministers; yet not on such points, nor of such a character, as to disturb the harmony of the churches. The reasons were evident. Mainly they were environment, intellectual training and wider acquaintance with scientific, literary and theological literature. Having no published system of theology, ministers made selections of standard works according to their tastes, or under divergent influences. Many also acquired their theological knowledge from other and unreliable sources. But standard works on theology differ radically on some doctrines, and so disagreements were to be expected among ministers who had been careful in their selection of text-books. Neither reason, nor the Scriptures interpreted by human minds, proves an infallible and uniform guide. It was but reasonable, therefore, that on such a subject as the vicarious atonement of Christ, so recondite, so hidden from ordinary and easy perception and intelligence, disputations should arise. The theory of the atonement prevalent among the ministers of the churches of God had always been that advocated by C. Price in a lengthy discussion of the subject in 1900. He defined the "vicarious atonement" to mean, that "Christ suffered the penalty of the broken law, and made a vicarious atonement for sin by suffering in our place and stead." He gave fifteen reasons in proof of this doctrine. From this view, traditional in the Church, others began to dissent. This is true in all Churches. No doctrine of the reconciling work of Christ has ever yet been developed that can be said to have received the consent of the Christian world. Those opposed to Price's position conceded that the idea of expiation, and of penal substitution, lies on the face of Scripture; but that this was not the true meaning and method of reconciliation. The "vicarious" nature of salvation through Christ they did not deny; but only that to interpret it to mean that Christ stood in the sinner's place, had his sins imputed to him, and became legally guilty, and was punished accordingly, they repudiated. This was the vital point in the discussion, and it did not aim at any further attempt at the solution of a problem which has baffled the wisest theologians in all the ages.

In 1900, and again in 1903, the mooted question of an "invisible" church was taken up by different writers. The discussion grew out of a question answered editorially, in which it was requested that an explanation be given of the meaning and object of "the right hand of fellowship." The answer made a clear and absolute distinction between the "visible" and the "invisible" church, and maintained that of the latter a person becomes a constituent part by reason of the new birth, and that in it are included all true believers. That the former is an external organization, of which one becomes a member by official action of a local eldership. And that this distinction is recognized in the Scriptures, though the terms do not occur. Winebrenner was quoted against this view, though it was really an argument of silence, deduced from his characterization of the church as possessing "visibility." A singular and pathetic coincidence marked the ending of this discussion, in that on May 13, 1903, an article from the pen of W. P. Small, Ohio Eldership, appeared in opposition, and on May 20, 1903, his death was announced.

Whether the sin of "plagiarism" was more common in those days, or the church's conscience more sensitive, there were repeated discussions of it. In 1900 and in 1902 the evil was severely animadverted upon, and the moral degeneracy of guilty ministers held up to reprobation. That even "the world has indulged a universal sneer at the church for tolerating such immoralities in its ministry and members" was affirmed. The church was called upon "for its own vindication, and the highest interests of its adherents," "to make the basis of this sneer absolutely false," by repudiating the offenders.

The question of worldly amusements was becoming very prominent. Apparently a process of readjustment was in progress in the Christian church. The practical ethical standards of the church were receiving modifications and eliminations with a freedom which was alarming to conservative minds. The churches of God had always denounced worldly amusements, such as dancing, card playing, gambling of every variety, theater-going, etc. It stood with the Methodist and like Churches in opposition to all these forms of diversion. In the discussions of 1900-1903, carried on by different writers, recreation and amusements were not indiscriminately anathematized. They were classified as needful, innocent, doubtful and sinful. The latter two were put under ban.

Electioneering in churches and Elderships was by most of the writers totally condemned, both from the West and the East. More discriminating thinkers realized that not every form of electioneering, or activity in canvassing for votes, is pernicious activity. This was the dividing line along which the discussion was conducted.

The question of the mourners' bench began to broaden out into that of evangelistic methods. In 1902-1904, as to some extent in the preceding period, the mourners' bench was beginning to lose its place even in churches of God. It had a formal place in most revivals conducted by the pastors; but less stress was laid upon it, and other methods were becoming popular. The discussion was in the main negative. "Evangelistic" instead of "revival" services was the order. Editorially the use of the new term was approved, being a revival of a scriptural word, but used in too limited a sense. The evangelist is the preacher of the gospel.

Evangelistic services, however, meant "religious services conducted especially with a view to a revival, or the bringing the unsaved into the church." The discussion did not antagonize changes; but it did severely criticize methods employed. The fundamental thought in the criticisms was the increased liability under the new methods of superficial work, resulting in bringing multitudes into the churches without a real change of heart. A majority of professional evangelists were discredited by Churches and communities on this account.

A limited space only was given to the discussion of individual Communion cups. They were generally opposed. Those ministers and churches which approved of their use were indisposed to invite censure or criticism by publicly advocating them. Elderships were silent. Here and there a church adopted them, and was confirmed in its faith.

"Higher Criticism," for obvious reasons, received little attention from ministers of the churches of God. When the subject was discussed during this period it was almost invariably with marked disapprobation of the new science in every respect, and with unfeigned alarm at the consequences. But occasionally some one had the temerity to venture an indirect endorsement of some of the results reached by the more conservative of the higher critics. Positively to endorse Higher Criticism would not have been tolerated. The discussion, as elsewhere, showed great bias and limited information when viewed in the light of such illuminating articles as those reproduced in The Advocate from conservative scholars like Dr. W. H. Green, of Princeton Theological Seminary.

The sinlessness of believers was a deduction from the second-work theory of sanctification. It was discussed, and repudiated at various times between 1900 and 1905. The sense of sin, it was admitted, was declining, and the liability to deception increasing; but no one is perfect, no, not one, was the general belief. The explanation of John's teaching, that he in whom the divine seed remains can not sin, was not easy; but it was thought to have been found in the metaphysical distinction between the moral and physical natures of man, as also in the duality insisted upon by Paul.

In no practical question was there more general interest than in that of the country church. In 1903 and 1904, the Editor, F. W. McGuire and a few others devoted some space to the discussion of this question. The importance of the country church; the difficulties under which it labors, growing more formidable; the dying condition of many country churches; the absence of enthusiasm and progressive energy and activity; the constant losses of its most talented and useful younger members, and the best methods of work in country districts were themes of earnest and thoughtful discussion.

CHAPTER XX.

IN her review of the decade preceding A. D. 1912, Ella Wheeler Wilcox characterizes it as "one of wasteful extravagance, unhealthful excitement, unnatural appetites and an utter disregard of the rights of others." She speaks specifically of the financial and social world. But closely connected with that sphere of human activity is the religious world, only presumably in more vital relation to him in whom all things consist. The same human basis underlies both, and so this analysis in a measure applies to the feverish condition of the religious life. The earth itself seemed in active sympathy with the spirit of unrest in the religious and social world. Its blind natural forces were in great activity regardless of ultimate results. Uncontrolled and unguided, they spent their energies to no beneficent end. During the present period these seismic disturbances were numerous, widespread and violent; destroying life and property in almost unprecedented measure. The victims during these five years numbered over 200,000, and the property destroyed aggregated hundreds of millions. From 1905 to 1909 the surface of the social waters in the United States were agitated by the divorce question. It was debated in the halls of legislation, in congresses and conventions, in ecclesiastical gatherings and the pages of religious and secular periodicals. On two or three occasions the Editor of The Advocate and contributors discussed the various phases of the subject, and the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and other Elderships, devoted parts of their sessions to this absorbing problem. Uniform divorce laws, with a largely reduced number of grounds for granting divorce, were the main issues. Opinions varied from that held by the Catholic Church, which makes the marriage relation absolutely indissoluble, to the flexible laws of the State of Nevada, the most liberal in their provisions of all the States. The churches of God quite generally approved the conclusions reached by the Divorce Congress which met at Washington, D. C., February 19, 1906. It greatly reduced the grounds for divorce, and prepared a uniform divorce bill for the different State Legislatures to enact into law. The views embodied in this bill were far in advance of the laws of a majority of the States.

Potentially the most important of the movements of the early years of the twentieth century was that which enlisted the more general and hearty support and co-operation of the laymen of the churches in the various forms of aggressive church work. Among the most conspicuous of these was the one to organize the men of the churches for direct Christian labor, for more systematic giving and in general for more efficient service in the kingdom of our common Lord. Under various names these organizations became widespread among the men of all Churches. Laymen's Conferences, Missionary Societies, Bible Classes increased with remarkable rapidity. Their purpose was to promote Bible study, increase attendance at church services, maintain altars of prayer in every home, enlarge contributions for missions, especially foreign missions. Under the auspices of the Laymen's Movement so-called "missionary campaigns" were held in many towns and cities throughout the country between 1906 and 1909. The churches of God were not indifferent to these Movements, and they were earnestly admonished to become more active in all these lines of Christian endeavor. And while very little was done by way of organized effort, the churches felt the stimulating influence of these Movements. In eastern Pennsylvania conventions were attended by a number of representatives of churches of God in 1908 and 1909. And in November, 1909, the churches of God in and around Harrisburg, and as far distant as Altoona, following a Laymen's Missionary Convention held in Harrisburg, Pa., held a Conference in the Fourth Street Bethel. No formal organizations were effected, but in the West Virginia Eldership, North, an "Elders' Association" was formed in 1904, and the laymen of the East Pennsylvania Eldership organized a "Laymen's Association" in 1909. The purpose of this organization was to form "a closer bond of Christian fellowship and to secure greater usefulness in furthering the cause of our Lord." More than any other of these popular Movements, that of the Adult Bible Class appealed most generally to the churches of God, and scores of them were organized in the different Elderships. The Ohio Eldership in 1908 "spent some time in discussing its use in the church, and passed a resolution requesting the ministers to organize adult Bible classes in all their Sunday-schools where possible." The organization of the churches of God in Indiana of the character of a Chautauqua, in 1905 became the "Inter-State Assembly," to be participated in by active workers in missionary, Sunday-school and other organizations. It was contemplated to make it in a general sense "a real help to the churches of God." Strong endorsements of this project were received not only from the Indiana Eldership, but also the West Virginia, the Ohio, the Illinois and the East Pennsylvania Elderships.

With the rapid increase in wealth came enlarged benefactions. In proportion to their material substance it is safe to assume that the churches of God donate as largely to religious, educational and benevolent institutions as does the membership of other Churches. They can not compete with the larger and richer Churches, nor with the individual millionaires of foreign faiths. Yet between 1905 and 1910 they challenge admiration for their liberality. It was a period of munificent giving. Carnegie gave $10,000,000 "to hasten the abolition of war and establish a lasting world-peace;" $10,000,000 additional to the endowment of Carnegie Institution at Washington; $1,250,000 "in furtherance of philanthropies at his Scottish birthplace;" $1,250,000 for a "Hero Fund Foundation for Life-savers in Germany." John Stuart Kennedy made a bequest of $5,000,000 to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church. Mrs. Russell Sage in 1907 "set aside $10,000,000 for the Endowment of the Sage Foundation." In February, 1907, John D. Rockefeller "announced a gift of $32,000,000 to the General Education Board." Along side of these princely gifts others seem insignificant, such as Carnegie's of $12,500 to Findlay College's new endowment of $50,000, completed in 1910. John Miller, of Linglestown, Dauphin county, Pa., a retired farmer, son of Andrew Miller, who died April 29, 1909, created a fund of $25,000 for the benefit of six churches on the old Dauphin circuit. Mary E. Heckendorn, Landisburg, Perry county, Pa., in 1905, bequeathed to the General Eldership $200.00 for foreign missions. On June 12, 1905, Findlay College was guaranteed $20,000 by a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership to endow the President's Chair. This must not be accepted as an exhaustive list of bequests and gifts by members of the churches of God during this period.

A number of the "movements" of this period, as some of earlier periods, were of a non-denominational, or inter-denominational, character, and thus served to promote a spirit of concord and conciliation between Churches. This was especially true of the Young People's Missionary Movement in connection with the Y. P. S. C. E. Unofficially the churches of God were interested in this movement. When the First International Convention, under the direction of the Y. P. M. M. of the United States and Canada, was held at Pittsburg, Pa., March 10-12, 1908, representatives of churches of God were in attendance. The Convention was discussed and reported in The Advocate, and it was claimed that its "effects will be felt in many different ways; but the way it cemented the different Churches in one bond of brotherly love is probably the best and greatest result." The Movement had been organized July 18, 1902, and six years later was fully equipped for world-wide mission work, being "a Movement of the Mission Boards of a number of Churches." The effect predicted in a measure followed, in the intenser feeling of amity and unity between these Churches. The inter-denominational Sunday-School Conventions had the same tendency. The World's Sixth Sunday-School Convention was held at Washington, D. C., May 19-24, inclusive, in 1910. Unofficially churches of God manifested their interest, and sent representatives there. Denominations between which there was a degree of doctrinal unity and similarity of polity naturally began to discuss the problem of organic unity. This was true of the Congregational, the Methodist Protestant and the United Brethren Churches in January, 1905. The Congregationalists, however, through their National Council, adopted principles, or a "platform," which "only means co-operation, or federation, within prescribed limits. It does not contemplate organic union of the Churches." In the Fall of 1905 the movement to secure "federal union between the different bodies of the Reformed family of Churches" was well under way. A convention was held in New York at this time for the purpose of "securing official Church Federation among all Protestant denominations." It contemplated a "General Council" in which the denominations "approving of the purpose and plan of the organization" were to be represented. It was specifically provided "that no phraseology contained in the plan of union shall be construed to imply any doctrinal basis whatever." In 1909 the initial steps were taken to reunite the Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church, and Peace Commissioners were named by both Churches. These Commissioners met at Chicago the last of January, 1909, and their "deliberations were eminently satisfactory," and prospects for final union very hopeful. These various movements were generally discussed in religious periodicals, including The Church Advocate, thus keeping the churches of God fully informed of their nature and progress. No official action on the question of the union or the federation of the churches of God with other religious bodies was at any time seriously proposed. The Advocate favored neither, and its position was approved by the non-action of the Annual Elderships and the General Eldership. It was held that such a position was in no wise in conflict with the earlier teachings on "union," which was a prominent item in the platform of Winebrenner and his co-laborers. The union or federation of Churches is consistent with sectarianism, against which earnest protest was always made. It is not the Christian union of the word of God, and so is not in harmony with the platform of the churches of God.

With all this activity and earnest spirit of co-operation the fruits of Christian labor were somewhat disappointing. Forecasts based on current conclusions were pessimistic. The editor of "The Missionary Review of the World" in June, 1908, wrote on "The Forecast of a Spiritual Panic," and gave "four signs of a coming crisis." They were grave signals, but were declared "certainly to exist." Revivals were not numerous, and generally limited in results. Already at an earlier date, though speaking for England, yet true of the United States, Dr. Joseph Parker said: "It is well known that many Christians have come to have a distaste for the word 'revival' when used with reference to religious work." And while it was conceded by the ministers of the churches of God, as expressed in 1907, "that there is a great need for the old-time revivals," it was also the belief that "the day for old-time revivals is nearly past." The Torrey-Alexander evangelistic meeting in Philadelphia, which began February 4, 1906, was generally known as a "revival." This influence was felt throughout a radius of a hundred miles, and a number of revivals in churches of God were attributed to it. That there was but a small per centum of increase in the membership of the churches of God during 1906 is shown by the absence of reports of extensive revivals. The same is true for 1908 and 1909. It can also be inferred from the general statistics for the United States. In 1906 "the increase of the whole communicant body was 2.72 per cent. In 1908 the total increase in church membership was 1.5 per cent. The method of conducting services for the conversion of the unsaved had materially changed with the ministers and churches of God. The mourners' bench in many churches was practically abandoned. In others it was optional. "The easier method" of rising in the congregation, lifting up the hand, or kneeling at the pew was substituted. Nowhere was the same stress laid upon this form of making the great decision that was almost universal half a century and more ago. It was sometimes defended in The Advocate, and insisted upon, as the preferable way for a sinner to make the most important decision in the history of a human soul. Yet editorially the question, "Is it necessary to use the mourners' bench in revival meetings?" was thus answered April 3, 1907: "No forms are necessary. We have always emphatically taught that the vital point is conversion, regeneration. To this end repentance and faith are necessary; but no posture, measure, form or physical demonstration."

That results were somewhat meager does not justify the conclusion that the churches of God were not making progress. They were being confirmed and strengthened, conditions were improved and their various interests placed on a better basis. Church extension work was also being done with commendable zeal and liberality. Only the lack of means prevented the planting of many churches in new localities, and in new States. In Idaho a few families located in and near Payette, Canyon county, in 1905, which had been members of churches in Carroll county, Iowa, and at Grand Valley, Colorado. In March, 1905 A. Wilson paid them a visit, and preached for them. He found ten former members of churches of God. He returned and preached for two weeks in the dwelling house of S. B. Alspach and in a Hall, until June 23, 1907, when he organized a church of eleven members, of which S. B. Alspach and H. S. Wayne were the elders, and G. P. Abernathey, deacon. By December, 1907, the membership had increased to twenty, but the church had no pastor. In February, 1908, L. T. Fredericks, of Nebraska, conducted a successful revival meeting, at which twenty-nine converts were fellowshiped. On February 12th, S. B. Alspach bought "a church building formerly occupied by the M. E. Church," which the church later secured, and after needed repairs dedicated as the first Bethel of the Church of God in Idaho. December 12, 1908, W. T. Turpin reached Payette to become pastor of the church. A gracious revival followed in January, 1909, during which twenty-five more were fellowshiped, bringing the total membership up to seventy-four. An unfortunate schism occurred in the church during this year, growing out of the W. G. M. S. troubles, and resulting in a lawsuit which threatened for awhile to destroy the church; but which was finally adjusted, and unity and peace restored. At Moscow, Latah county, Idaho, and several other points, A. Wilson preached at different times, and regarded prospects good for establishing churches.

The work in Colorado was not neglected. In May, 1905, W. H. Cross went to the assistance of W. T. Turpin in a meeting at Buffalo, where Church of God families from Kansas had located. Other points afforded good openings for mission work, at one of which G. Swan preached in January, 1907. D. Long was doing mission work at several points in Prowers county in the latter part of the Winter of 1906-7. There were two organized churches in the county. I. H. Greene did considerable preaching in Wyoming during the early part of this period. Jesse Huddle, of Iowa, preached some at Canton, S. Dak., in 1906. H. L. Soule's church was mainly a church of God in doctrine; but it was not in fellowship with an Eldership. Better success attended efforts to establish the Church in North Dakota. J. W. Cabbage located near Hazelton, Emmons county, in April, 1906, and began mission work. Also in a school-house 7 miles distant, in September, 1907. Here he had a revival in December, 1907, with about thirty converts, and on December 22nd he gave the hand of fellowship to thirty-four, completing the organization

January 1, 1908, with a membership of thirty-seven. It was the first church of God in North Dakota, called the church of God at Pleasant Valley, Emmons county, N. Dak. A Y. P. S. C. E. of fifty members was organized, with Mrs. J. W. Cabbage as President. C. D. Bradley having temporarily located in Montana in 1909 reported great destitution prevalent everywhere as to preaching, with the most encouraging prospects for church work, if he could be supported. The fields everywhere seemed ready for the reapers of the Church of God; but they could not be kept in the field to gather in the ripe grain. This applied to Kentucky. In the Fall of 1906, after the Missouri Eldership, of which he was a member, G. L. Chapman revisited southern Kentucky, where he had organized two churches in 1904. He found them "all at work like busy bees," with "a flourishing prayer-meeting, and a house of worship built," which he dedicated October 14, 1906. It was the "first house of worship of the Church of God in Kentucky," and was deeded to the General Eldership. In July, 1907, Chapman was called to Nashville, Tenn., to preach, as he understood, at a revival service; but on his arrival there, July 20th, he found a church inquiring "about the Church of God and its doctrines." After preaching ten days, on Saturday evening, August 3rd, he organized the church of God in Nashville, Tenn., with a "pastor, two elders, three deacons, two deaconesses, a clerk and treasurer, and seventy-six members." It was the result of a division in the Free Baptist Church growing out of the preaching of the pastor, L. B. Shannon. The church and the pastor were received into the Missouri Eldership, August 15, 1907, and Shannon was reappointed pastor in October, 1907, and granted a Certificate of Ordination. J. A. Swanson preached at Tennessee Ridge, Tenn., in November, 1909, where a revival followed, with thirty converts.

It is the general belief, that no thing so effectually weakens and destroys the power for usefulness in a religious body as contentions, divisions and schisms. Not only is fellowship broken, but confidence is destroyed, and that good repute with the world is lost which is a condition of success. Unfortunately this was the case to a deplorable extent in the Oregon and Washington Eldership during this period. The division became an open rupture in 1907-9. In the former year a rupture took place in the Eldership, and in 1908 two Elderships were called, and intense feeling prevailed. In 1909, an independent Eldership was organized by those who withdrew from the session appointed to be held by the General Eldership in 1909. Some work was done at Portland, Oregon; but the expected organization of a church was not effected. In other localities the churches languished, so that at the close of this period the cause had suffered serious loss. In Douglas county, Washington, where no work had previously been done, E. M. Kirkpatrick, of Indian Territory, began preaching in 1907. He located in this central county in 1905, and after becoming somewhat acquainted began preaching, and had fair success, having had fourteen conversions at a revival he held. This was east of the ground occupied by the ministers of the Eldership. The fields of labor had increased to eleven in 1907, two of them missions, which were supplied by the one party to the schism, while the other party made eight appointments, but on the same territory in the main. There were eight fields in 1905, when the Eldership was united; but in 1909 the remnant which was left after the schism made but four assignments. In consequence of these conditions the Board of Missions of the General Eldership made no appointments to the Oregon and Washington territory.

The Nebraska work was largely sterilized, according to reports submitted. Each year the note was "spirituality of churches not what we could wish it to be;" "the churches in some parts are in a lethargic condition;" "spirituality had been at a low ebb." This was relieved in 1909 by the assurance that many of "the churches which had been at a low ebb were increasing in spirituality." There was also quite a healthy zeal in the Eldership for the various interests it represented. It was steadily urged that a higher standard of religion should be preached, and then lived up to. "A deeper sense of the great responsibility resting upon ministers" was insisted upon. The burden of missions was felt, and what the Eldership could do with its limited means it was desirous to do. The help of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership was strongly solicited. Ministers were incited to greater zeal in revival efforts and in teaching the doctrines of the Church. The number of active ministers was inadequate, and so the fields had to be rearranged, and varied from six to fourteen. But nine of the fourteen in 1907 were unsupplied. The women were active in organizing Woman's Missionary Societies, and also a State W. M. S. Work was being carried on in the following counties: Logan, Lincoln, McPherson, Custer, Saline, Polk, Keyapaha, Gage, Lyon, Clay, Richardson and Thurston.

Under somewhat depressing conditions the devoted ministers and the true and loyal churches in Kansas continued the work of church upbuilding and church extension. Efforts were made to do mission work in Oklahoma and Colorado, but without the funds to support the missionaries. Even the fields in Kansas could not always be supplied. The Board of Missions of the General Eldership kept several men constantly in its employ in the territory of the Kansas Eldership, which included Colorado and a strip 50 miles wide in northern Oklahoma. Bartlesville, Oklahoma, was thus supplied by J. W. Bloyd during this period. O. A. Newlin was the General Missionary on that part of the frontier field. The Ft. Scott church was favored with the services successively of J. W. Primrose, W. W. Richmond and T. M. Funk, under whose labors the interests of the church were zealously cared for. In Ft. Scott mission work was successful in the northern suburb, where in February, 1905, J. W. Primrose began his labors in a schoolhouse. In April he began a seven weeks' revival in a tent, at which twenty-eight persons were converted. He secured "an old stone building," in which he organized "the second church of God in Ft. Scott (Belltown)," with twelve members. The number of fields of labor varied from nine to fifteen, as some of them often consisted of single churches which were supplied from Ft. Scott, or ministers who could largely support themselves. Possibly the attempt to take care of too much territory operated against successful work, for in 1909 the Eldership realized that "the work is not up to the standard we would like to see." In the northern parts of the State there was almost nothing done during this period; but in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma the work was in a promising condition. In District No. 3, Indian Territory, and Woods and Woodward counties, Oklahoma, churches were being established. In Kansas the fields of labor were in Bourbon, Barber, Crawford, Cherokee, Chautauqua, Elk, Edwards, Labette, Pratt, Stafford and Sumner counties, being in the southern three tiers of counties. The interest in current practical questions on the part of ministers and churches is revealed in the topics discussed at the meetings of the Ministerial Association. Among these were "The Duty of a Pastor to the Church." "How Do We Know That We Are Saved?" "Duty of Preaching the Doctrines of the Church." "Best Methods of Promoting a Revival." "Preaching to the Young." "Care of the Young Converts." The missionary spirit was prominent, and the sisters interested themselves in a State W. M. organization, as well as in forming local societies.

An open field for work was found in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and the Board of Missions of the General Eldership manifested a disposition to assist liberally in occupying it. E. M. Hickman was the missionary in eastern Oklahoma in 1905-6-7, and in central Oklahoma in 1908. H. W. Allen labored in western Oklahoma in 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909. And in 1909 J. D. Sutton was the missionary in south central Oklahoma, and C. H. Ballinger in north central Oklahoma, with J. W. Burns in eastern Oklahoma in 1908. Burns had been the missionary to the Indian Territory in 1907. The experiment of holding a camp-meeting was tried by Allen on his mission field in western Oklahoma, near Burmah, in August, 1905. There were at this time in the Oklahoma and Indian Territory Eldership fourteen organized churches. In 1907 it reported fifteen, one having been organized at Francis, Indian Territory, by J. D. Henson in the Winter of 1906-7. Revival work was carried on by E. K. Howe in Woods county, western Oklahoma in the Winter of 1905, and a number were converted. At Indianapolis, Custer county, under the care of B. Ober, a house of worship was erected, and it was dedicated on the third Sunday in December, 1907. Through the energetic labors of P. L. French a house of worship was built near Cleo, Woods county, which was dedicated by J. W. Bloyd July 19, 1908. B. Ober assisted in the services.

The Texas and Arkansas Eldership was stimulated in its endeavors to strengthen the things that remained and to extend its borders by the generous help of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. It had in its employ in Arkansas D. S. Summit in the southern part of the State in 1906, and J. H. Whittington in the northern part. It retained Whittington during the three succeeding years. He conducted a camp-meeting, which began July 20, 1908, at Grand Prairie, Arkansas. At Charleston, county seat of Franklin county, Ark., he succeeded in organizing a church of eleven members in 1907. He labored here under serious competition, as the meetings were held in a union house, also occupied by the Presbyterians and the Christians. Whittington was misnamed by the Presbyterian minister as "a Godite preacher." In the same county J. T. Shelby opened several new points. But as he came under the influence of the "Holiness Doctrine," charges were preferred against him for "preaching and practicing the so-called holiness doctrine." These were sustained, and his Certificate of Ordination was withdrawn. This schismatical doctrine was unflinchingly opposed. There was a division of views on the order of observing the ordinances, and this led to occasional controversies. The teachings of the Church of Christ on baptism made the question of the subjects and design of baptism a timely one for discussion before the churches. The support of ministers was very limited, and this was a frequent topic at meetings of the Ministerial Association. While in common with all the Elderships much active interest was evinced in the question of ordaining men to the ministry. Occasionally such abstruse questions as election and predestination, or the office of the Holy Spirit were debated.

In quietness and dispassionate earnestness the ministers of the colored Arkansas Eldership pursued their labors. The General Board of Missions gave them some encouragement, as S. P. Peters, colored, was in its employ in 1906. The practice of fasting for religious purposes was still retained and the zeal so characteristic of the race was not wholly quenched by the serious obstacles encountered, nor by limited success. The fields of labor were small and weak, but the desire to enlarge the occupied territory induced the churches to make sacrifices. Some funds were raised in 1905-6 to help to support a missionary. In 1906 the missionary was reappointed, and the two circuits were supplied with pastors. A better financial system was put into effect in 1907, and a missionary was elected in 1908, to be supported by the churches. In 1909 two mission points were to be supplied by the Standing Committee. There were promising openings in the Indian Territory, which the ministers were desirous to enter, so as to enlarge the territory of the Eldership. Considerable interest was manifested in the Ministerial Association, maintained under disadvantageous conditions.

A strong and persistent effort was made to advance the work in Missouri. Generally two men were employed by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership each year. In 1905 D. L. Cox was appointed to Sullivan county, in the northern part of the State, and W. E. Kelly in the central part of the State. G. L. Chapman in 1906-1908 was assigned to the south-eastern Missouri mission. He was general missionary of the Missouri Eldership during several years, as the Eldership manifested deep interest in Church extension work. In 1907-9 J. F. Allman was the appointee of the General Board in south-western Missouri. James F. Sutton was laboring at Keystone and other points in 1908; while in 1909 he was the missionary in northern Missouri, as was D. L. Cox. The reported results were not commensurate with the labors and the means devoted to the work, as judged by the published reports. Chapman had successful revivals in Saline and other counties in 1905. In St. Louis the church was in a critical condition, partly as the effect of an effort on the part of Mrs. M. B. Woodworth to get possession of the property. When the Bethel was deeded by her to the Eldership she reserved the right of "spiritual direction during her lifetime." This the courts decided to be "synonymous with physical possession." And as this was refused her, she made an effort in 1905 to gain physical possession by legal process. At Johnson City, under the missionary labors of O. A. Newlin, a successful woods meeting was conducted, beginning July 4, 1907, which resulted in the organization of a church of eleven members, increased to twenty a fortnight later. G. W. Wyatt had begun work there in 1906. At Crane the church began building operations in August, 1907, when $1,000.00 were secured for that purpose. On the south-west Missouri mission a new Bethel was built at McCullah, near Baxter, which was dedicated by J. F. Allman in 1907. A church of fourteen members was organized August 11, 1907. In the Fall of 1906 a church was formed at Leadwood, and the building of a Bethel decided upon. S. A. Rambo conducted a revival meeting at Lakeview, beginning February 15, 1908, at which there were nineteen conversions, and on February 26th a church of twenty-two members was organized. The number of fields of labor varied from ten to twelve, according to the supply of active ministers. Even when there were twelve appointees, some churches remained unsupplied. In 1909 J. B. Shannon, Nashville, Tenn., withdrew from the Eldership, and the work in that city went down. Mission interests were diligently looked after by the State W. M. S., with which the Eldership was in cordial sympathy. An effort was made in 1908 to stimulate interest by the holding of a camp-meeting near Versailles, Morgan county, near the center of the State. J. W. Primrose was in charge, and continued the meeting for three weeks. Later the same year he used a tent for revival services, during which he witnessed thirty-five conversions. A camp-meeting was also held at Linn Grove, from September 25 to October 10, 1909, conducted by Lum Neal and Samuel Van Meter. The results in the way of conversions were disappointing, but God's children were edified and confirmed, and the observance of the three ordinances was a feast. The general conditions throughout the Eldership were reported in 1907 as "in better condition than they had been for several years," although the net increase of the churches up to 1910 was quite small.

The missionary spirit in Iowa was strong and healthy. The W. M. S. met regularly at the same time and place with the Eldership. The circuits usually included several mission fields, toward the support of which missionary funds were appropriated. Work of this character was done in Missouri, Minnesota, North and South Dakota. The number of fields of labor varied from fifteen to twenty-four, some of them being unsupplied each year. Local Pentecostal meetings were held in a few instances, but were no longer under Eldership auspices. L. F. Chamberlin held one at Harmony in 1908. Ministerial Associations were regularly held prior to the Annual Eldership sessions. Many of the subjects discussed originated in the local or general conditions which prevailed in the churches of God during this period. No Eldership was more vitally interested in such questions than was the Iowa Eldership. Hence, such topics as the following were discussed: "The unity or oneness of the Church;" "Are the demands of Elderships arbitrary, or simply co-operative?" "What do we as a Church need most in the line of co-operative law?" Local conditions would suggest the discussion of the question of "Demitting the ministry;" or, "The relation of baptism to regeneration;" or, "The voter's relation to political parties;" or, "The time limit of the pastorate." The five-year term was thought to be advisable for the older ministers; a shorter term for the younger men. Other topics related to the "dangers of the ministry of the churches of God;" revivals, and "how best to promote them;" "care of converts," and the "financial side of religious work." But the fruits of the devoted labors and self-sacrifice of the ministry were somewhat disappointing. While the churches were taking commendable interest in their spiritual and material advancement, there is little evidence of successful aggressive work. Under the pastoral labors of E. E. Heltebride extensive repairs, at a cost of $1,900.00, were made to the house of worship at Alice, and rededicatory services were held December 2, 1906. The Bethel at North Bend was destroyed by fire about midnight of November 15, 1906, involving a loss of $5,000.00. But with that unfaltering spirit and intrepid courage before which timidity and wavering disappear, the church at once prepared plans to rebuild. And before the twelve months were past, on October 14, 1907, E. E. Heltebride dedicated the new house of worship. The pastor, J. C. Keford, labored with meritorious zeal in this work. In Sunday-school work the ministers and churches in Iowa were generally quite active. Societies of young people received more or less attention; but as the interest in foreign missions was supreme, the work of the W. M. S. largely eclipsed all other forms of church activity.

The Illinois Eldership during this period devoted its energies assiduously to the upbuilding and strengthening of the different churches and fields of labor; the perfecting of its financial system, and the advancement of its various auxiliary organizations. It continued its two Pentecostal meetings, one in the northern and one in the southern part of the territory. The tent for evangelistic services during the Summer was generally in use, and was at the service of any pastor and church which desired it and made itself responsible for expenses. Deep interest was manifested in the Y. P. S. C. E. organization and work. C. T. Ishler, Fred. M. Newlin and other leaders in this form of activity were enthusiastically at work. Annual conventions were held. A few new societies were formed, and the Eldership Union was a live organization. The Society was regarded as "a powerful force for establishing our young people in the faith of the Church of God." There were fifteen local societies in 1909. Important questions bearing on the interests of the churches were carefully canvassed at the meetings of the Ministerial Association, which were regularly held. Some of these were: "Is the Church of God a Divine Institution?" "Should the Church of God Defend its Reputation?" "The Model Pastor;" "The Model Church;" "What is a Revival?" "How to Promote a Revival;" "Why Do We Fail in Promoting Revivals?" For several years an Eldership camp-meeting was held 4 miles north of Decatur. I. S. Richmond had the supervision of the one held in 1908. The one held at Sangamon in 1907, conducted by J. W. Bobb, was to be "an old-fashioned one." It was to be a "State camp." The more frequent observance of the ordinances was deemed important to the spiritual progress of the churches. Besides, the condition of the country churches was giving the ministry much concern. It was an increasingly interesting and difficult problem. So little aggressive missionary work had been undertaken that in 1908 the question was agitated, "Shall we open a Home Mission this year?" One general worker was kept in the field, those named being W. R. Johnson, in 1905; L. T. Frederick, in 1906; C. A. Schaaf, in 1908. The largest number of fields of labor was in 1906, when there were twenty-one. The church at Martinsville made improvements to its house of worship which cost $1,500.00. An addition was built to the Bethel to accommodate the flourishing Sunday-school. A baptistery was installed, and a new piano. The pastor, C. T. Ishler, secured the services of Geo. M. Hulme for the rededication on August 1, 1909. The total church membership increased from 1,196 in 1907, to 1,500 in 1909.

An orderly and constructive purpose is evident in the work of the ministers and churches of the Indiana Eldership during the period of 1905 to 1910. There were clear-thinking and well-poised men at the helm. Interesting parallels are noticeable between old days and new. There was a lack of ministers to cover the territory with efficient laborers, and so not only had fields to be merged, but some remained unsupplied. The number varied from nineteen in 1905 to fourteen in 1909. The highest number of organized churches reported was forty-one, in 1907. There was fluctuation in their spiritual condition, as judged by the Committees on State of Religion. "In some places bad; in some places pretty good," was the report in 1906. "Spiritual condition poor, and on the decline," was the conclusion in 1908. But improvement was noticed in 1909. There was an expressed "desire to become more firmly rooted and grounded in the truth." They were not inhospitable to new ideas, and accepted innovations which their judgment approved with cordiality. There was occasional friction in the churches, adding proof to the old truth that next to the quarrel in a family there is nothing quite so sharp and earnest as a contest in a small church. Several of these controversies were appealed to the Eldership. With little evidence of Church extension work, there was praiseworthy activity. This is clear from the work done by the W. M. S., and the interest taken in the organization of Y. P. S. C. E. in a number of local churches. In 1908 a convention of these societies was held, and a State organization effected. The Eldership Assembly awakened a degree of enthusiasm which was full of promise; but it was destitute of the elements which are necessary to insure permanence. Pentecostal services were held under Eldership direction in connection with the Assembly in 1908. There was a well-conducted camp-meeting held in 1908, near Sugar Grove Bethel, under the direction of M. W. Johnson, pastor. Efforts were made to revive the work at Anderson, and I. W. Markley and H. H. Sphier were authorized in 1905 to investigate conditions with that end in view; but Anderson does not appear on the list of churches in 1909. The Eel River Bethel, near Roann, Wabash county, was sold in 1905. At Auburn, DeKalb county, a new house of worship was built at a cost of $4,200.00, under the labors of H. G. Herendeen, the young and energetic pastor. It was dedicated February 26, 1905, by M. S. Newcomer. Probably one of the finest new houses of worship in the General Eldership was built at Idaville, White county, in 1908, when E. M. Love was pastor of the church. It cost $9,187.00, and was dedicated December 27, 1908, by C. I. Brown, assisted by O. A. Newlin. The Idaville church confirmed the general truth that a local fight almost always ends in benefit when all the membership in unison take part in it. The attempt to revive church work at Ft. Wayne, Allen county, had an auspicious beginning. H. H. Sphier was the missionary, and began work in a Hall in November, 1907. He found seventy-five persons in the city who had been members of the Church. On Sunday morning, August 25, 1908, "the new church was organized with thirty-three charter members." Immediate steps were taken to raise funds to build a house of worship.

The evidences of healthy life and activity in the Michigan Eldership from 1905 to 1910 are mainly found in the work done in the use of a tent, and in the Ministerial Association. But in the latter much of the time was devoted to exegesis. The practical questions of practical ministers were not much in evidence. Thus at the meeting in September, 1906, the only question discussed was whether it is necessary to the progress of the churches of God to use Church of God literature in our Sunday-schools. It does not presume that the literature published by the General Eldership was not patronized, nor that the ministry of the Eldership was opposed to it. The journals of the Eldership are witness to the contrary. The texts of Scripture on which exegeses were delivered were not of a practical character, but may have had some relation to erroneous views which were being propagated, such as sanctification, heavenly citizenship, the baptism of the eunuch, and bodily mutilations for spiritual ends. There was usually a General Missionary, though with inadequate support to enable him to do real mission work. Indeed heavy sacrifices were demanded of the ministers who were pastors of the five to seven fields of labor which were maintained. The churches and ministers were headed right, but the tides of influence were not propitious. Evangelistic work with the use of a tent, in 1907, gave promise of good results. In June, 1907, J. E. Palmer and G. Andrey began their work at Beaver Creek. They remained there several weeks, and witnessed a number of conversions, and organized a church. In July they were at Rock Lake, and "had victory all through the meeting." August 2nd they began a tent-meeting at Berten Lake, and "the Lord blessed their labors with a number of souls, and a church was organized, and F. Spaler appointed to look after the work." A two weeks' meeting was held, beginning August 17th, at Stanwood. This campaign exerted a good influence.

The influence of Findlay College was felt to a clearly recognizable extent in the Ohio Eldership. Quite a proportion of the pastors were connected with the College as professors and students, or had taken a course at that institution. This promoted unity of sentiment, and fostered a spirit of loyalty under the leadership of the President of the College. The pulpit maintained its hold upon the churches quite well, if not as well as before the present deluge of newspapers, magazines and public libraries. The fields of labor varied very little from 1905 to 1910, being thirty-one in 1906, and twenty-nine in 1909 for 1910. Several of these were missions, two in Findlay in addition to the two churches. At Fostoria a mission was partly sustained by the Eldership. While the number of fields of labor did not increase during this period, the total church membership did, reaching a total of 2,231 in 1909. In 1905 there were 73 preaching places, 72 organized churches, 77 houses of worship, and 434 accessions. The interest in Y. P. S. C. E. work was general, and an effort was made to have a society organized in each church. This, however, seemed impossible, as there were only fourteen societies in 1905. The movement was regarded as "educational and practical in awakening our young people to their responsibility in home and foreign missions." The Ministerial Association was maintained, and contributed materially to the awakening of interest in practical questions bearing on Church growth. Church extension, Church federation, evangelization, men's Bible classes, the Sunday-school as an evangelizing agency, the evangelistic methods and other practical questions of interest to the churches were topics for discussion. Material interests received some attention. The Pleasant Grove church spent $539.00 in repairs on its church house, under the pastoral oversight of W. E. Turner. The rededication took place November 12, 1905, the pastor officiating, with preaching three preceding evenings by O. O. Tracy and J. W. Johnson. What had long been known as "The Synagogue," now Vermillion Bethel, Ashland county, after extensive remodeling and repairing, under Leroy De Hays, was rededicated on October 14, 1906, when T. H. McAfee preached the sermons. Near Hamler, Henry county, Zion's Bethel was repaired during the Summer of 1906. It was rededicated September 30th, when C. I. Brown officiated. The church at Rising Sun, in the Spring of 1906, realized the need of enlarging its church building to accommodate the Sunday-school, especially for the primary work. Under the leadership of its faithful pastor, C. H. Gatchell, this was accomplished by building and addition, or "wing," 26x26 feet. The dedication took place December 30, 1906. The services being in charge of J. F. Slough, who had been pastor there for six years. During the Spring of 1908 the church at Wooster, under the pastorate of S. D. Harlan, who had the reputation of being "a good general and a careful financier," spent $3,000.00 on the extensive repairs made to their house of worship. The dedicatory services were held May 3, 1908, in charge of C. I. Brown, assisted by C. F. Raach. A new Bethel was built at Ohio City in the Summer of 1909, at a cost of $3,600.00. The faithful pastor was C. H. Gatchell. Prior to the dedication, November 18, 1909, S. F. Banders and J. F. Slough preached three nights, and O. A. Newlin officiated on Sabbath. The ministers and church actively engaged in the local option campaign in 1907-8, resulting in the passage by the Legislature of a local option law. Among its provisions was one requiring the State official to order an election whenever thirty-five per centum of the voters petitioned for it. Under this provision thirty-eight counties voted out the saloons, with an aggregate majority of 44,247.

"The statistical foot-rule applied to the walls of Zion" is repudiated by the "Homiletic Review." There is a "deeper valuation that is gaining ground," it is claimed. "In the kingdom of God results are weighed, not counted." This in the main depends on what the statistician is after, and his honesty in handling results. The West Pennsylvania Eldership made no mistake when in 1907 it gave these statistics: Appointments, 56; church houses, 48; organized churches, 52; conversions during the year 1906-7, 633; accessions, 463; total membership, 2,387. The conclusion was that "the Church is making progress." In 1909 it was claimed that "the churches are still making material progress. Old churches are being strengthened, and new ones are being organized." There were 25 fields of labor, 52 churches, 54 church houses, 2,209 members. There was considerable mission work done among the foreign population by Jacob Luchansky, and several churches organized. An earnest missionary spirit prevailed, manifested in the activity of the W. M. S. and its conventions in connection with the Ministerial Association, and in topics discussed, such as "Apostolic Revivals," "Revival Methods," "How to Interest Children in Missions," "Mission Work in the Coke Regions." The Christian Endeavor interests also received systematic attention, and gave rise to questions for discussion, such as: "How to Care for the Converts," "Preaching Our Distinctive Doctrines," "Our Young Men." In May, 1907, the Standing Committee requested George M. Hulme and John H. Gross to open mission work in Franklin, Venango county. These were two "capable, earnest and energetic young men." As Church of God families from churches in the county were locating in Franklin, it seemed an auspicious time to begin mission work. Their efforts were successful, and a fine house of worship was built in the Summer of 1908. Connected with it is a good parsonage, which was bought with the lot. The corner-stone was laid May 24, 1908, by S. G. Yahn. The building was dedicated October 18, 1908, when C. H. Forney preached the morning sermon, and S. G. Yahn the evening sermon. T. S. Woods, J. W. Whisler and J. S. Boyd were also present and participated in the services. An extensive revival followed, during which many souls were saved. At Pine Hill, Vanango county, a new Bethel was built under the labors of George M. Hulme. It was dedicated on December 22, 1907, John H. Whisler preaching in the morning from John iv. 24, and J. L. Updegraph in the afternoon and evening. The cost of the house was $3,000.00. In 1908 the Ministerial Association and Missionary Convention had these questions on its program: "Essentials of Biblical Revivals," "The Spirit of Missions," "Joys of Mission Work." This year successful work was done at several points. The house of worship at Hill View, under the pastoral oversight of F. O. Eakin, was extensively repaired, and on July 26, 1908, was rededicated by W. Harris Guyer. Pastor J. C. Cunningham succeeded in having the Maple Summit house of worship repaired during the Summer of 1908, which was rededicated August 2, 1908, by W. Harris Guyer and J. G. Wise. At Ellwood City the church bought the house of worship owned by the Union Welsh church for $600.00. It received title on December 31, 1908, when the pastor, J. W. Whisler, on January 10, 1909, began a revival service, which continued to February 11th, with fifty-seven converts. On February 7th a church was organized of forty-one members. Repairs were made to the house, bringing its value up to $2,000.00. Whisler also in the early Fall of 1909 secured the use of a small church building at New Castle, where he organized a church soon after.

The West Virginia Eldership, North, made progress in temporal and spiritual interests. The pastors in their Ministerial Association discussed the greatest needs of the territory of the Eldership, the duties and responsibilities of a good pastor, the secret of soul-winning and kindred topics. The Bethel at Mt. Carmel, Greene county, Pa., was rededicated in December, 1906. Z. H. Yoder preached on the occasion. The church at McMechen, long known as the Gravel Street church, organized in 1871 by John Hickernell, built a fine, new brick house of worship, at a cost, lot and building, of $15,000.00, with a splendid organ costing $1,200.00, half of it paid by Andrew Carnegie. It was dedicated on April 26, 1908, C. H. Forney preaching morning and evening, and J. L. Updegraph in the afternoon. Under the pastoral labors of A. J. Stanley, the Pipe Creek church, Ohio, dedicated their new church building August 27, 1905. W. R. Covert delivered the morning sermon, and J. L. Lucas preached at 4 o'clock p. m. In Wetzel county, 5 miles from Proctor, on the farm of Meshack Yoho, called Highland, the highest point in the county, a house of worship was built and paid for by Bro. Yoho. It was dedicated on June 7, 1908, under the pastorate of J. L. Lucas. C. H. Forney preached on Saturday evening, Sunday morning and evening, and N. M. Anderson on Sunday afternoon. The church at Elm Grove, with W. W. Anderson as pastor, in the Summer of 1908 erected a new house of worship at a cost of $2,812.50, which was dedicated by C. I. Brown December 20th. Other ministers present and assisting in the services were N. M. Anderson, J. C. Beam, Z. H. Yoder and B. D. Eden.

There was far less doing in the territory of the West Virginia Eldership, South. Serious obstacles were encountered which hindered the progress of the work. Churches and ministers manifested an abiding interest in the progress of the Church; but their endeavors were less fruitful than in earlier years. Discussions of doctrine were in a measure superseding questions of practical theology. Yet such questions received prominence as: "How should a minister of the gospel carry himself to have the best Christian influence?" "What is the best method of conducting a revival, or an evangelistic, meeting?"

Intelligent interest was manifested in Christian Endeavor and Sunday-school work by the churches and ministers of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership. Conventions were annually held, and the International Convention of the Y. P. S. C. E., held at Baltimore, Md., in 1905, was attended by a number of active workers. The sisters were also active in missionary matters, having a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society which held annual conventions. The temporal interests of the churches were well cared for by faithful pastors. Under the labors of S. J. Montgomery the work of building a bethel at Sample's Manor, Washington county, was begun. It was brought to completion under the labors of S. A. Kipe, and was dedicated September 20, 1908, by L. F. Murray. At Woodsborough, Frederick county, the church bought a house of worship, put it in fine condition, and dedicated it August 8, 1909, during the pastorate of J. M. Carter. The preaching on the occasion was by C. H. Forney. A platform meeting in the afternoon was addressed by F. Y. Weidenhammer, J. A. Saxton and L. F. Murray. While W. S. Shimp was pastor at Germantown an addition was built to the bethel, and the house repaired, and rededicated October 17, 1909. V. K. Betts preached in the morning, and O. A. Newlin, Field Secretary of Findlay College, in the evening.

A live and earnest ministry is indicated by the work done during this period in the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The membership does not show a large net increase, as 7,223 were reported in 1905, and 7,655, in 1909. But accessions ranged from a little over 1,000 in 1908, to 582 in 1909. Losses were relatively large, occasioned by deaths, removals, dismissal for various reasons and purging of church records. Fields of labor increased from 58 in 1905, to 62 in 1909. Parsonages numbered 28 in 1905, and 32 in 1909. The interest in Christian Endeavor work was well maintained, and the local societies increased from 65 in 1905, to 70 in 1909. The women were quite active in missionary work, and new societies were organized each year and large amounts were collected. The total contributions by the churches for all purposes for the year ending October 1, 1910, were $88,149.17; for the year ending October 1, 1905, $64,314.49. The churches and ministers manifested a permanent interest in the temperance question as it was agitated by the Anti-Saloon League. Agents of this organization had access to many of the pulpits, and petitions to the Legislature were circulated at church services, praying for the passage of a local option law. The Church Advocate discussed the bills before the Legislature, and published the text. As the effort failed in 1905, 1907 and 1909, the friends of the measure, after each defeat, with renewed zeal resumed the fight for the next session. The Eldership each year elected two of the ministers to represent it on the Board of Trustees of the Anti-Saloon League, except in 1912. Sunday-school and C. E. Conventions were held annually, and were largely attended and enthusiastic. Two camp-meetings were held each year, both now under the control of Camp-meeting Associations, and having permanent grounds. The one at Center Manor, the other at Walnut Grove. The spiritual results were unimportant. Conversions were rather the exception. Extremists termed them "religious picnics." The opinion was widespread "that the camp-meeting has had its day; that it has outlived its usefulness, and that as a religious agency in our modern life there is no longer any place for it." Even the money panic of 1907 failed to check the spirit of improvement in the temporal interests of the churches, as may be seen in the building of new church houses and the repairing of old ones often at a cost exceeding that of new buildings years before. At Coalmont, Huntingdon county, where F. W. McGuire was the devoted pastor, the corner-stone of a new bethel was laid June 18, 1905, at which T. H. McAfee officiated. The building was completed at a cost of $1,100.00, and was dedicated December 3, 1905. C. H. Grove preached in the morning; J. T. Fleegal, in the afternoon, and J. A. Dettler in the evening. With J. A. Staub as the faithful shepherd, the flock at Fairview, York county, was led to repair the bethel, which was rededicated June 4, 1905, by G. Sigler. The church at Walnut Grove, Huntingdon county, under the pastorate of E. Myers, built a new bethel in the Summer of 1905. It was dedicated August 6, 1905, C. H. Forney preaching both sermons. J. T. Fleegal had charge of the finances. The house of worship at Suedberg, Schuylkill county, with W. H. Snyder as the energetic pastor, was repaired in the Summer of 1905. At the dedication in September, 1905, C. F. Reitzel preached the morning sermon, and T. H. McAfee, the evening sermon. Under the labors of the veteran missionary, O. J. Farling, the East Steelton house of worship, Dauphin county, was remodeled, and was rededicated August 20, 1905. C. H. Forney preached the morning sermon, and H. F. Hoover, the evening sermon. C. C. Bartels assisted in the services. At Pitman, Schuylkill county, the affectionate pastor was moved to repair the bethel which had not been used for several years, and had it ready for rededication September 10, 1905, when C. H. Forney preached morning and evening, W. S. Sturgen having occupied the pulpit on Saturday evening. The church at Lancaster, Lancaster county, made extensive improvements to its house of worship, which was quietly rededicated August 27, 1905, by the beloved pastor, J. W. Deshong. After much-needed improvements, the bethel at Orrstown, Franklin county, was rededicated November 19, 1905, by I. A. MacDannald. The zealous pastor was C. H. Helges. Through the persistent labors of J. D. Clark, pastor of the Dauphin circuit, Dauphin county, the church at Linglestown bought a lot near the center of the village on which the third bethel was built in the Summer of 1905. It was consecrated November 26, 1905, when C. H. Forney preached the dedicatory sermon in the morning; O. J. Farling, O. E. Houston and J. C. Forncrook conducted a platform service in the afternoon. I. A. MacDannald preached in the evening. At Wormleysburg, Cumberland county, a "neat and beautiful new bethel" was built under the labors of the efficient pastor, G. Sigler, which was dedicated April 1, 1906. The morning sermon was delivered by D. S. Shoop; the evening sermon by H. F. Hoover, and the afternoon platform service was in charge of J. C. Forncrook, H. S. Bickel and J. R. Stonesifer. The Maclay Street church, Harrisburg, was first known as the Kelker Street Mission, holding its services in the Hall of the Kelker Street Market House. In the Spring of 1906 the Board of Incorporation of the Eldership bought a lot on the corner of New Fourth and Maclay streets, for $2,975.00. The work was then placed in the hands of the Board of Church Extension. But in the Spring of 1908 it was turned over to the church, which proceeded to erect a commodious brick bethel, at a cost of $13,790.00. It was set apart for divine worship September 27, 1908, when the dedicatory sermon was preached by C. H. Forney. The afternoon meeting was addressed by C. I. Behney, S. N. Good and C. C. Bartels. The evening sermon was preached by J. C. Forncrook. In Altoona the Fairview mission was begun by the indomitable pastor of the First church, J. M. Waggoner, in 1906. His efforts were reinforced by the Board of Church Extension, and were so successful that on June 14, 1908, the new house of worship was dedicated by F. W. McGuire, assisted by the pastor and by J. A. Snyder. The bethel at Newville, Cumberland county, was extensively repaired in 1906, A. P. Stover being the aggressive pastor. It was re-opened September 2, 1906, when F. W. McGuire and C. H. Forney preached the sermons. At Six Mile Run (or Fairplay), Bedford county, the corner-stone of a new bethel was laid September 30, 1906, by J. M. Waggoner. The first bethel had been built in 1870. The second house was dedicated March 17, 1907, when J. A. Dettler preached in the morning and C. H. Grove in the evening. F. W. McGuire was the indefatigable pastor. Under the labors of W. H. Snyder the bethel at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, was repaired in the Summer of 1906, and dedicated August 12, 1906, by I. A. MacDannald. As a large proportion of the membership of the Progress church, Dauphin county, lived at Penbrook, less than a mile from Progress, it was decided to begin church work in Penbrook, during the pastorate of the wide-awake O. E. Houston. A house of worship was the first requisite. This was erected during the Summer of 1906, and on November 18th the fine bethel, costing $12,000.00, was set apart for religious worship. C. H. Forney preached the dedicatory sermon. Platform addresses were made in the afternoon by J. C. Forncrook, G. Sigler and C. H. Forrest. The evening sermon was preached by C. H. Grove. After spending $1,400.00 in remodeling their house of worship, under the labors of the efficient pastor, G. W. Getz, the church at Carlisle, Cumberland county, reopened their bethel January 23, 1907, the sermon on the occasion being delivered by I. A. MacDannald. The sum of $1,200.00 was spent by the church at Camp Hill, Cumberland county, in renovating and improving their church building, under the labors of their resolute pastor, H. S. Bickel. It was rededicated December 30, 1906, by D. S. Shoop. Another house of worship on F. W. McGuire's charge, at Round Knob, Bedford county, was built in 1907. The corner-stone was laid June 23rd, by W. H. Shade, and the house was dedicated November 3rd, G. W. Getz and J. T. Fleegal officiating. A part of the bethel at Washington Borough, Lancaster county, was badly damaged on March 9, 1907, by the explosion of the acetylene lighting plant. The necessary repairs were made, and the house was rededicated by C. H. Forney June 23rd. J. H. Gervin was the pastor. The church at Sanborn, Clearfield county, had been worshiping in a Hall until the Spring of 1907, when under the labors of their zealous pastor, W. H. Shade, they bought a church building in Brisbin, and removed it to Sanborn. When completed the total cost was $1,500.00. The corner-stone was laid August 18, 1907, by J. T. Fleegal, and the house was dedicated November 10, 1907, by F. W. McGuire. The house of worship at Landisburg, Perry county, after undergoing needed repairs was rededicated August 18, 1907, by G. Sigler, assisted by the diligent pastor, W. S. Sturgen, and W. H. Dressler. Enola, Cumberland county, a new town, seemed a promising place to begin church work. It was placed in the hands of the Board of Church Extension, which secured the services of G. Sigler, pastor at Wormleysburg, who with commendable zeal pushed the work of building a bethel. It was completed and ready for dedication October 20, 1907, when J. C. Forncrook preached in the morning, and C. I. Behney, in the evening. The entire cost was $5,000.00. With characteristic energy, G. H. Bowersox, pastor of Lower Perry circuit, Perry county, began the erection of a bethel in Newport. It was completed at a cost of $2,500.00, and was dedicated January 12, 1908. C. H. Forney was announced to preach the dedicatory sermon on Sunday evening; but in his absence I. A. MacDannald preached morning and evening, and W. S. Sturgen at 2.30 p. m. The rededication of the bethel at Plainfield, Cumberland county, under the labors of J. A. Staub, took place December 1, 1907. J. W. Deshong did the preaching. Repairs costing over $700.00 were made to the Kimmel's church, Schuylkill county, under C. F. Reitzel, pastor, and the sermons on Saturday evening and Sunday morning and evening of the rededication were preached by C. H. Forney. At Smith's Corner, Blair county, a union house was built in the Summer of 1908, which was dedicated on September 27th by G. Sigler. The church at Columbia, Lancaster county, repaired its house of worship, and held dedicatory services February 9, 1908, at which C. H. Forney and C. H. Grove officiated. J. A. Detter was the capable pastor. The church at Vander Avenue, York, York county, under the leadership of their experienced pastor, made needed repairs at their house of worship, and rededicated it May 17, 1908, the pastor preaching in the morning, and J. T. Fleegal, in the evening. At Valley View, Schuylkill county, a new bethel was built, the corner-stone of which was laid by C. F. Reitzel on July 12, 1908. The proficient pastor, B. B. Wenger, pushed the work to completion, and the dedicatory services were held December 4, 1908. C. H. Forney preached on Saturday evening, Sunday at 10.30 a. m., and 2 p. m., and I. A. MacDannald at 7 p. m. The new house of worship built by the church at Doubling Gap, Cumberland county, under the pastoral labors of the esteemed pastor, J. A. Staub, was dedicated July 4, 1909. C. H. Forney preached at 10 o'clock a. m.; W. R. Ward at 2 p. m., and G. H. Bowersox at 7 p. m. The rededicatory sermon of the church at South Fairview, Cumberland county, under the labors of S. T. Stouffer, were held July 25, 1909. Preaching on the occasion by J. A. Staub. The Fourth Street Bethel, Harrisburg, was remodeled and repaired in 1909, at an expense of $4,000.00, under the efficient pastorate of J. C. Forncrook. It was rededicated October 17, 1909, C. H. Forney preaching at 10.30 a. m., and S. G. Yahm, at 7.30 p. m. The Nagle Street church repaired its house of worship, and held reopening services September 26, 1909. The diligent pastor, H. S. Bickel secured the services of J. C. Forncrook to preach on the occasion. On November 21, 1909, Forncrook preached the morning sermon and O. E. Houston the evening sermon at the rededication of the Pleasant View Bethel, Harrisburg. A. G. Herr was the untiring pastor, who also arranged for an afternoon platform service at which addresses were delivered by J. C. Forncrook, W. S. Sturgen and B. L. C. Baer.

During this period death took a terribly high toll among prominent ministers in other Churches, in all of which Christians of all religious bodies were sympathetically interested. They deepened a larger tolerance for, and a greater faith on the part of other faiths in, the divine stewardship of dissenting ministers. The first leader to fall was Bishop E. B. Kephart, of the U. B. Church, beloved and admired by his people. He died June 24, 1906. Bishop C. C. McCabe, of the M. E. Church, the most beloved of the then Board of Bishops, ended his illustrious life on December 19, 1906. It could never be said that his eulogists evidently wished to gild refined gold or paint the violet. Sam. P. Jones, the greatest evangelist of the Southland, preceded McCabe, having died in October, 1906. Bishop C. H. Fowler, who rendered unusual services to the M. E. Church, and to the cause of Christian culture, passed away March 20, 1908. His devotion to duty and his splendid ideals, illustrated by extraordinary performances, were proof against distraction, and allayed all doubts and misgivings touching his high character. Ira D. Sankey, whose marvelous gift of poetry and song gave him a place in the hearts of Christian people in all lands, joined the angelic choir August 13, 1908. Bishop Daniel Ayres Goodsell, of the M. E. Church, reached the final goal December 5, 1909. He was of the best type of Methodist Bishops, participating in all the intricate problems of Church government with wisdom and singleness of purpose.

Two public debates were held between 1905 and 1910. This first was at Joplin, Montgomery county, Ark., July 26, 1907, between J. H. Summit, of the Church of God, and A. Carter, of the Church of Christ. Summit affirmed that the church is the body of Christ, and that the scriptural name is church of God. Carter agreed with the first part of this proposition, but affirmed that the proper name is church of Christ. Summit affirmed that the new birth is the door into the church. Carter insisted that it is water-baptism, which is for the remission of sin. Summit was successful in defending his propositions. A debate between K. M. Kirkpatrick, of the Church of God, and S. O. Pool, of the Christian Church, was held at Riverside school-house, near Pearl, Douglas county, Wash., June 26-30, 1909. The propositions debated were the Church and the washing of the saints' feet. Kirkpatrick made a very successful defense of his propositions.

A question of world-wide interest occurred in 1909, when Pope Pius X. promulgated a Syllabus in which he authorized the revision of the text of the Bible known as the Vulgate Version, and named the Monks of the Benedictine Order to do it. Coming at the time when the Protestant world was preparing to celebrate the Tercentenary of the Authorized Version, it intensified interest in the Pope's Syllabus. Reverence for the sacred text had decreased in a remarkable degree. Much had been learned of Hebrew and Greek to discredit the translations of certain words, and there was general acquiescence in the demand for a verbally correct translation. There was no such sentiment in Protestant Churches as that which prevailed in Athens in 1901, when there was rioting in the city because the Queen suggested the translation of the Gospels into modern Greek.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE Right Honorable James Bryce, British Ambassador to the United States, in an address before the Clerical Conference in New York City, February 17, 1913, said, that "in looking back over the last fifty years he observed two very great advances that had been made in the work of the various religious bodies, and in their attitude towards the problems of the day." The one was "that different religious bodies were now far more willing to co-operate with one another than they had ever been before in every kind of work that made for the material and moral improvement of the people." The other was "the stronger feeling that the sense of duty to God and the love of God should be shown in endeavoring to help his creatures." These are great truths, but their danger lies in the fact that the original conception as found in the divine Scriptures is that in applying such truths the thought of the masses, which is the thought of the average man, should be guided and tempered by the colder logic of the elders of the church, and by the judgment of a higher criticism. The churches of God realized these changes to some extent within the past ten years; but not to the fullest measure. Always somewhat more liberal as to standards of doctrine than Churches which had Creeds and Confessions of Faith, they, too, developed a tendency to lay still less stress upon theological differences, and more upon all that Churches had in common. While theological differences were held as existing as much as ever, the churches of God were still largely untaught in dogmas and doctrines of systematic theology. It was easy for them to recognize and emphasize that which they had in common in worshiping one Almighty Ruler of the Universe, and in recognizing him as the author of all good, and in feeling that as his children they were bound to one another by ties which rose above their differences. But as with all the smaller religious bodies this operated against the growth and progress of the churches of God.

Moreover, the commendable facts to which Mr. Bryce refers had lurking in them dangers which developed in various localities, though not necessarily inherent in "the great advances" he had observed. They are found in the terms he employs: "problems of the day," "material and moral improvement of the people," "a great part of the service of God lay in the service of man." Only a small percentage of ministers and churches fell into these dangers to the fullest extent; but a large majority did so in part. Those which did presented a picture of moral deterioration which is almost inconceivable. Secular subjects were the topics for sermons in many pulpits, and were discussed as if the church were a town meeting, or a board of trade. On the pretext that the church was getting away from the masses; that it is becoming alienated from the masses; is not progressive enough, and because the church fails to appreciate the very human problems of the masses, in not a few instances in the large centers of population the pulpit often rather furnished cheap, care-killing amusements than a divine and soul-saving gospel. These pulpits and the congregations to which they ministered with a profusion of anecdotes, legendary tales, fairy tales and fables, which provoked laughter and applause, were often compared to places of worldly amusement. The "parish calendar" of many churches not only provided for banquets and social parties; but for eucher parties and dancing classes. By such means and others churches were increased in membership, while a better class of men and women, whose moral lives were faultless, would not desire fellowship. That few of the churches of God yielded to such tendencies, except in the introduction of secular topics into the pulpits, enabled them to maintain an enviable moral and spiritual standing before the world. Then the fact that so large a proportion of the churches of God is in rural districts saved them from these demoralizing tendencies. Securing signatures to political petitions was, however, not exceptional, though none went so far, as it is believed, as "to have registration officers present at the prayer-meetings at various churches," as was the case at Los Angeles and other Pacific Coast towns. There were defenders of the "amusement craze" in the pulpit. To what extent this spirit contributed to the emptying of churches is matter for conjecture; but it was stated as a fact that at the end of this period "there were 10,000 unused churches in America," while thousands were slimly attended. What follows, but that "when religion shuts up shop the devil works overtime;" that when such conditions prevail spirituality is a vanishing quantity? Religious indifferentism was the universal complaint. The ministers of the churches of God were not passive observers of these deteriorating influences and demoralizing institutions and practices. When some other Churches tolerated the introduction of "moving pictures the organ of the General Eldership spoke in emphatic terms against the institution as of a demoralizing tendency. The slogan of the churches of God still was, "Preach the word, whether men will hear or forbear."

The age, however, was pre-eminently pragmatic. Doing, not thinking or teaching, was the universal demand. Hence the prominence of "social Christianity." The church was called by the American Federation of Churches to study the church and social purity, safeguarding children and youth, amusements, the social evil, immigration, the church and the workingman, hours of labor, degree of leisure, organized labor, wages and cost of living, organized labor and wages, unsanitary occupations, housing and sanitation, tuberculosis, and what the church can do, and hundreds of other topics. Even in some churches of God these were topics for the prayer-meeting, or the C. E. meeting. In material interests this was a period of ever-increasing progress and prosperity. It was also a year of large things in philanthropic lines. In 1909 the churches of God entered with determined energy upon the task of raising $37,500 to meet the Carnegie proposition of new endowment of $50,000 for Findlay College, led by the efficient and zealous Field Agent, O. E. Newlin, and the undaunted President, C. I. Brown. The work was accomplished by April, 1911. And the project was started in May, 1911, to secure $24,000 additional endowment by 1916, one brother pledging $1,000.

Always active in every phase of Christian Endeavor work, the churches of God in the East took an active interest in the International Convention held at Atlantic City, July 12, 1910. Representatives were in attendance who voted to make the slogan for the following year, "A Saloonless Nation by 1920." With twenty-two States having constitutional or statutory prohibition in 1910, this did not seem visionary. That Christian citizenship has a claim on the church was recognized at least by the East Pennsylvania Eldership by the appointment of C. H. Forney, S. G. Yahn, J. A. Detter, Geo. Sigler and I. A. MacDannald as delegates to the Christian Citizenship Convention, which held its session in Philadelphia, November 16-20, 1910.

In the main the work of the churches was along quiet and smooth paths. There were no disturbing questions to cause friction or provoke acrimonious discussions. The final action on the W. G. M. S. problem was taken at the General Eldership in 1909, and it was no longer open for discussion. The questions, ecclesiastical and legal, were also disposed of which were raised by W. R. Covert in the West Virginia Eldership case, the West Virginia Eldership being sustained on all points. Two Pentecostal meetings were held in Indiana. The one in 1910 was held at Blue River, in connection with the Sunday-School Convention, and the one in 1911 at Syracuse, in connection with "the Young People's Meeting of the Indiana Eldership." The two camp-meetings in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, conducted by Associations, were held each year, with but a few conversions. The formation of the Walnut Grove Association had led to several law suits, detrimental to the church at Walnut Grove and a hindrance to the work of the camp-meeting. The courts upheld the Association, and the law prevailed. F. W. McGuire endured hardships like a veteran soldier, and managed affairs and conducted the camp-meetings with admirable tact and discerning judgment. With the exception of these two, the only camp-meeting held was the one in 1910, authorized by the Illinois Eldership. The committee appointed by the Eldership selected Sangamon as the most suitable location, five miles east of Decatur, and August 11th as the time for it to begin. It continued ten days, "with good interest." There was a more general interest in revival work. In all the Elderships more or less extensive revivals were enjoyed, and the aggregate number of conversions was large and the churches were in a healthy, growing condition. Less work was done in Oregon and Washington because of a division in the Eldership and discouragement of many of the best workers.

In the East Pennsylvania Eldership a Ministerial Association was organized January 10, 1910, to meet statedly in or near Harrisburg. This proved successful, and was well attended and interesting and instructive. Theological and practical questions were discussed, not in a controversial sense, but as a medium for the friendly exchange of views. Christian Endeavor work was carried on in most of the churches, so that in 1911 there were 47 societies, with a total membership of 2,042, and the contributions for the year to the Church Extension Fund were $190.76, and to the Foreign Mission Fund, $256.05. Annual Conventions of the Society were held in connection with the Sunday-school Convention. There were in 1911 78 Sunday-schools, 12,722 officers, teachers and scholars, 569 conversions and 489 accessions. On May 15, 1910, the beautiful new Bethel at Chambersburg, Franklin county, built under the labors of M. T. Lovejoy, was dedicated. C. I. Brown preached at both services. The Bethel at Mt. Laurel, Dauphin county, which was struck by lightning and destroyed on September 27, 1910, was rebuilt the following Spring, under the new pastor, Jonas Martin, and was dedicated June 4, 1911. The dedicatory sermon was preached by C. H. Forney; the evening sermon by S. G. Yahn, J. T. Fleegal, a former pastor, assisting in the services. In addition to the Fairview Mission, Altoona, there was a flourishing mission at Lake-mont, near Altoona, and at Hollidaysburg, county seat of Blair county. The rededication of the Newburytown Bethel, York county, where H. P. Aston was pastor, took place March 12, 1911, the sermons being preached by W. S. Sturgen. A new church was organized at Central Manor, Lancaster county, where W. Seibert Houck was pastor in connection with Washington Borough, on February 5, 1911. C. H. Forney preached the sermon and presided at the organization of the church. The Mt. Joy church held its eighteenth anniversary by special services, beginning on March 15, 1911. With the exception of one sermon by S. G. Yahn, the preaching was by ex-pastors, in the following order: March 16th, C. I. Behney; March 17th, C. F. Reitzel; March 18th, C. H. Grove; March 19th, C. H. Forney in the morning, and G. W. Getz, pastor and ex-pastor, in the evening. April 2, 1911, Maytown, Pa., had a special service at which a mortgage representing the last installment of its debt, was publicly burned. The preaching on the occasion was by C. H. Forney morning and evening, assisted by the diligent pastor, E. E. Kauffman. The wide-awake pastor of the church at Wormleysburg, Cumberland county, A. P. Stover, succeeded in making needed repairs to the bethel, after which, on May 28, 1911, the house was rededicated, S. G. Yahn and I. A. MacDannald preaching the sermons. A splendid and elaborate anniversary service was held by the Fourth Street Church, Harrisburg, under the enthusiastic pastor, W. N. Yates, September 27-31. It was the eighty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the first church of God in the United States. On the evening of the 28th a "Historical Address" was delivered by C. H. Forney. He also preached the anniversary sermon on Sunday morning, and G. Sigler in the evening, the oldest ex-pastors living. The church at Landisville, Lancaster county, laid the corner-stone of its new bethel on August 11, 1912, under the labors of its worthy pastor, H. S. Hershey. The address on the occasion was delivered by W. N. Yates, who was assisted in the services by G. W. Getz and J. W. Deshong. The church at Waterside, Bedford county, spent $1,551.94 on the extensive repairs made on the bethel. It was then rededicated on September 29, 1912, when D. S. Shoop officiated. B. B. Wenger was the energetic pastor. The church at Enhaut, Dauphin county, burnt the last evidence of indebtedness against it on August 11, 1912, on which occasion the diligent pastor, C. I. Behney, was assisted by his predecessor, R. L. Crawford. To lay a corner-stone twenty-six years after the building of a church was the exceptional experience of the church at South Fairview, Cumberland county, the result of the enterprising spirit of S. T. Stouffer, the pastor. The address was delivered September 22, 1912, by W. N. Yates. The Laymen's Association of the East Pennsylvania Eldership kept up its organization formed in October, 1909, and did some active work. A local organization was formed November 6, 1911, at Fourth Street church, which was imbued with a true missionary spirit.

In Maryland in 1911 thirty churches were enrolled under the annual assessment for different funds. There were at times unsupplied fields, either because of scarcity of active ministers, or of insufficient support. The question of the scarcity of ministers was discussed, and it was insisted upon that the radical reason is the small salaries paid ministers in contrast with salaries in other callings. Whatever the cause, one effect is that men of more limited talents and qualifications hear, or at least heed, the "divine call" to the ministry. The churches and the cause suffer. Not much progress was made in Maryland from 1910 to 1913. There was praiseworthy activity among the sisters, which kept up their State W. M. S. organization and held semi-annual meetings. The C. E. Society was doing good work, and made efforts to organize local societies in all the churches. It is a serious disappointment when the day and hour for a dedication are fixed and the preacher is not there. The church at Blair's Valley, where W. G. Stine took charge as pastor in the Fall of 1909, decided to make needed repairs. The day of dedication was August 7, 1910, and when Stine returned to the bethel from the railroad station he did not bring with him the preacher of the hour. He preached the sermon, as also in the evening, and the people responded with the cash to pay for the repairs. The church house at Bark Hill was repaired at a cost of $247.87, under the labors of W. G. Stine. July 16, 1911, W. S. Shimp preached in the morning, and S. B. Craft at night. A reunion of a number of the ministers and representative Church members was held on August 7, 1911. It proved so agreeable a service that resolutions were adopted to make it permanent. Accordingly on September 5, 1912, a general reunion was held, largely attended and enthusiastic in spirit.

The ministers and churches of the Virginia Elderships were zealous in their work; but it was mainly along old lines, and with less encouragement than during some former periods. There were revivals, some of considerable magnitude, and a number of churches were strengthened. Pastor E. W. Moyer, Greene county, Pa., took a very active interest in repairing the bethel at Windy Gap, where is found the oldest church of God in the county, organized by D. Wertz about 1846. At an expenditure of $600.00 the house was put in excellent condition, and was rededicated in August, 1911. A new bethel was built at Lincoln, where R. L. Workman was the faithful pastor. It was dedicated September 29, 1912. Interest was manifested in C. E. work. The West Virginia ministers at one of their Associations discussed the importance of each church having a C. E. Society. The importance of the prayer-meeting to the spiritual life of the local church was a topic for earnest discussion. They felt the need, and appreciated the importance, of a missionary for the Eldership territory. In the midst of the laxness in Church relations they sought to present to the people the New Testament church. At the session of the Eldership in 1910, there were reported 459 conversions, 181 accessions and 149 baptisms. In the West Virginia Eldership, South, there were seven circuits in 1912, including nineteen points. As to the ministry, they expressed a felt need of better educated men, and of "Spirit-filled" men, and earnestly discussed these topics at Ministerial Associations. But there were other "evils" which prevented progress, and they made prayerful inquiry, and sought to answer the question, "What are the greatest hindrances to the progress of the Church?"

The historian notes the exceptional events. Where these are absent, and there is no progress, the current is at a standstill. Thus judged, the West Pennsylvania Eldership made less history from 1910 to 1913 than during some other years. There was the same patient, persistent, loyal effort to make progress in all departments of Christian labor. The sisters were zealous in their efforts to advance missionary interests, and held their conventions at stated times and employed systematic methods to raise funds. The C. E. department of Church work was pushed forward with intelligent, co-operative effort. The Ministerial Association was helpful and inspiring, and many of the questions discussed were of practical value, and gave indications of the trend of thought and aspirations. While the problem of Church union did not appeal to the ministers and churches of the Eldership, true "Christian unity" did, and it was earnestly discussed. "The scandal of Christendom" was detested. There was more than grief, there was frank indignation, that efforts at Christian unity should be rendered futile by time-worn propositions at sectarian union. "The value of the Church school" as a source of pulpit supply was growing in importance, and received due attention. The Eldership was not strongly impressed with the thought of modernizing the church and adapting it to the times. Nor did it look with too much favor on modern evangelism. The agitation of the second-work holiness theory had not wholly subsided. It was antagonized with the faithful teaching of Bible sanctification. A very conspicuous phase of religious work peculiar to West Pennsylvania was mission work among foreigners. It was a practical question in that some churches were located in the midst of populations representing foreign nationalities. It was therefore a question for practical discussion. In most instances the language was an insuperable obstacle. But in the divine providence the men were called who could minister to those foreigners in their own tongue. The Luschansky brothers did good work at several points in the coke regions. Joseph Seckley, a man who could make himself understood and could instruct in ten languages, was employed in 1911 as a missionary among the Bohemians, Slavs and other foreigners by the Eldership. In 1910 the church at West Newton, Westmoreland county, under their esteemed pastor, G. W. Byrnes, spent $2,000.00 in renovating and improving their house of worship. It was rededicated by C. I. Brown, assisted by W. H. Guyer, September 18, 1910. During the pastorate of J. W. Whisler at Butler, Butler county, the bethel was "repaired and beautified" at an expense of $567.72. The rededication took place October 2, 1910. A new house of worship, at a cost of $2,495.00, was built at Kennerdell, Venango county, under the labors of L. E. Yahn. It was dedicated May 21, 1911, when J. L. Updegraph preached the morning sermon; Geo. M. Hulme spoke in the afternoon, and J. W. Whisler preached in the evening. The sum of $942.26 was spent in "completely remodeling" the Indian Head Bethel, Fayette county, F. O. Eakin being the diligent pastor. It was dedicated by J. L. Updegraph on July 30, 1911. The Limestone Bethel was jointly owned by the church of God and the Brethren in Christ. H. Armstrong was the pastor of the church of God, and through his persistent labors the house was extensively repaired, at a cost of $1,100.00. It was rededicated May 5, 1912, Geo.

M. Hulme preaching morning and evening; J. A. Slagel and Nicholas Lasher representing the Brethren in Christ.

The state of the churches in Ohio was gratifying and hopeful. There were reported fifty-nine appointments, fifty-six organized churches, fifty-nine houses of worship and six parsonages. The number of conversions during the year preceding the Eldership in 1912 was 928; baptized, 354; accessions, 331; total membership, 4,680. The ministerial ranks were being replenished with young men from the College, so that among the active workers were men with a genius for hard work, and with a courage which does not fear, if it does not invite, opposition when questions of principle are at issue. They held fast with the ardor of intense natures to the faith of the fathers, yet they perceived that new conditions were arising which imposed new duties and responsibilities. But as change of methods does not necessarily involve change of principles, they ceased not to contend for all that the churches of God stood for. They calmly discussed at Ministerial Associations, which were regularly held, "How best to meet the dangers besetting the churches of God." Or, "The undeveloped resources of power in the Christian Endeavor Society for the churches of God." To reach the churches with the illuminating and matured thoughts thus called out many of the principal addresses were published. They felt that the "crying need of the churches of God in Ohio was more conversions and larger accessions." C. E. interests were carefully looked after, and conventions were largely attended. The material interests showed less progress. At Wharton, Wyandot county, on O. O. Tracy's field of labor, "a magnificent new house of worship" was built in the Summer of 1911. The corner-stone was laid June 11th, when T. Koogle and W. E. Turner made addresses, and G. A. Bartlebaugh assisted in the services. The house was dedicated October 22, 1911. T. Koogle preached on Friday evening; S. D. Harlan, Saturday evening; C. I. Brown, Sunday morning, and W. E. Turner, Sunday evening. The bethel at South Bridgewater was struck by lightning on June 25, 1911, and burned. The new bethel at Mendon, Mercer county, was built under the labors of C. F. Raach. It cost $6,000.00. The corner-stone was laid July 2, 1911, when addresses were delivered by T. Koogle and C. H. Gatchell. Before the house was finished the new pastor took charge, S. F. Bauders. The dedicatory services were held December 3, 1911, when C. I. Brown officiated morning and evening. Rededicatory services were held with preaching by T. Koogle on Friday evening, and C. H. Gatchell on Saturday evening. At Canton, Stark county, a new house of worship was built, costing $14,500.00, under the supervision of the energetic pastor, Leroy DeHayes. It was solemnly set apart to the worship of Almighty God on February 18, 1912, when C. I. Brown delivered the sermons. The text for the morning sermon was Luke xxiv. 32, and for the evening, John xiii. 23.

While the spiritual condition of the churches in Indiana had improved, a serious defect was noticed in the decline of family religion. The ministry made this a matter for special teaching, so as to raise the standard higher. There was also slackness in the observance of the ordinances, a natural sequence of low states of spiritual life. There was more life and activity in missionary interests, and conventions were held and agents were in active service. The young people were looked after, and more complete organizations were effected. The church at Ft. Wayne enjoyed revivals each Winter, so that the membership increased from forty when the church was organized in 1909, to one hundred and twenty-eight in 1912. At Ari, in 1911, a revival resulted in the addition of forty-three to the membership. Other points realized in a measure an answer to the Eldership's prayer, that "a great wave of spiritual power may sweep over the land, until many precious souls shall be brought from the wickedness of this world into the glorious kingdom of Jesus Christ." There were sixteen fields of labor, with forty churches. Under the labors of Emma L. Isenberg the house of worship at Fairview was so extensively repaired as to make it a "beautiful and up-to-date bethel." On September 18, 1910, H. H. Spilher officiated at the rededication. He gave the cost of repairs to have been $1,200.00. The sum of $1,500.00 was expended in remodeling the bethel at Little River, where H. G. Herendeen was pastor. It was rededicated by C. I. Brown on September 11, 1911, assisted by C. L. Hidy.

While there were revivals in Illinois during this period, the aggregate results were limited, though the total net increase in membership fails to indicate growth. Comparing 1911 and 1912, the tables show the following: 1911—converts, 53; baptized, 33; accessions, 54; membership, 1,140. 1912—converts, 84; baptized, 40; accessions, 80; membership, 1,140. The year 1907-8 was the most successful in five years, the number of converts having been 260; baptized, 150; accessions, 213; membership, 1,273. This net loss was not wholly exceptional, as other whole Churches suffered decreases. The Census of 1909 shows that the Free-will Baptists lost 3,532; the Christian Church, 10,224; the Disciples of Christ, 10,398; the German Evangelical Protestant Church, 15,000; the Northern Presbyterian Church, 33,816, and the Reformed Dutch Church, 4,071. These facts prompted serious inquiries into the causes. In Illinois questions like these were considered: "If no visible results follow a minister's labors in one year should he be removed at the end of the year?" "The dark side of our work as an Eldership." "How can we best promote revivals of religion?" "Are special seasons of religious services worth while?" There were twenty-three fields of labor in 1912, served by diligent, faithful pastors. Most of them interested themselves in Christian Endeavor work, with a State Union managed by enthusiastic ministers of the younger class. In 1911 it decided on an effort to raise $500.00. The women were active in missionary work and the organization of societies. The most notable event of the three years was the building of a new bethel at Decatur, one of the finest religious edifices in the body, as it cost, with the ground, $18,000.00. The honored pastor was O. B. Huston. Under his direction the corner-stone was laid May 5, 1910, when addresses were delivered by city pastors, and by J. W. Primrose, I. S. Richmond and C. F. Rogers. C. I. Brown dedicated the house October 23, 1910, preaching in the morning from Luke xxvi. 32, and in the evening from John xi. 28. An Illinois Eldership tent-meeting was held in 1911, near Warrensburg, under the supervision of I. S. Richmond.

In Michigan conditions were reasonably satisfactory, and the churches were "fairly prosperous." When possible the Eldership kept a general evangelist in the field. No aggressive work was done, and there was no general concert of action in Endeavor or missionary work. The principal sign of healthy vitality was in "the opening of two new works" in 1912, and the resolution "to push forward the great work of saving precious souls." Several revivals were enjoyed in 1911. In 1910 there were seven fields of labor; in 1912 there were five.

While there were some revivals in Iowa during this period, the progress of the churches was less marked than during some other periods. A comparison between the statistics of 1909 and 1912 shows twenty fields of labor in 1909 and fifteen in 1912, a result of consolidations, as the number of church organizations was the same. There were twenty-three organized churches in the Eldership in 1911. Christian Endeavor work received considerable attention, and several Woman's Missionary Societies were organized in co-operation with the W. G. M. S. of the General Eldership. The territory of the Eldership was large, and the churches widely scattered. They were located in the following counties: Grundy, Wright, Bremer, Buchanan, Cedar, Johnson, Jasper, Louisa, Des Moines, Henry, Page, Guthrie, Ida, Sioux, O'Brien, Carroll and Washington. The bethel at Shambaugh, Page county, was struck by lightning on August 20, 1912, and totally destroyed, involving a loss of $4,000.00, as the insurance had expired a short time before. A State evangelist was generally kept in the field, and the ministry was alive to the interests of the cause. The discussion of sundry questions gave evidence of the fact, and also afforded some intimations of difficulties with which the churches had to contend. Among them were these: "Difficulties of present-day ministers on our mission field." "The church—her source of strength." "The unity of the Church." "What is loyalty to the Church?" In no Eldership was the work more difficult and beset with more serious complications during the period of 1903 and 1913 than in the Iowa Eldership. And these internal troubles were constantly interfering with the spirituality and progress of the churches. There was some mission work done in the State, and there was a field maintained in North Dakota, where in 1910 J. W. Cabbage was the missionary. Local missionary work was done by some families living at Sansarc, South Dakota, where in 1911 they had a good country Sunday-school.

Nebraska had several things in its history of this period which might seem encouraging. During the last part of it Richard Jackson was the missionary of the General Board in the State. In 1909 and 1910 C. S. Kilmer, Sr., was the Eldership's general worker. Lack of means prevented the opening of a mission in Houston county, Tenn., where in 1911 J. Swanson was located. One of the ministers, D. B. Zook, had removed to Sunny Side, Wash., but did only local work. J.

L. Williams resided in Minnette, Ala., and preached in a local capacity. J. H. Barkey had located in 1909 in South Dakota, but, while doing some preaching, he could not open a regular mission. The state of religion is from year to year reported as manifesting "some increase in spirituality," with "some in a lethargic state;" or, in "a fair condition;" or, "some points lower than usual;" or, "state of religion is at a very low standard and in a critical condition." This was in 1912, when four of the eight fields were unsupplied with pastors. The ministers were strongly admonished "to do all in their power to uplift the cause of Christ." In 1909 there were ten fields; in 1910 and 1911, eight; but three were unsupplied in 1911. The common routine of church work was followed, except that the W. M. S. was active to the extent conditions would permit.

As the church at Payette, Idaho, was rent in twain, but little could be accomplished. Efforts at reconciliation were but in part successful. In June, 1911, the Board of Missions recognized one of the organizations as the church at Payette, Idaho, after several members of the Board—A. C. Garner and C. T. Fox—had used their good offices to effect harmony. In June, 1912, Charles Sprout was appointed missionary; but he did not remain long. The church enjoyed several revivals, and these, far more than the law, brought about a union of the two parties, and in October, 1912, they were in harmony and peace, and prayed for a missionary.

The division of the Eldership in Oregon and Washington continued, as there seemed insuperable barriers to union to exist. There was good ground for successful church work, and calls came from different unoccupied counties for preachers; but there were none who could respond, and no means to support them. There were five fields kept up by the Eldership whose reports were published, and work done by the other body, which seemed indisposed to accept terms of union upon conditions which did not to them promise permanent peace and harmonious co-operation.

The work in Colorado centered in Lamar, Prowers county, where in 1910 D. Long was the missionary of the General Board of Missions. Under his ministry a Bethel of reinforced concrete was built at Lamar, which was dedicated in February, 1910. The Board made an effort to care for this church, but was only partly successful.

There was no noticeable deficiency of interest and zeal on the part of the active ministers in Kansas; but the record they have made indicates a declension in the work in the State. They received full recognition by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership. In 1910 the Board supplied Ft. Scott by the appointment of T. M. Funk. Others followed him in 1911 and 1912. G. W. Wyatt was appointed to part of Crawford county in 1911, and in 1912 E. A. Bradley served part of the same county. A house of worship was built at Mingona, by the church of God and the M. E. church, and dedicated in April, 1911. The ministry by discussions and sermons aimed to awaken a healthier interest among the churches, so that the cause might prosper more. Among questions in this line which were canvassed were these: "What new methods should we adopt in our church work?" "What are the hopes of a coming revival?" "What faith could do for Christ in Kansas." The W. M. S. was active, and efforts were not wanting to keep the C. E. fires burning. The number of fields of labor varied some, as the Lamar, Colo., mission was sometimes on the list, and in 1910 a mission in southern Texas. There were nine fields in 1909, and ten in 1910. The accessions ranged from 82 in 1909, to 10 in 1910; conversions from 126 in 1910, to 99 in 1912. Two new churches were added in 1911, bringing the number up to ten; but in 1912 there were only nine, though one new church was organized, with thirteen appointments and twelve bethels. The total membership in 1911 was 268. In 1912 the Committee on the State of Religion made the statement, that "we have fewer appointments than last year, and fewer sermons preached, less members and fewer converted and baptized than in the year 1911."

Apparently the winds were less contrary in Missouri than westward of that State. The ministers maintained the Ministerial Association, and discussed sundry important questions before the churches where the meetings were held. The churches realized, as did the ministers, that the missionary spirit is the spiritual barometer of a body, and they encouraged the W. M. S. and the missionaries in their work. The religious state of the churches was reported favorable. The "need of more competent ministers" was emphasized, and it was felt as a matter of high importance that efforts should be directed toward building up churches in towns. In 1912 there were fifteen fields of labor, and in addition to the missionaries under the Board of Missions of the General Eldership there were two General Evangelists. The support was limited, as salaries were from $150.00 to $300.00 a year. The missionary in northern Missouri in 1910 was L. E. Mitchell, and in south-western Missouri, J. Allman. The latter was continued in that section during 1911 and 1912. In 1911 and 1912 G. L. Chapman was the missionary in south-eastern Missouri. J. A. Miller and D. L. Cox were missionaries in north-western Missouri respectively in 1911 and 1912. There were at this time twenty-five churches in the State. Gratifying success attended the labors of these devoted men. At Leadwood, under the pastorate of Charles Hale, a house of worship was built, which P. L. French dedicated on October 2, 1910, preaching from Josh. i. 7, 8. He was assisted by J. F. Schoch. At Belgrade, G. L. Chapman, after being locked out of the M. E. house of worship, preached in the Odd Fellows Hall. He organized a church there early in 1911. "Other new churches had been organized around Belgrade."

George L. Chapman was born in 1870, near Rockbridge, Monroe county, Ky. His parents were members of the Missionary Baptist Church. He was converted when about eleven years old, and united with the Church of his parents, and was baptized January 24, 1881. He at once became quite active in all forms of church work. After his marriage, December 2, 1887, he emigrated to Missouri, locating in Sullivan county on October 16, 1890. He first heard the doctrine of the Church of God preached by A. J. Hill. He accepted the truth and united with the church at Ivy Hill, Sullivan county, in 1893. He began to preach in 1895, and was ordained to the ministry by the Missouri Eldership at Versailles, September 9, 1897. The greater part of his ministerial life was spent on mission territory. In 1911 Chapman built a Bethel at Cherryville, which was dedicated in May, 1911. A church was organized at Ester, in January, 1911, by M. S. Sikes and Charles Hale, with twelve members. Also, one was organized at Elsey, in May, 1911. In May, 1911, Chapman formed a new church at Furnace Creek. Under Samuel Van Meter a church of twenty-one members was organized in December, 1911, at Richmond. After a revival at Cape Fair, conducted by J. F. Allman, a council was called "to discuss the matter of building a house of worship." After a discourse on "Let us rise and build," it was decided "to build next Fall" (1912), and committees were at once appointed. These churches and ministers gave practical illustrations of lessons taught in the discussion of such questions as: "How shall we educate the churches in auxiliary church work? Or, "System in Eldership and church work." As also an answer to the question: "To what extent should we emphasize the ordinances of the Church?"

South of Kansas the principal work done during this period was in Oklahoma. Active missionary labors, sustained by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, resulted in the organization of a number of churches. J. W. Bloyd was retained at Bartlesville during the entire period. H. W. Allen was kept in western Oklahoma. J. W. Burns was in eastern Oklahoma in 1910 and 1911, and north of the Canadian River in 1912. C. H. Ballinger in central Oklahoma during the three years. De Loss Crawford was the missionary at Leedy in 1911, and J. H. Whittington in eastern Oklahoma, in 1912, south of the Canadian River. In 1910 and 1911 J. H. Whittington was the Board's missionary in Arkansas, and J. H. Summit in northern Arkansas. The Kansas mission in southern Texas bore fruit. A church was organized by W. E. Tuttle at Big Wells, Texas, in April, 1912, and the new Bethel was about ready for dedication in December, 1912. It was deeded to the

General Eldership.

At Oak Valley, Okla., a church was organized by J. D. Henson in 1909, with six members, which in December, 1912, had increased to twenty-two. At Russellville, under the labors of J. W. Burns, a Bethel was built, which was dedicated May 15, 1910, by E. M. Kirkpatrick, assisted by B. L. Knight. At a point about six miles north-west of Stroud, Okla., a church was formed by J. D. Henson early in 1910. On his mission field in eastern Oklahoma J. W. Burns succeeded in effecting a church organization at Artisee, in September, 1910. J. W. Burns had a unique experience at Raiford early in July, 1911. He went there to hold a meeting, and found a number of Free-will Baptists, with a Free-will Baptist preacher. The latter organized a Free-will Baptist church, after which Burns continued the revival, meanwhile preaching the doctrine of the Church of God. The result was that he organized a church of God, taking into fellowship all the members of the Free-will Baptist church. Near Mounds, at Duck Creek school-house, in July, 1911, S. O. Cox organized a small church. In various places in Oklahoma families of the same nationalities located in colonies. Such a colony of Germans constituted the bulk of the population at Bessie. A. J. Hill went there to hold revival services in December, 1911, and began "preaching the doctrines of the churches of God." He found them receptive to the truth, and "could have organized a good church if a German minister could have been had." In April, 1911, a church was organized at Mounds, Okla. When the town of Leedy was laid out, not far from a school-house in which A. J. Hill preached, the Town Site Company donated a lot for a Bethel, with the condition that "this Winter it was to be used for school purposes." The house was built at a cost of $1,500.00, and was nearly finished and ready for dedication the last of September, 1911. Hill proposed to erect the Tabernacle which he had bought for the use of the Eldership on ground adjoining the Bethel. As there were few church houses in the Eldership, it was thought a "Tabernacle would be the most efficient and the quickest way to evangelize and reach the people." After the Eldership in 1911 F. C. Melson succeeded in organizing a church at Ringwood. He and H. W. Allen also organized a church of twenty members at Green Bay school-house in February, 1912. In October, 1912, C. H. Ballinger and L. H. Sullins were instrumental in holding "the greatest revival known in that section [Owala] for a long time." They organized a church of twenty members. In Arkansas there were few signs of spiritual life. A Ministerial Association was in existence, which discussed a number of practical questions. A new church located at Story was received by the Standing Committee into the Eldership on November 5, 1910.

An event of much interest to the churches of God occurred October 1, 1911. It was thus announced in "The Literary Digest" of October 28th: "We now see the Free Baptists sacrificing their identity to the main Baptist Church." One hundred years ago those bodies were formed by a separation on the theological doctrines of Calvinism and Arminianism. During recent years these doctrines have no longer been a test of membership in either body, and the union was simply a recognition of the fact that the differences which caused the separation have disappeared.

No less were the churches interested in the publication in December, 1912, of "a new version of the Scriptures by the American Baptist Publication Society," of Philadelphia, Pa., which was called by others "The Baptist Bible." It is called "An Improved Edition (based in part on the Bible Union Version)." The latter version was published in 1866, and was strongly endorsed by different Eldershops. It translated "baptize" uniformly by "immerse." The new version does not go that far. It translates thus: "To be baptized (immersed) by him." It has been severely criticised by those who dissent from Baptist views. "The Baptists have gotten out a Bible of their own. It immerses people instead of baptizing them, substitutes the less terrifying word 'underworld' for 'hell,' and makes a few other changes which do not look toward very close fellowship with other Christian denominations, much less a reuniting of Christendom." Some called it "sacreligious" and "blasphemous." This is not intelligent criticism. It contains a very large number of deviations from the Authorized and from the Revised Versions. A critical examination may reveal the fact that nine-tenths of these are more accurate translations than those in the other versions. That is the only reasonable test of the merits of a translation. For many reasons believers in immersion will find the study of this version profitable. The persistent interest in Bible revision is indicated in Jacob H. Schiff's offer, a banker and philanthropist, to donate $50,000.00 to aid in completing and publishing the new Bible revision under way by the Jewish Publication Society of America.

The prevailing absence of controversial discussion of subjects is very noticeable during this period. The General Eldership by its final action at Fort Scott in 1909 eliminated the W. G. M. S. question. The firm hand with which the second-work sanctification theory was dealt with relegated that subject to the past, although the scriptural doctrine of sanctification was not made obsolete. Ministers in politics and the degradation of the pulpit by the discussion of questionable topics was the subject of animadversion. But it was not of the churches of God that a popular evangelist said: "Our churches have deteriorated into third-rate amusement bureaus, with religion left out. That is why 7,500 churches in this country did not report a single conversion in 1912." Miracles and faith-healing called out considerable discussion, though the churches did not have their peace disturbed by agitators. The question of the eligibility of deacons as members of Eldershops was discussed pro and con by the Editor of The Advocate and three or four ministers. The discussion arose out of an attempt to amend the Constitution of the Oklahoma Eldership so as "to provide that the deacons be members of this Eldership by virtue of this office." The Editor was requested to discuss the question, as it was postponed until the meeting of the next Eldership. Others followed. It was not a new thing in the south-west, as deacons had been members much earlier in the Texas and Arkansas Eldership.

The establishment of a Republic in China in 1912 was a matter of interest to all Christian people. It seemed to point to an early era of universal tolerance in the ancient empire. The principal misgiving was as to the capacity of the people of China to maintain self-government. The Christian civilization taught and lived by foreign missionaries had been an influential factor in bringing about the new order. The open questions were: "Will Christianity be benefitted by the change? "And, in turn, will Christianity embrace the new opportunities for service?"

CHAPTER XXII.

LIFE AND WORK OF REV. C. H. FORNEY, D. D., LL. D.

By REV. S. G. YAHN, D. D.

Editor of The Church Advocate.

ONE of the most important actions of the General Eldership of 1909 was that which has resulted in the preparation and publication of this volume. We had been making history for more than eighty years. Our part in the development of the religious life of the country during that period is of much interest to us and of some value to others. But no systematic effort had been made to put the record of these events into permanent form. It was in recognition of this fact, and to supply this need, that the General Eldership took action earnestly requesting Dr. C. H. Forney to prepare such a work.

No better selection could have been made. The author of this book is a man whose memory goes back to the early days of our work, and who enjoyed a personal acquaintance with John Winebrenner and most of his co-laborers. At the same time he has kept in close and sympathetic touch with the men and events of the passing years up to the present time. His pre-eminent ability as a writer is unquestioned. His long period of service as a member of the General Eldership for half a century, and as Editor of The Church Advocate for forty years, afforded him facilities which were not possessed by any other man among us. And, if any further evidence of the wisdom of this selection is needed, it is furnished by the eloquent testimony of the book itself.

The Board of Directors, however, to which the publication of this book was intrusted, encountered one difficulty. During the past forty years the author of this volume has been more influential than any other man in shaping the course of events concerning which he was selected to write. And, with becoming modesty, he declined to write anything about his own work through these years of activity, except to merely mention his official connection with boards, committees, and local and general enterprises. But the Board of Directors, feeling that he was entitled to a more prominent place in the history of our work than he would assign to himself, and that a fuller recognition of his long and faithful services was demanded in the interest of historical completeness, selected the author of this article "to write the biography of Dr. C. H. Forney."

His Early Years.

The beginning of this narrative takes us back about three quarters of a century, to a farming community in Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, of which the village of Linglestown, about eight miles from Harrisburg, is the center. Most of the farmers of this locality, like those of many other communities in Eastern Pennsylvania, were of German descent. Being industrious, honest and frugal, they were naturally prosperous, as prosperity was measured at that time. Harrisburg was then only a town of about 5,000 inhabitants, and many things in the surrounding communities were of a primitive character; but the advantages of the people were equal to the average of that day, and they were contented. Their material comfort was not hampered by poverty, and their spiritual stature was not dwarfed by great riches. They belonged to the large middle class of common people, who in the long ago heard the Master gladly, as soon as they had a favorable opportunity.

Such an opportunity to hear the truth came to the people of this community through the ministry of Rev. John Winebrenner, about the year 1825. It was the preaching of the word "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," or what was then commonly called "experimental religion," and which resulted in Winebrenner's separation from the German Reformed Church. The readers of this volume have learned that Winebrenner, while a German Reformed pastor, had three churches in the country in addition to the one in Harrisburg. One of these, known as Wenrich's church, was located less than a mile from Linglestown. When the doors of this house of worship were closed against him, Winebrenner went to Linglestown and preached in the school-house and in private houses. The Lord graciously blest these efforts of his servant in the salvation of precious souls, and in June, 1829, one of the first churches of God in the United States was organized at Linglestown.

Two of the charter members of this church were Christian T. Forney and his wife, Barbara S. Forney. In the Spring of 1839 they moved about four miles east of Linglestown. Here they owned and cultivated a farm of one hundred and forty-five acres. The family occupied a log house, such as was common in that neighborhood. And it was here, on the seventeenth of October, 1839, that Christian Henry Forney, their fourth child and eldest son, was born. An excellent religious spirit pervaded the community at that time, a full share of which was found in the Forney home. The father and mother, like most of those who were converted under Elder Winebrenner's labors, were deeply devoted to the interests of the kingdom, and this influence was felt in both the home and the church. The ministry was considered a high and holy calling and was regarded with profound veneration. As a result the churches of God have been blest with at least eleven preachers from this neighborhood, ten in addition to the one to whose life and work this article is devoted, five of them belonging to his family relationship. His father, Christian T. Forney, was a lay preacher, and frequently conducted religious services at the home church in Linglestown, and filled pulpits for other ministers as opportunities arose. He also officiated at funerals whenever he was requested to do so. He could preach in English or German, as the occasion required, and was an able expounder of the Scriptures. He might have been an ordained minister had he not believed that he could serve the Master best in a lay capacity as an elder in the church at Linglestown, which position he filled acceptably for many years, and until his death. He was also deeply interested in educational matters, and was a member of the first school board under the common school law of Pennsylvania, which was enacted in 1834. He took a leading part with those who were supporting the public school system, which, being in its infancy at that time, needed all the moral and financial encouragement that public spirited citizens could give. His genuine interest was shown by a gift of four acres of his farm, containing a beautiful grove, for school purposes. The building erected on this ground was called the Forney school-house. The right to use it for religious purposes was reserved when the gift of ground was made to the school board, and here Mr. Forney conducted Sunday-school and prayer-meetings, and held several successful revival meetings. He was a delegate to the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1833 (the first year that the names of delegates were recorded), as well as in later years, and was also a delegate to the General Eldership. That his life was such as to command the continued confidence and esteem of his brethren is evident from the following action of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, taken at its first meeting after his death: "Resolved, That in the death of our venerable brother, Christian T. Forney, the Church is bereft of one of its most distinguished, faithful and veteran office-bearers, a man of great natural goodness of heart, a counsellor of uncommon prudence, wisdom and skill, and a lay preacher of extraordinary talents and gifts for usefulness in the Church and in the world."

The early and genuine conversion of children who live in a true Christian home is in harmony with a reasonable expectation, and so it proved in this case. A Bethel had been built at Linglestown in the Summer of 1827, two years before the church was organized. Here the converts of Elder Winebrenner's meetings enjoyed many precious seasons of grace, and their efforts in winning souls were crowned with success. It was in this Bethel, in December, 1853, at a service conducted by his father, that C. H. Forney, then fourteen years of age, went forward to the altar of prayer and was converted to Christ.

This brief glance at the early history of this community is sufficient to show that the conditions could scarcely have been more favorable for the early training of one who was to become pre-eminently a leader in the work of the churches of God.

*Sincerely Yours,
C. H. Torrey.*

As Student and Teacher.

It was in the building before referred to, on his father's farm, that C. H. Forney attended public school until 1854. He then went to the Miller public school one Winter, about nine miles from home, and to the Churchville (now Oberlin) public school, thirteen miles distant, the following Winter, for more advanced instruction, especially in mathematics. About this time Professor John Focht started an academy at Linglestown, which, in keeping with the original name of that village (St. Thomas), he called The St. Thomas Institute. Here Mr. Forney attended school for three years, each academic year running from April to October. He pursued the regular course of studies, giving special attention to mathematics and surveying. His school work and standing during these early years was a clear indication of the exceptional talents which were to be still further developed and devoted to useful service as time advanced.

Mr. Forney's experience as a public school teacher dates from the Autumn of 1856, when he was seventeen years of age. That Winter he taught the Progress school, nine miles from home, and the next two Winters he taught the Forney school, on his father's farm. His selection as teacher for the home school is a creditable indication of his standing in his own community, just as the early age at which he began teaching shows his unusual intellectual attainments as he approached young manhood.

In the Spring of 1858 Mr. Forney went to the State Normal School at Millersville, Pa., where he remained for one school year of three terms. This, his first year in school away from his home community, was one of much value to him. Professor James P. Wickersham, author of several well-known books on teaching and one of the most prominent educators of Pennsylvania, was the Principal of the Millersville Normal School at that time, and its moving spirit. And the teacher of mathematics was Professor Edward Brooks, author of Brooks' Mental Arithmetic, a work which was then in press. That Mr. Forney made good use of his opportunities is evident from the fact that he was selected to make the class address at the end of each term, both because of his record in the work of the school and his proficiency in public speaking. In the Fall of this year, September 21, 1858, he received a Teacher's Permanent Certificate, which at that time took the place of the present-day Normal School diploma.

It was in the Winter of 1858-59 that Mr. Forney first received impressions which turned his mind in the direction of the gospel ministry. When he expressed these feelings to his father the latter was very much gratified, and they at once took up for consideration the subject of a suitable college at which he might receive the necessary training for his future work. The churches of God not having an educational institution at that time, the question was not an easy one to decide. Naturally they sought the counsel of Elder Winebrenner, who was at that time conducting a meeting at Linglestown, and on the latter's advice it was decided that Mr. Forney should go to college at Oberlin, Ohio, which he did in March, 1859.

Oberlin College, in its origin, was closely identified with the anti-slavery movement. Tappan Hall was erected by Mr. Arthur Tappan, one of the leading opponents of slavery. Students were admitted without respect to color. The President and Faculty of the College were pronounced abolitionists, and anti-slavery sentiment was voiced with no uncertain sound. That this attitude was maintained regardless of opposition and danger is evidenced by the fact that when Mr. Forney reached Oberlin two of the professors were serving jail sentences in Cleveland for having assisted a fugitive slave to escape through Ohio to Canada. The President of Oberlin College at that time was Rev. Charles G. Finney, the ablest and most successful evangelist of his day. Through his spoken and published sermons and lectures hundreds of formal churches were being quickened with new life, while thousands of lukewarm church members were being revived and multitudes of sinners saved. If in connection with these two facts it is recalled that the churches of God from the very beginning were committed to the anti-slavery cause, and that they were distinctively evangelistic, it will explain why Mr. Winebrenner advised Mr. Forney to go to Oberlin College, and why the advice was accepted.

Mr. Forney decided to take what was known at Oberlin as the Elective, or Ministerial Course, preparatory to taking a theological course. He had made a diligent study of Greek at home during the preceding Winter, which he continued at Oberlin in connection with his other studies, advancing in philosophy, astronomy, and higher mathematics as far as the senior class in the regular course. After spending one school year of eight months at Oberlin, he taught the Hopewell public school, in Hopewell township, Seneca county, Ohio, during the Winter of 1859-60, pursuing his college studies at the same time. His Teacher's Certificate, received at Tiffin, Ohio, in October, 1859, was of the highest grade. In the Spring of 1860 he returned to Oberlin to continue his course, little thinking that in a few short weeks there would come to pass an event which would not only bring deep sorrow to the heart, but also change his plan of preparation for the work of his calling. This was the unexpected death of his father, which occurred March 26, 1860, at the age of fifty-three. Mr. Forney reached home the day before the funeral, and did not return to college. This was due in part to changes incident to his father's death, and in part to the urgent need for ministers. It should be remembered that in those early years very few of our people recognized the advantages of a college education as a preparation for the ministry. On the contrary it was the general belief that men who were called of God to this sacred office should enter it without waiting for such training. And not a few of our people were openly opposed to college-trained preachers. In view of these facts it is not strange that Mr. Forney did not finish his college course, but rather that he went to college at all. At that time it was a rare exception for a young man to go to college, and that he followed the exception rather than the rule, shows that he was prompted by the spirit of the true student. And the termination of his school days did not seriously interrupt his course of studies. He continued to apply himself with the same thoroughness and patient perseverance that had characterized his work as a student and teacher. Nor did he limit his application to a popular course of reading and a general line of theological studies, as many ministers do. He did not shun the more difficult branches, which are seldom pursued outside of college or seminary. For example, he took up the study of Hebrew unaided, and mastered it to the extent of being able to read the Old Testament in the original, as his knowledge of the Greek enabled him to do with the New Testament. He has been a life-long student in the fullest sense of the word. He feels most at home in the midst of his books, which have been wisely selected, and which have grown into a library of over seventeen hundred volumes.

As Preacher and Pastor.

Though almost his entire lifetime has been spent in his native State, within a radius of fifty miles in and around Harrisburg, it was in Ohio that Mr. Forney began the sacred work of the gospel ministry. He preached his first sermon in the Hopewell Bethel, about a mile from the public school of which he was the teacher, on Sunday morning, November 20, 1859, from Isaiah III. 10, 11. During the Winter he preached nine times at Hopewell, once at Tiffin, twice at Attica, once at John Kline's and once at Pleasant Grove. His first sermon in his native State, preached May 6, 1860, a few weeks after his father's death, was a funeral sermon. During the Summer of this year he preached forty-five times at various places in East Pennsylvania, including seven sermons at Lancaster, where he came into personal touch with Elder E. H. Thomas, Editor of The Church Advocate. The Standing Committee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, of which Elder Thomas was Chairman, granted Mr. Forney a "Preacher's License," September 25, 1860, without an application having been made and without any examination. This unusual course was no doubt prompted by the recognized ability and promise of the one upon whom this distinction was conferred, as well as by the urgent need for ministers. In the Autumn of 1860 he attended the meeting of the East Pennsylvania Eldership at Bainbridge, and was elected Second Clerk.

Elder Forney's first regular charge was the church at Mount Joy, which he served from the Fall of 1860 to the Spring of 1863. The church had been without a pastor during the preceding Summer, and his appointment from November 9, 1860, until the Spring of 1861, was by the Standing Committee, from which time his Eldership appointment continued for two years, which was then the time limit fixed by the Eldership. During the last year of this period, from April, 1862, to April, 1863, Mount Joy and Washington Borough were united, and were served jointly by Elders Forney and Thomas. Elder Forney conducted the revival meetings, and in the very beginning of his work as a pastor received the most gracious evidences of divine approval. His first protracted meeting at Mount Joy continued from December 22, 1860, to February 27, 1861, and resulted in eighty-four conversions and sixty-five accessions to the church. The revival services of the following Winters were not so protracted, but resulted in a number of conversions and additions, both at Mount Joy and Washington Borough. An encouraging growth was also seen in other respects, especially in a broader vision of Christian responsibility. The pastor, both in his pulpit and pastoral work, laid special emphasis on the subject of missions, and directed the people in formulating and putting into operation a proper financial system, with the result that the church at Mount Joy was soon in the front rank both in missionary activity and the amount of money contributed for that purpose.

Elder Forney went from Mount Joy to Chambersburg in the Spring of 1863, where his pastorate was attended with some of the most trying experiences of his life. It was a critical period in the progress of the Civil War, and his field was only about fifteen miles from Mason and Dixon's Line. The great conflict between the North and the South was rapidly approaching a crisis, as was shown a few months later in the battle of Gettysburg, July 1st to 3rd. The passionate feelings of that time can be understood only by those who were in touch with the awful experiences of the War. So intense was the interest that Elder Forney, with others, walked from Chambersburg to Gettysburg, a distance of twenty-five miles, on Monday after the battle. There was no means of conveyance, railroad transportation having been interrupted by the destruction of tracks, and even the farmers and others who had teams had gone farther north to escape the Confederates. Shortly after his return from Gettysburg, Elder Forney suffered a severe attack of typhoid fever. During this affliction he was comforted and encouraged by Elder Thomas and others to hope for recovery, and, while the outcome was for a time in doubt, his life was spared for the greater service to which the Master had called him. July 29, 1864, General McCausland, with a Confederate cavalry force of about five hundred men, crossed the Potomac and made a raid as far north as Chambersburg, where he demanded $500,000 in greenbacks or $100,000 in gold under penalty of burning the town. Because the citizens failed to comply with this demand, the heart of the town, including the bethel of the church of God, was reduced to ashes, on Saturday, July 30th. The Board of Incorporation of the East Pennsylvania Eldership decided to rebuild, and Elder Forney was appointed to collect money for this purpose. He traveled over all the territory of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and through Westmoreland, Fayette and Venango counties in West Pennsylvania, and Wayne, Richland, Wyandot and Seneca counties in Ohio. Our people were liberal in supporting the faith for which the common brotherhood was contending, and in this particular case there was the added element of patriotic devotion because of the circumstances under which the people in Chambersburg lost their house of worship. As a result, the necessary amount of money was secured, about $5,000, which included $300 contributed by members of the Pennsylvania Legislature.

While on this collecting tour Elder Forney made his first and only political speech. It was in Wooster, Ohio, on the evening of October 6, 1864. A mass meeting had been arranged for that date by the Republican County Committee, which was largely attended and marked by the intense interest and enthusiasm known only in the exciting days of the Civil War. In the forenoon eloquent addresses were made by Senator John Sherman, General James A. Garfield and two local ministers. In the evening Elder Forney made an address in advocacy of the re-election of Abraham Lincoln, his subject being, "The Principles That Should Triumph—Where Are They Found?" The Wooster "Republican" had the following to say concerning the address:

"The meeting in Arcadome hall to listen to the address of Rev. C. H. Forney, of Chambersburg, Pa., was a most complete success. The address of the reverend gentleman was learned and eloquent, and gave the best satisfaction to the large and intelligent audience present. We have seldom listened to a more effective, convincing and learned argument in favor of the Union cause, than that of Mr. Forney."

As a life-long Republican, Elder Forney has always taken a deep interest in civil affairs, as a private citizen. And, had he felt free to take a public part in governmental matters, he would no doubt have exerted a very effective influence in favor of that which is highest and best in political life. But he has always contended that a minister of the gospel, for the best interests of his calling, should take no active part in politics. And to this rule he has invariably adhered, with the single exception before mentioned when the extraordinary circumstances of the time demanded the help of every loyal tongue and pen in behalf of the preservation of the Union.

Elder Forney continued as pastor of the church in Chambersburg for three years. While the time limit was only two years, an exception was made in this case on account of the erection of the new house of worship. The only time during this pastorate when the church had a Bethel in which to hold revival services was the Winter of 1863-4. And when this is remembered, in connection with other trying experiences through which the people were passing in consequence of the War, the reader will not expect to learn of very much having been accomplished in the way of spiritual development and church upbuilding. But by faithful pastoral work the flock was kept together, and a number of persons were fellowshipped and baptized.

The Fourth Street Church of God, Harrisburg, was Elder Forney's third appointment, which he served from April, 1866, to April, 1868. The severe trials through which this church had passed, as recorded elsewhere in this volume, were still matters of recent history, and the flock that remained required more than ordinary care and devotion on the part of the pastor. In this the people were not disappointed, as the record shows 206 sermons preached and about 600 pastoral visits made during the two years. Not only was the flock properly cared for, but the efforts of pastor and church were rewarded with a gratifying increase in membership. Forty-four persons were received into fellowship the first year and forty-nine the second.

It was during his pastorate in Harrisburg that Elder Forney served as Chaplain of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives. The ministers of Harrisburg, who had been rendering this service alternately, took action requesting that a Chaplain be selected to serve statedly. Elder Forney was appointed to carry this request to the Capitol, where it was favorably received, and he was elected the first regular Chaplain of the House of Representatives, in January, 1868.

The "Harrisburg Telegraph," speaking of the close of this pastorate in the Spring of 1868, says: "Long before the ringing of the bell last evening the large audience room of the Fourth Street Bethel was filled to overflowing, and ere the time for opening the services the galleries, aisles and stairways were also crowded with persons who assembled to hear the farewell sermon of Rev. C. H. Forney, who was to close his second and last year's labors as pastor of the church . . . . During the two years just closed Rev. C. H. Forney has labored most efficiently in our midst, and he bears with him to his new charge, in Lancaster, the prayers of all good people for future success."

Elder Forney's last pastorate was in Lancaster, where he served the church from April, 1868, to April, 1870, the last seven months in connection with his duties as Editor of The Church Advocate, to which position he succeeded on the death of Elder Thomas. Here his work was characterized by the same careful attention to the duties that pertain to the office of preacher and pastor. He instructed the people more thoroughly in the doctrines of the New Testament, and was diligent in seeking the salvation of souls. Twenty-nine persons were received into fellowship, and the church was built up and strengthened in the faith.

Had Elder Forney continued in the work of the active ministry his career would no doubt have been one of increasing usefulness among the churches of God. He had the talent necessary to render acceptable service in any pulpit. He had the personal interest in the members of his congregations which insures faithful pastoral work. He was equally strong in executive ability and wise administration. And back of these qualifications was an unselfish devotion to the cause he loved. This fact stands out prominently in his report to the East Pennsylvania Eldership at Middletown, in October, 1863, while pastor at Chambersburg. The report closes with this paragraph:

"I give myself into the hands of the Eldership to send me wherever in her judgment she deems best. I have no personal wishes and desires to be gratified. At home or abroad, on the missionary field, circuit, or station, wherever, brethren, you think my services most needful and promotive of God's glory and the interests of perishing souls, as well as of the Church, thither send me. With and for the Church I mean to labor and in her commission I expect to die."

But it was only a few years until this consecrated young man, as before mentioned, was called to the editorial chair to begin a period of service to all the churches, which, in the goodness of God, he was able to continue for forty years. During that time, in order to husband his strength for the onerous duties of the editorial office, he preached only on special occasions. These included dedicatory and reopening services, and sermons on doctrinal and other important subjects. He preached the opening sermon of the East Pennsylvania Eldership on several occasions, and also preached the opening sermon of the General Eldership in 1875, and again in 1909. Beginning with the dedicatory sermon at Chambersburg, Pa., March 10, 1867, while he was pastor of the Fourth Street Church, Harrisburg, he has officiated at fifty-five dedications and reopenings. The church that is fortunate enough to secure his services on any special occasion considers itself highly favored, because of the instructive and inspiring character of his work in the pulpit. He is pre-eminently a teacher of divine truth. For this reason he was most worthily honored when Hillsdale College, Hillsdale, Michigan, a Free Baptist institution, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, in 1881. He was the first minister in the churches of God to receive this degree.

It is in order, in this connection, to make a few comments concerning Dr. Forney's ability as a preacher. Two things, on the human side, determine the strength of a sermon. These are its preparation and its delivery. And this twofold consideration of the subject of preaching, which discloses the ability of the preacher, calls attention to the study and to the pulpit. The work of the latter is more familiar to the people, but that of the former is of no less importance; for a lack of preparation in the study is certain to result in a lack of power in the pulpit. With Dr. Forney the preparation of a sermon is not an irksome task. He enjoys the companionship of his books, especially the Book that records the word and will of God. Many of his most delightful hours are spent in his library, and he finds as much pleasure in the preparation of a sermon as in its delivery. Having selected a theme and text appropriate to the occasion for which a sermon is to be prepared, he seeks, first of all, to discover what the Spirit of inspiration desires to express through the text, in order that he may thus hear the voice of God and repeat it to the people. Then follows the logical development of the theme thus presented, with such practical applications as the needs of the people to whom he is to preach may require. In this work of preparation he goes to the word of God as found in the original languages, and studies the text, context and parallel passages, with the help of concordances, lexicons and commentaries. In addition to his hermeneutical and homiletical helps, the subject under preparation is further enriched by the results of his more general study of theological works. He has a passion for the truth. His sole ambition is to "preach the word," believing that it is the only means whereby the unsaved can be brought to Christ and built up in him. He delights to preach "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and his sermons are prepared with the cross in view. While his preaching for many years has been limited to special occasions, which suggested the propriety of using special subjects, the supreme theme of the gospel has never been forgotten. When he preaches on the subject of the church, as he frequently and appropriately does on dedicatory occasions, he exalts Christ by exalting his body—the church. And his sermons on the ordinances accomplish the same purpose by making more significant the three great facts in the Master's life—his humiliation, his death and his resurrection. He keeps in touch with the best books that come from the press, and avails himself of the volumes of earlier years that are found in his well-selected library, both poetry and prose. The Bible is his treasure-house of truth, and other books are used only as they may throw light upon its interpretation and application to human life. These facilities, each of which contributes in one way or another to the preparation of the sermon, have no place in the finished product. They are all left in the study. Even the written outline is committed so that it need not be carried into the pulpit. Thus the discourse, while a scholarly production, is entirely free from the pedantic element. Nothing is brought before the congregation but an exposition and application of gospel truth that has previously been made a part of the mind and heart of the speaker.

The delivery of the message is in keeping with the high character of the sermon. Phillips Brooks, himself a prince of power in the pulpit, said: "Every sermon must have a solid rest in Scripture, and the pointedness which comes of a clear subject, and the conviction which belongs to well-thought argument, and the warmth that proceeds from earnest appeal." These elements are clearly manifest in the sermons of Dr. Forney and in their delivery. He deals with the fundamental doctrines of the word of God. He has always been unalterably opposed to the introduction of secular and sensational themes into the pulpit, believing that they are not entitled to a place in the sacred desk, and this position is emphasized by his own course as a minister. The spectacular is as foreign to his sermons and their delivery as it is distasteful to his judgment. He not only excludes extraneous subjects from the pulpit; but, so far as possible, conceals himself in the shadow of the cross. He humbles himself that Christ may be exalted. His sermons disclose no effort at rhetorical display, or desire for personal prominence. His pulpit oratory is unstudied and unaffected. He is sparing in gestures. He is in no sense open to the common criticism that ministers assume an unnatural manner and voice in the pulpit for effect. He is as natural before a congregation as he is in the quiet of his home. With an implicit trust in the One for whose cause he is to speak, and the confidence which a well-prepared message affords, Dr. Forney comes before his congregation with perfect self-control. With his sermon-outline clearly in mind, he trusts to the inspiration of the moment to furnish words for the expression of his thoughts. In this he is never disappointed, for philology has been one of the delightful studies of his life, and has resulted in a rich vocabulary that never fails to furnish the most precise and expressive word at the proper time. There is a dignified sincerity in his sermon delivery which manifests itself in the blending of a choice phraseology with a tenderness of feeling. He speaks with a freedom born of a knowledge of the truth, and a liberty produced only by the presence of the Spirit. His impressive manner brings the conviction that the truth which he preaches is a personal treasure, and that it is transmitted out of the abundance of the heart. His preaching contains the essential elements of true eloquence, which we are told is the power to convince the judgment, kindle the imagination, move the feelings and give impulse to the will.

It is more than an ordinary privilege to sit under the preaching of Dr. Forney. It is both pleasant and profitable. It is the privilege of listening to one who, while his voice is not so strong as that of many public speakers, has an enunciation so clear as to be heard by the average congregation with ease. And there is a melodiousness in his voice which adds to the impressiveness of his utterances, as well as to the pleasure of listening. It is the privilege of hearing one who has a clear apprehension of the truth, whose loyalty to the truth is unquestioned, and who is in every way worthy to speak in the name of the Master. His logical analysis, his clear exposition, and his simplicity of speech combine to make the truth stand forth with a prominence too plain to be misunderstood. And while his sermons are of greater length than those to which the people of to-day are accustomed, the amount of truth presented is fully equal to the time used in expressing it, and this is the true standard by which to determine the proper length of a sermon.

Back of the message is the man, who, so far as human agencies are concerned, gives to the sermon its vital power. The words of a speaker are effective only so far as they are backed by a corresponding example. And those who receive instruction from Dr. Forney's preaching, and have the needs of their hearts carried to a throne of grace by his comprehensive and fervent pulpit prayers, realize that they are being helped by one who speaks, not alone from the printed page of the Scriptures, but also from the epistle of Christ written on his own heart by the Holy Spirit. And they go out from the service with feelings which can be appropriately expressed by a quotation from Hawthorne: "His words had power because they accorded with his thoughts; and his thoughts had reality and depth because they harmonized with the life he had always lived. It was not mere breath that this preacher uttered; they were the words of life, because a life of good deeds and holy love was melted into them. Pearls, pure and rich, had been dissolved into the precious draught."

As a Leader.

While there is no superior order in the ministry of the churches of God, there are leaders to whom special duties are committed, either by official action or common consent. These men become leaders by virtue of their efficiency and fidelity. Their ability is recognized by their brethren, who concede to them positions of trust and responsibility. And their fidelity is a stepping-stone from the lower to the higher positions. True and permanent leadership, therefore, is inseparably connected with faithful service. One may attain a leading position in some other way, but it will not be long continued. The only one who can exert a controlling influence through the years uninterruptedly is the one who is constantly devoted to the cause with which he is connected. He must serve before he can rule, and the extent of his leadership will be determined by the measure of his devotion to the duties that devolve upon him.

Among the names of men who by intelligent and faithful service have attained positions of leadership in the work of the churches of God none stands out with more prominence than that of Dr. Forney. What Elder Winebrenner was to the churches, to the East Pennsylvania Eldership and the General Eldership during the first part of the history recorded in this volume (a period of some thirty years), Dr. Forney has been during the past forty years or more. And the record of these years furnishes a clear illustration of the frequently-expressed belief that when one leader in the cause of righteousness falls the Lord raises up another to take his place. For it is interesting to note, in thinking of these two faithful servants, the close connection between the end of the labors of the one and the beginning of the work of the other. It was only thirteen days after the death of Elder Winebrenner that Mr. Forney was granted a "Preacher's License" by the Standing Committee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. Elder Winebrenner attended the East Pennsylvania Eldership for the last time in 1859, and the following year Elder Forney was in attendance for the first time. The last General Eldership that Elder Winebrenner attended was that of 1860, while the next meeting of that body, in 1863, was the first one attended by Elder Forney. It should not be inferred that Elder Forney was the immediate successor of Elder Winebrenner. That distinction naturally and properly fell to Elder E. H. Thomas, Editor of The Church Advocate. But it was only nine years after the death of Elder Winebrenner that Elder Thomas was called to his reward, and was succeeded by Elder Forney.

The leader of a religious body is the one who does most to shape its policies and stimulate and direct the thought of the people. And it was as Editor of The Church Advocate that Dr. Forney, for forty years, exerted an influence of this kind that no one else was in a position to wield. It was to him that the brethren were wont to turn for counsel and guidance, and they never looked in vain. It was in the editorial columns of The Church Advocate that their perplexing problems were solved, their discouraged hearts inspired, and their hesitating footsteps directed. In this position of leadership Dr. Forney was thoroughly loyal to the old landmarks. He was true to the spirit of Winebrenner, Thomas and other leaders who had preceded him. At the same time he was aggressive. He developed the plans of Winebrenner into wider spheres, and, when wise and necessary, carried them out with new methods, but always with an eye single to the honor of the truth and the prosperity of the churches. Most of the enterprises of the General Eldership for the past forty years had their inception in his editorial suggestions and discussions, and to a great extent the same is true of the annual Elderships. In these matters his conservatism and aggressiveness were always blended in proper proportion. His attitude as a leader has been eminently fair. He has kept in close and sympathetic touch with both the old and the young. He has used his influence for what he believed to be the highest good of every institution and individual. Instead of cultivating an ambition to surpass his brethren, he has devoted himself to the development of his own talents and the improvement of his opportunities for usefulness.

In discussing the leadership of Dr. Forney attention must be given to both the East Pennsylvania Eldership and the General Eldership. Present space will not permit even the enumeration of the many official positions which he has held in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, for it would require quotations from the journals of more than fifty years. A few examples must serve as an imperfect index of a half century of official service. In 1869 Elder Forney was elected as a member of the Standing Committee, a Committee of which he is now, and has been for many years, the Chairman. He is President of the Board of Education, and his service in this connection dates back to 1875. He offered the resolution which created the Board of Church Extension, in 1880, and has been a member of it ever since. On the Board of Missions, of which he is the President, he has rendered faithful service for many years. He was the Secretary of this Board in 1863, and its President as early as 1865. He was also instrumental in the formation of the East Pennsylvania Sunday-School Missionary Society, an effective organization of earlier years. He was the President of the first two Sunday-school conventions in East Pennsylvania. He served as Speaker of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1874, 1877, 1883 and 1889. Besides these elective positions, he has been a member of the most important appointive committees from year to year.

The simple statement of these facts may mean but little to the uninformed, but to those who have served in similar positions it stands for an immense amount of work, especially for one who, like Dr. Forney, is always an active and never a nominal member of a board or committee. His burden of work is heavier than that of any other member of a board or committee to which he belongs. As Chairman of the Committee on Ordination he leads in the examination of all applicants for ordination to the ministry. As President of the Board of Education he arranges for and conducts the examination of students in the Eldership Course of Studies, a Course which he, for the most part, prepared and revised. As Chairman of the Stationing Committee his judgment is the principal factor in solving the problems connected with the perplexing work of appointing pastors. As Chairman of the Standing Committee he has "the care of all the churches" during the year, which includes the visiting of appointments to adjust difficulties, to arrange for the filling of vacancies, and all that belongs to a general oversight of both churches and preachers. As President of the Board of Missions he directs in the work of providing for the weaker churches, as well as in visiting the mission fields. And to be a member of any committee usually means that the preparation of its report is left to him. His work, moreover, has not been confined to the positions to which he has been elected or appointed. In not a few cases he has originated the board, the committee, or the enterprise which has contributed to the prosperity of the churches. He has also had much to do in shaping our form of ecclesiastical government, having rewritten and revised the greater part of the Constitution of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, as well as that of the General Eldership.

As an earnest and devoted student who recognized the value of education in the ministry, it was altogether natural for Elder Forney to agitate this subject, which he did from the very beginning of his membership in the East Pennsylvania Eldership. While pastor of the church of God at Mount Joy, Pa., he was engaged for a year or more as a teacher in the Mount Joy Academy, of which Professor E. L. Moore was the Principal. Learning that Professor Moore was willing to sell the Academy, Elder Forney brought the matter to the attention of the Eldership which met at Mechanicsburg, in October, 1861, and was appointed on a committee "to confer with Mr. Moore." The other members of the committee were Elders E. H. Thomas and A. Swartz. The committee, in connection with the Committee on Education, reported, among other things, "that special efforts be made for purchasing or establishing an institution of learning under the control of the Church, for educating our youth and preparing young men for the sacred ministry." The subject was thoroughly discussed, in connection with the proposal of Mr. Moore to sell the Mount Joy Academy to the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The opportunity to secure a school of this kind, to be under the jurisdiction of the Eldership, was looked upon with favor, and Elder Forney and Professor Moore were granted permission to canvass the churches "to obtain subscriptions of stock for the contemplated purchase of said Academy." They sent out a circular letter, and also canvassed some personally, but without receiving much encouragement, and at the next meeting of the Eldership the project was dropped, as being "beyond the jurisdiction of the Eldership." The meaning of this action, presumably, was that the establishing of schools is the work of the General Eldership. In 1876 the Board of Education, with Elder Forney as President, took under consideration a proposition from Professor Ege, of the Cumberland Valley Institute, at Mechanicsburg, Pa., to sell that institution to the Eldership. Perhaps it was thought that if an Eldership desired to establish an academy the General Eldership would cheerfully consent, as in fact it did in later years when such an occasion arose. But after carefully considering this proposition the Board decided that it would be inexpedient to purchase a school property without further agitation of the subject among the brethren. At the General Eldership of 1872 the Committee on Education, of which Elder Forney was the Chairman, submitted a report recommending the acceptance of an offer from Hillsdale College, Hillsdale, Michigan, to establish a professorship in that institution by appointing a professor and providing for his salary. The report was adopted, and the first Board of Education of the General Eldership, with Elder Forney as its President, was elected to take charge of the matter, but the project was never carried out.

Not discouraged by these temporary failures, Elder Forney continued his agitation along educational lines, principally through the editorial columns of The Church Advocate. He believed that our people were able to establish and maintain an institution of learning, and that all that was necessary was to give them a wider vision and cultivate their spirit of liberality. This he endeavored to do, and was rewarded at the General Eldership of 1881 by the adoption of a report which he presented as Chairman of the Committee on Education, May 30th, recommending that a Church school be established at once. This action of the General Eldership, which resulted in the establishing of Findlay College, had its inception in the action of an educational convention which met in Harrisburg, Pa., October 19, 1880, at the call of Elder Forney, President of the Board of Education of the East Pennsylvania Eldership.

The General Eldership of 1881 placed the matter of locating and establishing a college in the hands of its Board of Education. And when it was decided to locate the college at Findlay, Ohio, it was found necessary to have a Board of Trustees legally incorporated under the laws of that State. This provision was made when the Executive Board of the General Eldership met at Findlay, January 25, 1882, and appointed the first Board of Trustees. Dr. Forney, as a member of the Executive Board, was the author of the action which created Findlay College, gave the institution its name, and defined the powers of the corporation. He also prepared the Articles of Incorporation. The following year the Board of Trustees, at a meeting held June 20, 1883, elected Dr. Forney President of the College. This was a natural selection, considering the leading part which he had taken in the work of establishing the institution, and it indicated the strong confidence which the brethren had in his ability and fidelity. While he had neither sought nor expected this position, he appreciated the honor which the Board's action conferred upon him. And it was not until after he had given several months to the careful and prayerful consideration of this opportunity for service that he sent his letter of declination to the Board, which was reluctantly accepted at a special meeting held December 5, 1883. In this letter he said: "I have an abiding and predominant desire to serve the Church in that capacity for which I am best adapted, and in which I can be of greatest service to its interests. But I am not able to concur with the Board in the view that, considering all things, my proper position is at the head of Findlay College." He also expressed the hope of being "able to do something toward making Findlay College a success and a great blessing to the Church" in whatever capacity he might labor. This he continued to do by leading the thought of the brotherhood as he wrote on the college and its work from time to time, educating our people to the necessity and advantages of education, and encouraging them to greater liberality. When the time came to dedicate the college, June 20, 1888, Dr. Forney was selected to deliver the dedicatory address. He spoke on "Christianity and the College," and in an exhaustive and scholarly manner defined the relation between Christianity and education, and discussed the principles which are essential to a Christian institution of learning.

The evidences of Dr. Forney's interest in educational matters has not been confined to his words of tongue and pen. He has been a contributor from time to time to the financial support of Findlay College, his gifts aggregating more than a thousand dollars, and on June 12, 1905, he made himself personally responsible for the endowment of the President's Chair. Though he had declined to accept the office of President of the College, he thus provided for the support of the men who may be called to that position from time to time through all the years. In doing this he gives back to the General Eldership more than half of the salary which he received for his forty year's of service in the editorial chair, thus making his work for more than a score of years purely a labor of love. He occupies the unique position of being a leader in both the intellectual and the financial affairs of our educational work. His counsel has been a guiding factor in the management of the College, and his gifts amount to more than those of any other donor.

The influence of Dr. Forney has also been a leading factor in the missionary work of the General Eldership, both home and foreign. This influence has been exerted by wise editorial counsel, and by resolutions, reports and discussions in the General Eldership, rather than by active official service. And yet he has not infrequently acted in an official capacity in connection with our general missionary enterprises. He was elected a member of the first "Board of Foreign Missions" created by the General Eldership, in 1878, for the purpose of establishing "a mission in India at as early a day as practicable." In those earlier years, when efforts were being made to unite with the Free Baptist Church in foreign missionary work, Dr. Forney was more than once selected as a representative of our highest governing body. And more recently, from 1906 to 1909, he served as President and Secretary of the Commission on unification of our missionary societies, a position which required clear judgment and much patience, and involved a voluminous correspondence. While most of his years have been spent in the quiet work of the editorial office, the missionary spirit has nevertheless been a predominating one in his life. And the results are to be seen in the steady and substantial growth of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and in what this Eldership has done for the work on the frontier, as well as in all of the missionary enterprises of the General Eldership.

But it is in connection with our publishing interests that the monumental character of Dr. Forney's work as a safe leader and successful manager appears to the best advantage. He had charge of The Church Advocate for forty years, and not only brought it up to a high standard of literary excellence, but also placed it on a self-sustaining financial basis. During nearly all of these years he was the Business Manager as well as the Editor, and by his good judgment and careful economy rendered invaluable service to the General Eldership. When he took charge of the paper, in 1869, it was still struggling to free itself from a burdensome debt. In a few years this was accomplished, and then there began to accumulate a small surplus from year to year, which has continued to the present time. But this upward course was not entirely without interruption. There were occasional disappointments, as for example during the triennium of 1878-1881, when the Editor had to contribute $200 in order to continue the publication of the paper. He also refused an increase of salary by the General Eldership on two occasions—in 1875 and 1887. To this personal devotion to a cause, and to the most faithful and persevering efforts, must be attributed the success of our official organ.

In addition to placing The Advocate on a safe financial basis, Dr. Forney had another ideal—the establishing of a publishing house of our own. As early as 1880 he urged this matter editorially, insisting that the churches were able to inaugurate and maintain such an enterprise. This view was somewhat in advance of the sentiment of the brotherhood, as is evident from the fact that it was not until twenty-one years later, in 1901, that our Printing and Publishing House became a reality. But these years were marked by steps leading up to the final accomplishment. In 1885 a Book Store was started in Harrisburg, in a rented building on Market street. The business prospered. The Advocate continued to earn a small annual surplus, which was carefully invested. Our other periodicals contributed their share towards the common end. This continued until 1899, when a fine property was purchased in Harrisburg, consisting of a lot fronting twenty-six and a half feet on Market street and extending back two hundred feet, with a four-story brick building on Market street, 26½ x 150, and a double three-story dwelling-house on the rear of the lot. Possession was secured in 1900, and the necessary machinery and outfit were purchased and the printing plant installed in July, 1901. The business prospered in every respect, and the last of the debt incurred in purchasing the property and starting the enterprise was cancelled January 1, 1909. The property, including the stock in the Book Store and the printing establishment, is valued at not less than $100,000. This is the home of our publishing interests. Here our periodicals are all printed, and from here they go out to the various parts of our general territory.

This statement concerning our Publishing House and Book Store is made because of its essential connection with the life-work of Dr. Forney. As Editor of The Church Advocate he cultivated the sentiment that led to its establishment. As Business Manager of The Advocate he was able to pay towards the Publishing House the sum of $14,880.00. And as President and Treasurer of the Board of Directors of the Publishing House and Book Rooms his has been the guiding hand in this enterprise since its inception. It will stand as a monument to his wise foresight and patient perseverance.

Notwithstanding a general disposition on the part of the brethren to yield to the judgment of Dr. Forney, it should not be inferred that his various projects were carried out without opposition. He has had the experience, common to all leaders, of meeting opposition that is dispelled only by the light of fuller information. To this end he has frequently found it necessary to discuss his plans at considerable length and to advocate the cause for which he was contending with more than ordinary patience and perseverance, at the same time answering the objections and arguments offered in opposition. It is in this connection, both on the Eldership floor and in the editorial columns, that his exceptional ability as a disputant appears to the best advantage. In fact, the comprehensive and conclusive character of his arguments has become so well known that in later years he seldom finds one who feels disposed to meet him in the arena of debate. The common custom is for other brethren to discuss questions that arise, and, after they have presented their views pro and con, all eyes are turned to Dr. Forney, who is expected to clear the polemic atmosphere of clouds, untangle the logical and illogical arguments, and, giving each factor its proper place and force, speak the final word. And his views generally prevail when they are brought to the test of official action.

Those who may read the above paragraph fifty or a hundred years hence should not associate it with the typical debater of early years, and imagine a man of unusual size, of boisterous voice, and of vigorous gestures, for such an impression would be farthest from the truth. Instead, let them draw a mental picture of a man of medium height; of erect and dignified bearing; modestly but faultlessly attired; unassuming in manner and gestures; with a fine intellectual face and exceptionally strong and expressive eyes; with a voice mild and musical, and a choice vocabulary and a careful enunciation that combine to make it a pleasure to listen.

Dr. Forney has always had an aptitude for disputation, and he found his first opportunities of this kind in the debating societies of his school days in the Linglestown neighborhood. Here he began to cultivate that habit of careful and exact statements and logical reasoning which has been so characteristic and effective in his later years. He also further equipped himself for public debate, as well as for the work of deliberative bodies, by a thorough study of parliamentary rules. He makes a thorough investigation of every subject, with that clearness of perception, that breadth of view and that unselfish consideration which usually enable one to select the right side of a question at issue. And the man who is thus prepared to take his stand on the right side, has the victory half won before the battle begins. By the right side is meant the position that is most nearly in harmony with the revealed will of the great Head of the church; that looks to the welfare of others rather than self; that places all interests of the church, local and general, in positions proportionate to their relative importance, and seeks to do the greatest good to the greatest number. Having taken his stand on this vantage ground, Dr. Forney proceeds to fortify himself with facts. Instead of speaking at random, or from hearsay, or on mere suppositions, he has all facts bearing on the question at issue carefully noted down, ready for use at a moment's notice. Every argument which might be offered is first brought to the test of truth, and is given as searching an analysis as it could receive at the hands of his opponent. Arguments on the other side of the question are given like consideration. It only remains, then, to properly marshal these facts in support of a position in order to maintain it. Thus, with a firm grasp of the whole subject in all of its details, Dr. Forney is able to take up a question calmly, and with confidence as to the outcome. He is an able and fearless defender of what he believes to be right, but is as calm as he is courageous. With all of his faculties under perfect control, and at instant command, he gradually unfolds his line of argument until it becomes as clear to his hearers as it is to himself. In doing this his tenacity for his own opinions is properly blended with a due respect for the opinions of others. He never allows a difference of opinion, however heated the discussion, to disturb his personal relations with, or his friendship for, his opponent. "Principia, non homines," is his motto.

The foregoing glance at the work of Dr. Forney as a leader will show that, both in the character and extent of his service, he ranks second to none in our history as a religious body. He has held one or more official positions for a longer period of time than any other man who has been connected with the churches of God. He became a member of the General Eldership which met at New Brighton, Pa., in 1863. That membership has continued without interruption to the present time, and, with the meeting of the General Eldership in 1913, completed the unparalleled record of fifty years. During that time every other member of the General Eldership of 1863 has passed away. Dr. Forney has also held an official position in the General Eldership for the same length of time. He was elected Transcribing Clerk in 1863, Assistant Editor of The Church Advocate in 1866, and was Editor of The Church Advocate from 1869 to 1909. He also served on the Board of Incorporation, the Board of Education, and the Executive Board of the General Eldership. He was elected President of the General Eldership in 1878, and again in 1905. He is now, and has been since 1893, the President of the Board of Directors of the Publishing House and Book Rooms, and, with the exception of one term, was its Treasurer since 1885. This makes a half century of continuous official service. He has filled these positions to the entire satisfaction of the brotherhood. The material interests intrusted to him by the East Pennsylvania Eldership and the General Eldership have shared in the careful management and wise economy which he devotes to his personal affairs, and with the same successful results. He has been faithful in the discharge of every duty devolving upon him. Loyalty and efficiency have characterized his work in whatever position he has been placed. While he has the gift of leadership in a pre-eminent degree, he has always been willing to serve, even though service meant the carrying of heavy and perplexing burdens. In fact he has carried in his heart the burden of every movement which promised to advance the interests of the churches of God. Other leaders have finished their labors and have gone to their reward, and sufficient time has elapsed to form a mature conclusion as to the value of their services. But Dr. Forney is still with us, for which we are profoundly grateful, and therefore the time is not yet here to form a final estimate of his leadership. Something can be said of his work, and its impress on every local and general enterprise can be clearly seen; but only the future can reveal the larger results. And it is safe to predict that each of the coming years will increase the appreciation which the churches of God have of his services, and confirm their conviction that they never had a truer friend, nor a more efficient, faithful and indefatigable worker.

As a Writer.

It was during Mr. Forney's student days at Obelin that he began writing for The Church Advocate. His first article was written on the Fourth of July, 1859, and published in The Church Advocate of July 21st. It was on the subject, "Can Backsliders Be Saved?" The article is not lengthy, and does not attempt to go into a thorough discussion of the question. There is lacking that positiveness which characterizes his writings of later years. With the natural timidity of a beginner he does not even pretend to decide the question, but contents himself with quoting certain passages of Scripture which have more or less of a bearing on the subject, and closes by saying:

"Brethren and sisters, let us watch and pray, and not become lukewarm and finally backslide. For if the backslider can be saved, it is after all a great risk; yea, the greatest risk that man can run to try it. Thus, my brethren and sisters of Pennsylvania, I have endeavored to celebrate the Fourth of July.

C. H. FORNEY."

Oberlin, O., July 4th.

His next article, which appeared the same month, was on "Bridling the Tongue," and was continued in a later issue. In his third effort, September 8, 1859, he took up the subject of "Baptism and Rantism." It related a conversation which he had engaged in with a fellow student who believed that sprinkling and pouring were as valid as immersion, without purporting to be a thorough discussion of the question. In fact he begins his article by modestly apologizing for attempting to write on the subject at all, saying:

"It would appear rather presumptuous in a youthful tyro like myself, to write an article for your beloved and ably conducted paper, upon the much disputed question of baptism, and I dare say I would be amenable to my more experienced brethren who have been investigating the subject, for my nugacity compared with their profound and elaborate essays and sermons that have puzzled from time to time the deluded and fluctuating minds of their opponents. But since it is not my intention to write particularly about the mode or anything else connected with the rite, I hope you will carefully read the few thoughts that I have to present, and not cast me off at once as an intruder and presumptuous novitiate."

That he possessed that independence of thought and investigation so necessary to the young ministerial student who takes his course at an institution of learning conducted by those of a different religious faith is shown in this article, in which he says:

"It is, however, not very strange if Oberlinites hold that sprinkling is the mode in which baptism ought to be administered, when the Doctors of Divinity descend from the pulpit with a baptismal font in one hand and then baptize, erroneously so-called, those who present themselves for admission into the church, unless they had been baptized previously."

Mr. Forney continued to write at intervals for the Church paper, and as early as the Spring of 1861, in a series of articles on "Redemption and Salvation," we find something of the positiveness and theological style with which we are now so familiar. These early writings contain a plentiful supply of large words, and a more frequent use of Greek and Latin words and phrases than are found in his writings of forty years later. This was in keeping with a custom of the time, followed by those who were able to do so.

The brotherhood was so favorably impressed with the ability of Elder Forney as a writer, as well as by his evident loyalty to the doctrines of the Church, that when the General Eldership met in 1866 he was elected Assistant Editor of The Church Advocate. During the next three years the products of his pen appeared in the editorial department of the paper, and were read with approval and profit. They showed a clear grasp of the duties and responsibilities of editorial work, and were true to every interest for the furtherance of which the paper was conducted. His work in this position received its official sanction when he was re-elected Assistant Editor by the General Eldership in the Spring of 1869. And when, in the Autumn of that year, he succeeded to the position of Editor-in-chief on the death of Elder E. H. Thomas, he received from the brotherhood that hearty support which is the outgrowth of confidence in one's efficiency and fidelity. That this confidence was justified needs no other proof than the fact that Elder Forney was continued in this position by the General Eldership for forty years, and was then relieved from its responsibilities only because of his urgent request.

In going over the pages of The Church Advocate from 1869 to 1909, one is forcibly impressed with the wide range of the field of editorial discussion. While this is accounted for in part by the great length of this period, it also reveals the versatility and the extensive reading and research of the Editor. The editorial office furnishes an exceptionally favorable opportunity for reading, including that which is optional, as well as that which is obligatory. And this continued opportunity, improved by the alert and inquisitive mind of Dr. Forney, contributed a fund of information and developed a breadth of thought which made his editorials as comprehensive in their scope as they are valuable in their character.

His writings on devotional subjects are both instructive and inspiring. They deal with every phase of scriptural truth. The great doctrine of regeneration, which has meant so much in the work of the churches of God, is set forth in no uncertain terms. Great emphasis is laid on the importance of experimental religion, and ministers are exhorted to so teach this truth that they may not weaken the local churches by bringing into their membership persons who have not been born again. Then the welfare of the true convert is taken up and considered in all the various relations that he sustains in life, giving careful thought to his opportunities and his obligations, his trials and his triumphs. The church has a large share in the editorial discussions, and all of its means of grace are clearly explained and urged upon the favorable consideration of the people as contributing factors in their spiritual development. The home, with its far-reaching influence and the value of its devotions, is given proportionate attention, as are all the phases of life with which the individual Christian has to deal. Nothing is neglected or overlooked, but everything pertaining to the spiritual welfare of the readers is given due attention by the Editor, just as a studious and faithful pastor looks to everything that concerns every member of a local church during a long pastorate.

Dr. Forney always kept himself thoroughly informed concerning the activities of other religious bodies, and gave the readers of The Church Advocate the benefit of his information. And, with his clear view of a situation and his philosophic method of considering it, he was able to do more than merely report the news; he could interpret the handwriting on the wall as well as call attention to it. This was of great value to the reader, because many subjects of importance in the religious world are scarcely considered by the secular press, and the average layman knows but little about them unless informed by his Church paper. His editorial utterances, however, were not confined strictly to what are known as religious subjects. He discussed other questions that were of general interest, especially those pertaining to reform movements, such as the efforts to secure a better observance of the Sabbath, and the various temperance movements. These subjects were not merely touched on incidentally, but were given that broad view and careful thought that always characterize the work of the man who believes that "what is worth doing at all is worth doing well." As an illustration of this fact we mention the editorial discussion preceding the Prohibition Amendment campaign in Pennsylvania in 1889. These editorials continued weekly for four months and a half—from the announcement of the passage of the Resolution submitting the question to a vote of the people, made in The Advocate of February 6th, to the time of the election, June 18th. Every phase of the subject was carefully reviewed. The question at issue was fully explained, as were the methods by which the campaign was to be carried on. The prohibition forces were brought into review, and the elements of the enemies' strength were accurately measured. Then follow five editorials on "Indictment of the Liquor Traffic;" one on "The Liquor Traffic the State's Worst Enemy;" one on "The Liquor Traffic a Fruitful Cause of Infanticide and Insanity," and one on "The Amendment and the Grain Market." The discussion closed with four editorials on "Objections to Prohibition." These twenty editorials fairly illustrate the wide scope of his editorial discussion of important questions.

Another class of subjects that frequently received editorial consideration, and which constitutes one of Dr. Forney's most valuable contributions to the churches of God, is made up of questions on Church doctrine and polity, and matters pertaining to our general interests. Some of these questions were discussed because certain occasions suggested them to the Editor, and many others were sent in by ministers and laymen with the request that they be answered editorially.

These editorials cover practically every phase of Church doctrine and polity that could arise, and, in the absence of a comprehensive work on the doctrines and polity of the churches of God to which inquiring minds could turn, they have been of very great value to the ministry and to the churches. They include in their scope all of the doctrines of the churches of God, both general and specific. Every passage of Scripture having any bearing on these doctrines is carefully considered and every objection is fully answered. In this way there was furnished to the ministers of the churches of God information and arguments on the ordinances, as well as on other doctrines, that was of inestimable value in their work of contending "for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints."

The editorials on Church polity deal with everything from the local church on up to the General Eldership. The scriptural officers of the local church are named and their qualifications and duties clearly set forth; so are the privileges and responsibilities of the members. The Annual Eldership, with its various boards and committees, and their respective powers, is often made the subject of editorial consideration. So is the General Eldership, with the duties of its different boards and their relation one to another, as well as the more general but no less essential connection that extends from the local church, through the Annual Eldership, up to the General Eldership.

The enterprises of the General Eldership always found their strongest supporter in The Church Advocate. The mission work of the Church was encouraged and plans suggested for its advancement. The importance of having a college and a publishing house was urged by the Editor for many years before these institutions were established, and his influence was a potent factor in leading up to their establishment and in guiding their activities.

The character of Dr. Forney's editorial writings is as high as their scope is wide. He has always been a close student and a careful observer. He has cultivated a lucid and forceful style of expressing the results of his researches and observations. His editorials reveal the tastes and habits of the scholar, and have the charm of a diction that is both strong and graceful. But in addition to these general observations, it is in order to write more specifically of a few of the characteristics of these editorials which for forty years contributed so much to the instruction and encouragement of the ministry and the laity of the churches of God.

They bear the marks of painstaking preparation and thorough discussion. This accounts, in part at least, for the unusual length of certain editorials, which perhaps did not appeal to that class of readers to whom brevity is most desirable, and who insist on a writer expressing himself on almost any subject in a few paragraphs. But every earnest and conscientious writer feels disposed to say all he can in support of his position, and Dr. Forney, being a man of wide research and retentive memory, had much to say on any question pertaining to his line of work. Moreover, he kept in mind the facts that most of our ministers do not have the extensive libraries necessary to make exhaustive researches for themselves, and that an elaborate consideration of certain questions is an advantage to the laity in helping them to a better understanding of the truth. In nothing else is this feature of Dr. Forney's editorial work more noticeable than in his answers to questions on Church doctrine and polity. One is especially impressed with the care and labor bestowed when comparing his answers with the answers given to such questions by the editors of other Church papers. Instead of a few brief paragraphs, as in other papers, it was his custom to write an editorial of two or three columns, or perhaps a series of editorials. The questions were not only answered, but proofs were given and reasons assigned from Scripture, history, commentaries, etc. This required a great deal of extra time and labor, but the service was given cheerfully for the good of the cause, and hundreds of ministers and thousands of laymen can testify to its value.

While as a rule the positions taken by Dr. Forney in his editorial discussions were accepted by the brotherhood, there were occasional exceptions. Once in a while a contributor would call in question the tenability of a position taken by the Editor, which would call out his ability as a disputant. His replies were always characterized by the utmost courtesy to his opponents and fairness in dealing with the divergent views presented by them. He always carried on his controversies in a spirit of brotherly love, without malice and without guile. In 1884 he had a discussion with a minister of the Iowa Eldership on "The Unity of Moral Character," which continued for five weeks. In 1891 he had what was perhaps his most exhaustive editorial discussion on doctrinal questions. It was with a minister of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, on the several phases of the Millennium, and continued for fifteen weeks. The Editor defended the post-millennial as against the pre-millennial theory, advocating the doctrines of a simultaneous resurrection and judgment. It was at the General Eldership of 1896 that the change was made in Eldership titles from "Church of God" to "churches of God." This question was first brought up by Dr. Forney in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and by that Eldership sent to the General Eldership of 1893, and by the latter sent down to all of the Annual Elderships for action prior to the General Eldership of 1896, at which time the above change was made. During the intervening three years this question was carefully considered, as suggested by the General Eldership, the Editor of The Advocate taking the leading part in the discussion. He first published a series of six editorials on "Change of Eldership Titles," in which he strongly advocated the proposed change.

Then about six months were given for other brethren to express their views, after which the Editor reviewed these articles in a series of ten editorials, making sixteen in all. In earlier years Dr. Forney had strongly defended the singular form of the word "Church," but his views had undergone a change on the subject, which he frankly stated in the beginning of the discussion. The proposed change under consideration involved two things—a change from "Church" to "churches," and from "Eldership" to "Association." When the matter came to a vote at the General Eldership of 1896 the former carried, but the latter failed to pass. These few examples, selected from many others, will indicate the thoroughness with which the Editor investigated and discussed the questions brought before him. He always took his stand squarely on the word of God. "To the law and the testimony" was his battle-cry, and a "thus saith the Lord" was the deciding voice. In fact the dominant passion of his life has been to hear the voice of God as expressed in the written word. And in nothing else is his thoroughness more manifest than in his investigation of the Scriptures. He first takes up the Bible and studies it in the original languages, and with the utmost care. Then he turns to every other book at hand that may throw any light on the question at issue. And, not stopping with his researches in his own extensive library, he has spent hours of time in the book stores and libraries of Harrisburg and Philadelphia for the same purpose.

If the subject taken up for consideration did not involve any controversy, but was one of a great variety of topics that were discussed from time to time, it received the same careful consideration. In that case the writer simply led the way for the reader in the search for the truth. All possible light from the lamp of the word was first thrown on the subject, and then history, the opinions of the world's best scholars, observation and experience were all laid under tribute to help in the solution. Thus they came to a common conclusion hand in hand, and with the satisfaction of looking back over a field of investigation that had been thoroughly covered. And this close attention to preparation and thoroughness of discussion was given to all editorial work, whether it involved any important question of doctrine or not.

These editorials are conclusive in their character. A conclusive argument is a natural product of painstaking preparation and thorough discussion in support of a tenable proposition. The comprehensive character of Dr. Forney's editorials indicates the extent of his investigation, while his careful preparation is shown by his accuracy of expression and the logical arrangement of the facts disclosed by his researches. This explains why the editorial utterances of The Church Advocate were generally regarded as conclusive. They were accepted as such because they were in harmony with the facts—in harmony with the Scriptures, with the history of the churches of God, and with the teachings and practices commonly accepted among us. In this way The Church Advocate has exercised an influence second to none in shaping our policies, directing our activities and confirming our faith.

His writings are of an enduring character. The student of Dr. Forney's editorials will look in vain for the ephemeral. There is nothing light or trifling. He wrote to instruct rather than to entertain. Much that he wrote thirty and more years ago could be reprinted with equal profit to-day. The truths he taught found an abiding place in the minds and hearts of the people. They are being reiterated in the pulpits and the homes. They will stand the test of time. They will continue to exercise a potent influence in the religious life of the churches of God, for the guidance, comfort and progress of which they were written.

It is impossible for the uninitiated to fully understand the extent of one's duties in the editorial office, and the average reader has but a vague idea of the amount of work required every week in order to prepare and publish a paper like The Church Advocate. In addition to reading the daily papers and monthly magazines to keep in touch with current events, the Editor must read a large number of religious exchanges. He must read certain classes of books as they appear, in order to keep abreast of the best secular and religious thought. He has several pages of editorials to write every week. All other manuscripts must be edited by him, and then read the second time in proof sheets. Dr. Forney also had charge of the business affairs of The Church Advocate, all of which he attended to himself, including the collecting and paying of bills and the keeping of accounts with advertisers and subscribers. He spared not himself, but gave close personal attention to every detail of the work. There is perhaps not another weekly paper, equal in size to The Church Advocate, on which all the work is done by one man. There are usually three—an editor, an assistant editor and a business manager. It is only by having a thorough system and rigidly adhering to it that it is possible for one man to do this work, and this rule of life has been the secret of Dr. Forney's success in his abundant labors. In addition to his regular duties in connection with The Church Advocate, there were many other demands made upon his time, including an extensive correspondence growing out of his editorial position and his leading position in the East Pennsylvania Eldership and the General Eldership. These various matters received his careful attention. He conducted his correspondence with the utmost promptness. During the earlier years of his service the typewriter had not become the important adjunct to an office that it now is, and in later years he did not turn to it. All of his editorials, amounting in the aggregate to many volumes, and his correspondence including thousands of letters, were written with his pen. Well could he say, with Paul, after thinking of the primary duties and trials of his office, "There is that which presseth upon me daily, anxiety for all the churches."

When a reader finishes the last chapter of a book, he naturally decides whether or not the author kept his promises made in the preface. As we come to the close of Dr. Forney's editorial labors, we turn to his introductory editorial, in the issue of September 29, 1869. He had just taken charge of the paper, following the death of Editor E. H. Thomas. Among other things he says:

"We regard a religious paper as one of the greatest instrumentalities for effecting good, when properly conducted, which God in his providence has placed at the command of the Church of this age. . . . We shall endeavor to bring to it all the talent, ability and time which we can command. . . . It shall be our constant aim to keep the paper up to its present standard in every particular, and also to make such changes and improvements as from time to time may be thought advisable. We shall endeavor to furnish our patrons weekly with reading matter which, both as to quality and variety, shall not be inferior to that of the best religious journals of the day."

Forty years later, in 1909, Dr. Forney closed his final report to the General Eldership with these words:

"Many and precious, extending over the entire territory of the General Eldership, have been the friendships formed during these years. Always generously sustained by the General Eldership and upheld by the sympathy and prayers of the brotherhood at large, the official labors of all these years have been a delight. I avail myself of this opportunity to say, albeit I am sure it is not needful, that I am inexpressibly grateful to the General Eldership for the generous and abiding confidence which has led the delegates fourteen successive times to elect me to the important and responsible office of Editor of our Church organ. And as I retire from this honorable position I carry with me most cherished recollections of my editorial life. It has been practically my life-work, and it is submitted to the magnanimous judgment of the General Eldership and the beloved brotherhood, and to the gracious benediction of heaven."

A conservative estimate of the editorial work of Dr. Forney justifies the conclusion that "the official labors" which were "a delight" to the Editor were of inestimable value to the churches of God, and that the promises made in 1869 were more than fulfilled in forty years of faithful service. His record is rich in achievement, and secure in the hearts of his brethren.

As far back as 1893 Dr. Forney requested the General Eldership to relieve him of the responsibility which it had placed upon him. This request was renewed at succeeding General Elderships, but in each instance he was re-elected and prevailed upon to continue. In addition to this evidence of confidence the General Eldership from time to time, and the Annual Elderships from year to year, passed strong resolutions of commendation. And when the General Eldership finally yielded to his request to be permitted to retire, in 1909, it was with the unanimous adoption of the following expressions of esteem:

"Whereas, Rev. C. H. Forney, D. D., LL. D., has served as Editor of The Church Advocate for forty years, with a three-year term as Assistant Editor, and now, at his own earnest request, has been permitted to retire from that position; and whereas, his work as Editor and Business Manager of The Advocate has built a monument in the thought and heart-life of the churches of God, as well as in the property of our Publishing House and Book Rooms, that will continue to testify to his remarkable service; therefore, d "Resolved: 1st. That we heartily thank our heavenly Father for sparing him to and for us during these years, and that the present finds his physical, mental and spiritual strength unabated.

"2nd. That while we appreciate his labors and rejoice in their results, we value his Christian character and the proof of his personal integrity most of all.

"3rd. That we devoutly pray our Father to spare him for many more years of fruitful service, and that those years may be crowned by the goodness of God."

During these years Dr. Forney also found time to write an introduction to Winebrenner's sermon of 1830 on "Christian Baptism," republished in 1873; an article on John Winebrenner for McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia, in 1878; a preface to "Spiritual Songs," prepared by a committee of which he was a member, and published in 1882, and now extensively used as our Church hymnal; his work on "The Christian Ordinances," published in 1883; a preface to the revised edition of Winebrenner's "View of the Church," published in 1885, and of which he also did the work of revising and editing; an introduction to "Robert Woodknow," by Rev. Charles F. Reitzel, published in 1902; an introduction to a new edition of "Jewett on Baptism," published in 1905, and which Dr. Forney also revised and enlarged with quotations and references; an introduction to "Spiritual Counsel and Encouragement," by Rev. J. W. Gable, published in 1907. His work on "The Philosophic Basis of Ordinances and Bible Doctrine of Sanctification" appeared in 1906. The first part of this book is a sermon which the author had preached at several places, and the second part is a series of editorials which appeared in The Church Advocate in 1887. This, and his somewhat larger book on "The Christian Ordinances," with the present volume, are the only products of his versatile and active pen that have been published in permanent form. This is accounted for in part by the busy years of his life, which left but little time for anything aside from the regular duties of each day, and in part by his lack of inclination. It is worthy of note, that he never published anything, not even a pamphlet or tract, voluntarily. He prepared "The Christian Ordinances" for publication in compliance with an action of the General Eldership of 1881. His sermon on "The Philosophic Basis of Ordinances" was written out in response to the urgent request of quite a number of brethren, and, in connection with the "Bible Doctrine of Sanctification" (also by request), was published by Dr. C. I. Brown, President of Findlay College. And the present volume, to the preparation of which he devoted nearly four years, and which is destined to be his monumental work, is his response to the repeated requests of the General Eldership. Nothing but his strong sense of duty to the brotherhood, his love for the churches of God and their doctrines, and his recognition of the importance of preserving their history, could have induced him, at the age of seventy, to undertake this laborious task. But, once the decision was made, his plans were formulated and carried out in the same thorough manner that had characterized all of his previous work. Perhaps no other man would have devoted the time, or exercised the patience, necessary to examine every volume of the Church paper for seventy-five years, page by page, as he did in the preparation of this book. But as a result the churches of God have a work of inestimable historical value. All that has been previously said about Dr. Forney as a writer is applicable to his books. Here his thorough method of investigation, and his clear, logical and conclusive manner of expressing his thoughts are always in evidence.

It was but natural that Dr. Forney's ability as a scholar and writer, which was so generally recognized by the common consent of the brotherhood, should also be given official recognition. And this was done in 1905, when Findlay College conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws. The General Eldership had also been recognizing the value of his writings from time to time, not only by continuing him in the editorial office, but in the adoption of the most commendatory resolutions. And the same was done from year to year by all of the Elderships. These official actions recognize the sterling qualities of his Christian character and the versatility and resourcefulness of his ability; his unquestioned loyalty to Christ and the doctrines of the church which he established in the world; his marvelous capacity for work and his deep and abiding interest in every local and general enterprise; his carefully formed plans for the discharge of every duty devolving upon him and the benefits following their intelligent execution. And the sentiment is voiced that, considering the great length of his period of official service, its unusual opportunities and the faithful manner in which he improved them, no man has exerted a wider or more effective influence among us than Dr. Forney has by his voice and pen. And yet the most impressive thought suggested by the consideration of a long and useful life is, that the extent of its service can not be measured by any human standard. It requires greater wisdom than we possess and a longer time than we have to live to understand its meaning and measure its results. Some things can be mentioned, the more prominent ones, but the many smaller duties, the daily routine of events, which in the aggregate may be the greater forces, can not even be remembered. But they are not forgotten by the Master.

It is not possible, even if it were profitable, to separate the workman from his work. Back of the preacher, the leader, the writer, is the man of strong and gentle Christian spirit, who reveals and perpetuates himself in his achievements. And this is especially true of that part of his work which is most abiding—his work as a writer. The late Richard Watson Gilder, in writing on "Lincoln's Genius for Expression," says: "He achieved a singularly clear and forcible style, which took color from his own noble character, and became a thing individual and distinguished." This, to a greater or less extent, is true of every writer. What he is in his character he puts into his writings, and his writings, in turn, furnish the best index to his character. We have it from the highest authority that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," so that the character of a man's speech, whether spoken or written, is identical with the character of the man himself. Whatever Dr. Forney writes with his pen he subscribes to in his heart, and he writes as he feels. This will enable the readers of coming years to get a glimpse of the man through his writings. As they turn the pages of this book and admire its comprehensive scope, its richness of detail, its chaste literary style, the manifest fairness in the treatment of all subjects considered, and, above all, the Christian spirit that gives to every true production its highest value, they will be recognizing the prominent traits in the character of its author.

The splendid principles and characteristics which are so pronounced in his public work lose nothing of their charm in the privacy of his home. He and his sister, Miss Lydia A. Forney, have made their home together since 1868, both having remained single. Nearly all of these years have been spent in Harrisburg, in a large and well-arranged dwelling, constructed nearly forty years ago, in accordance with their personal desires. In their intellectual tastes and religious activities they have much in common. Miss Forney is a lady of culture and devotion, and has rendered invaluable service to the East Pennsylvania Eldership and the General Eldership, particularly in mission work and in connection with our Sunday-school literature. Helped by this companionship, and free from family cares, Dr. Forney has been able to prosecute his work with a singleness of purpose not possible to most men. In addition to these favorable circumstances, his life has been governed according to strict hygienic principles and methodical habits of work and recreation. He has always been able to wholly dismiss the responsibilities of the day when he turns from his desk, so that they may not interfere with the restful sleep of the night. In this way, although never a man of robust constitution, he has been able to lengthen his years and maintain his strength, and carry a burden of work that many a stronger man would have hesitated to assume. Manifold as his official duties have been, they have not prevented the exercise of hospitality. And by a delightful personality and a frank and intelligent conversation he has won the high regard and genuine affection of those who have been welcomed to his home. Here, in the midst of quiet and refined surroundings, he is spending his closing years. He entered the service of his Master in the early morning of life, and has continued his labors into the lengthening shadows. He has faithfully served his day and generation, thus bringing to the evening hours the sincere satisfaction of a well-spent life and the precious comfort of a hopeful sunset.

DIVISION II.

HISTORY OF THE ANNUAL ELDERSHIPS.

I. THE EAST PENNSYLVANIA ELDERSHIP.

1st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—There is no question more interesting in sociological science than the development of institutions and organizations. Their inception, gradual evolution and final character are questions of fascinating moment. Naturally great emphasis is laid on origins, on beginnings. We commemorate them; we institute fixed anniversaries. The organization of the first Eldership was generally commemorated by the Church of God in 1880, and created quite a measure of interest and enthusiasm. How, when, where and by whom did it originate are absorbing questions. To know the views of Winebrenner as published by him in 1829, and contrast them with the Eldership of 1900, one would not suppose that in 1830 he would have been the originator of these bodies. Yet the presumption is that he was. The origin was extremely simple. In writing the "History of the Church of God" for the "History of all the Religious Denominations in the United States," in 1844, Winebrenner states that a meeting of those who had similar views and were of kindred spirits was held in the Union Bethel, Harrisburg, Pa., in the month of October, 1830, "for the purpose of adopting a regular system of co-operation." The meeting was organized by electing John Winebrenner, Speaker, and John Elliott, Clerk. The morning session was spent in "solemn prayer and deliberations." At 2 o'clock p. m. a sermon was preached by the Speaker, from Acts v. 38, 39. "After the sermon," says Winebrenner, "the business meeting was called to order, and after some further consultation it was agreed, as the unanimous sense of the meeting: "First. That there is but one true church; namely, the church of God.

"Secondly. That it is the bounden duty of all God's people to belong to her, and none else.

"Thirdly. That it is 'lawful and right' to associate together for the purpose of co-operation in the cause of God.

"Fourthly. That we agree to hold an Eldership annually for this purpose, consisting of teaching and ruling elders belonging to the Church of God." To this declaration of principles the following six teaching elders subscribed their names: Andrew Miller, John Winebrenner, John Elliott, John Walborn, David Maxwell and James Richards. Winebrenner adds: "Thus originated the Church of God, properly so called, in the United States of America, and thus also originated the first Eldership."

The date of this meeting as given by Winebrenner is said to be uncertain. A. Snyder in his history of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, in 1880, discusses the question of date, but without definite results. All agree that the year, 1830, is correct. A. C. Raysor, in March, 1880, gives it as his "impression that it was held in January, 1830." As the second Eldership was held January 7, 1831, he thinks "it is not probable that the second was held three months after the first." This improbability is increased by the fact that the newly organized body had just resolved to "hold a yearly Eldership," or "hold an Eldership annually."

The body thus organized assumed no other name than "Eldership." The Minutes as published in The Gospel Publisher, Jan. 36, 1840, are, however, headed "Journal of the First General Eldership of the Church of God in Pennsylvania." But this is an anachronism, as the Minutes of 1831 call it "The Pennsylvania Eldership." But the term "General Eldership" adopted in the Constitution reported in 1831 was used later, so that in 1841 "the next annual meeting of the General Eldership of the Church of God in Pennsylvania" was called to meet Oct. 30th. The same form was used of the Ohio Eldership. The title was adopted to discriminate between the eldership of the local church, made quite prominent in Winebrenner's "Scriptural View of the Church of God," and this newly organized body. The members of this first organization were all teaching elders. But one of the actions taken declared that the Eldership shall consist of "teaching and ruling elders." No ratio of representation was adopted, nor any directions given concerning the election of lay delegates. The organization was of the most elementary character. No business was done beyond the adoption of the four resolutions above quoted. No one was ordained, and no appointments of ministers to fields of labor were made. No confession of Faith, or Articles of belief, were drawn up, and no declaration of principles was adopted. Not all the teaching elders were present at this Eldership, as several of them were opposed to the movement. Thomas Hickernell, who became the greatest revivalist in the West, was present, but he did not become a teaching elder until 1833.

Andrew Miller

Of the six teaching elders constituting the first Eldership of the Church of God, John Winebrenner was ordained by the General Synod of the German Reformed Church in Zion's church, Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 24, 1820. He withdrew from said Church in the year 1825. He remained the leading member of the Church of God until his death, in 1860.

Andrew Miller was converted in 1815, immersed in 1823, by Abraham Moyer, a United Brethren minister; became a member of the church of God organized in his house in 1829. He was a "full-faced, good natured German farmer," ordained a teaching elder by the church at his house in 1829. He traveled considerably in those early years, going as far as Carroll county, Md., and served several circuits by appointment of the Eldership. He became a member of the Printing Board, and assisted in starting The Gospel Publisher, and remained on the Board until the affairs of the Establishment were wound up. He died March 22, 1865.

John Elliott was an Englishman, eminent as a preacher and theologian. Where and when he entered the ministry the records do not reveal. He was pastor of several churches besides Lancaster, where he was the minister when he joined the first Eldership in 1830. In 1831 the Eldership met in his house at Lancaster. Here a charge was preferred against him for holding the doctrine of Universalism. This charge he denied, but confessed that he held the doctrine of Restorationism. At the Eldership held at Linglestown, October, 1831, this acknowledgment led to a lengthy debate, and to further charges of duplicity and studied concealment of his sentiments at Lancaster. He was disfellowshipped.

John Wallborn became a member of the first organization at Linglestown, in 1829. He was "a large, bold-hearted man, who feared nobody." He was ordained by the church at Linglestown "to preach the gospel" Nov. 15, 1829. He traveled different circuits until he was disfellowshipped, in 1841, for "making expressions which would seriously impeach the characters of sundry of the teaching elders of this Eldership; and on being requested either to prove what we think such expressions would imply, or make confession that he did wrong, which he has refused to do."

David Maxwell, a "thin, nervous, honest-hearted man," was a native of Mifflin township, Cumberland Co., Pa., born in the year 1792. He was converted at Shippensburg, and removed to near Linglestown, where in 1829 he became a member of the first organization in that village. He was ordained by said church Nov. 15, 1829, "to preach the gospel." He was a successful minister, and traveled extensively within the Eldership as a missionary for many years. "He was a good and faithful man," and "many will rise up and call him blessed as the instrument in God's hands in their salvation." He died Feb. 13, 1865.

James Richards was "a descendant of the Red Man of the forest," a physician. He was born in Lancaster county, Pa., March 15, 1797, and died March 1, 1880. In 1834 he was sent to Philadelphia as a missionary. He seldom had a regular charge, but was enrolled as a "general missionary," which then meant little more than local minister. He removed to Ohio, where in 1871 he was elected Speaker of the West Ohio Eldership. In 1872 he was a delegate to the General Eldership, and published a "Farewell Address to his relatives, friends and the Church of his choice" on the eve of his departure for Mt. Carroll, Ill. He was again a delegate to the General Eldership in 1875.

2nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Agreeably to adjournment, the second Eldership "met at the house of John Elliott, Lancaster, Pa., Jan. 7, 1881." An organization was effected by the choice of John Winebrenner for "President," and John Elliott for "Secretary." They were elected by ballot. The first resolution adopted provided for the appointment of a "committee to draft and report a system of rules and regulations for the transaction of business in our official meetings." The committee consisted of the President and Secretary, which reported at the afternoon session. Nine rules were reported, which provided:

1. For an annual meeting of "a General Eldership at such time and place as may from time to time be determined on;" that the Eldership shall "consist of all the ministers belonging to the same, and of an equal number of delegates chosen from among the ruling elders of each circuit or station." A quorum is to consist of a majority of all the members in attendance.

2. The annual election of a President and Secretary.

3. The third and fourth Articles defined the duties of these officers.

4. Threefold powers are given to the Eldership, to wit. (a) To receive by a plurality vote persons into membership. (b) To define the boundaries of circuits and stations. (c) To appoint the preachers to fields of labor, limiting the term to three years.

5. That whenever practicable two ministers are to be appointed to each circuit, the senior one to be called the Leader, and the junior, the Helper, and defining their duties.

6. That one or more missionaries are to be appointed annually, to visit destitute places, establish churches and assist in holding camp-meetings and other big meetings.

7. That "there shall be an annual reckoning with the ministers and missionaries in the service of the Church, and such salaries, and in such proportion, allowed them as the funds of the Church will justify, or the General Eldership authorize."

8. Presenting for amendments to the Rules, or the adoption of new or additional Rules.

This report was "ordered to lie on the table." Various other matters were taken up and discussed, but without any definite action being taken. The Eldership adjourned without doing any other business to meet in October of the same year.

3rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The third session of the "General Eldership" was held at Linglestown, Dauphin Co., Pa., "in October, 1831." The officers of the preceding session were re-elected. The Rule requiring "an annual reckoning with the ministers and missionaries," though not yet adopted, was put into effect, and the first business to hear reports of ministers and examine their characters. A charge was preferred against John Elliott for "holding the doctrine of Universalism." On a motion to retain him in fellowship it was decided in the affirmative, as he disavowed such sentiments. But on reconsideration at the next sitting this vote was reversed. John Walborn was then elected Secretary. The first applications were made at this meeting for licenses, which were granted to Edward West, William Bretz, John Greiger and Jacob Myers. West had been preaching for several years before he came to the Eldership, and Myers had been ordained by the church at Linglestown, Jan. 19, 1831. Without taking any action on the Rules, or making any appointments, the Eldership adjourned to meet in December, 1832.

4th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The session of the General Eldership was held at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, in December, 1832. Winebrenner was chosen President, and Walborn, clerk. The moral characters and conduct of the preachers were examined "to the great satisfaction of the whole Eldership." Jacob Keller, David Shrom, Jonathan Hawk and William McFadden were "ordained to office by granting them licenses." The Rules were not considered, but "a committee was appointed to arrange the preachers on the circuits and stations. The following was the report:

"Cumberland and Perry counties—E. West and John Walborn.

"Lancaster county—David Maxwell.

"Dauphin county—J. Hawk and Wm. McFadden.

"York county—David Shrom.

"Harrisburg and Middletown—John Winebrenner.

5th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1833 held its session in December, beginning on the 25th, at Middletown, Dauphin county. It was in session three days and a half. Thirty-six teaching and ruling elders were enrolled. Winebrenner was re-elected President, and James Mackey was chosen clerk. The reports of the ministers were heard and their characters examined. Brief abstracts of the reports were entered on the Minutes. Mackey reported his "call" to Shippensburg, which he left "to the wisdom and discretion of the Eldership to confirm or reject the same." Joseph Adams, John Lenkert, John Horning and Thomas Hickernell received licenses. Christian Forney was a member of this Eldership, and a local preacher. A Committee on Boundaries was appointed, which made three stations and nine circuits, one being the Ohio Circuit, with D. Maxwell as minister. But he did not go to his field, but instead took charge of the church in Philadelphia, and Joseph Adams traveled the Ohio Circuit, and "left the churches there in a very prosperous condition" at the end of the year. A resolution was adopted which provides "that each of the preachers shall keep an account of all his receipts and expenditures, and of the number of times he shall have preached during the next Eldership year, and make a report thereof at the next Eldership, when a division shall be made of all the salaries among the stationed and traveling preachers according to their several circumstances and wants." A committee was appointed, consisting of one preacher from each circuit, to arrange and fix the time of holding the camp-meetings in 1834.

The most important action taken related to the subject of a Printing Establishment, as the Eldership deemed "it highly important for the good of the cause of God to establish a religious paper."

6th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In 1834 the General Eldership met at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, Dec. 13th. Twenty-six teaching and ruling elders were present. The officers of 1833 were re-elected. Three "honorary members" were received. Fourteen teaching elders reported. A committee was created "to examine the journal of last year and report all items of unfinished business." A letter from Ohio gave "a favorable account of the state of religion." It recommended "several persons to the Eldership for license," and John Funk, of Ohio, was granted license, along with Jacob Flake, Henry Wingert and A. C. Raysor, of Pennsylvania. The camp-meeting committee was continued. A committee was also appointed "to report on the expediency and utility of the common stock resolution passed at the last yearly meeting." It recommended its repeal. A Standing Committee was created. Eleven fields of labor were defined, one being the Ohio Circuit, with Thomas Hickernell and Jacob Keller as preachers. One minister was expelled. Winebrenner was not assigned to a charge.

7th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The General Eldership, or East Pennsylvania Eldership, commenced its annual meeting for 1835 at Uniontown, Md., November 2nd. Twenty-two teaching and ruling elders "were recognized as being present," without stating how many of each class. The officers were John Winebrenner, President; Jacob Flake, Clerk. The ministers after making their reports were not required to withdraw while their characters were being inquired into. Jacob Keller reported "from the Ohio circuit." He also "presented a letter from a meeting of elders in Ohio, held September 7, 1835, requesting the privilege of holding a yearly Eldership in Ohio." This request was granted, and it was further resolved "to send two brethren to visit the Annual Eldership in Ohio." Fourteen ministers volunteered to take work the following year, of which number thirteen were appointed to the ten fields of labor, one of which was the Ohio circuit, with Hickernell and Keller as the preachers. In Maryland was the Uniontown circuit, with David Maxwell as the preacher. Schuylkill county had one circuit, Orwigsburg, with Jonathan Hawk as the preacher. Some differences of opinion arose on certain questions not mentioned in the Minutes, but a resolution was adopted "that the preachers meet together privately to converse" on these questions. The Clerk in a letter a few weeks later admonished all the brethren "to try as much as possible to speak the same things." He noted it as a "singular" fact, that while the preachers had "been to no theological seminary, yet the gospel flowed from their lips as a stream from the well of salvation."

8th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In the year 1836 the Minutes state that "the Eldership of the Church of God of Pennsylvania and Maryland commenced its annual session at Churchtown, Cumberland county, Pa., November 5, 1836." But no action was taken thus to change the title, for the Eldership in 1835 had resolved "that the next General Eldership meet at Churchtown." There were eighteen teaching elders in attendance, and twenty-two ruling elders. Winebrenner was re-elected "Speaker," and J. B. Porter, Clerk. Thus far there were no committees appointed by the Eldership, or the President, except that each year "a committee was chosen by ballot to appoint the teaching elders to their various places of labor for the ensuing year." Fields of labor were more or less rearranged each year. This year there were ten fields as before, but there were two circuits in Maryland, one in Washington county and one in Frederick county, while Uniontown, in Carroll county, is not on the list. Two ministers are assigned to Orwigsburg. Nine brethren were licensed, making the total number of teaching elders twenty-seven. Of this number twelve were assigned to the ten fields of labor, and the others are classed as "missionaries." There was a discussion at this meeting of the question: "Who are fit subjects for baptism?" and "it was unanimously agreed, that, according to apostolic doctrine, none but justified believers are fit subjects for baptism." A committee on camp-meetings was "appointed to make arrangements for holding camp-meetings the ensuing year." Contemplating the licensing of so many "promising young men," Flake suggested that "a spiritual ministry, of divine calling, will come from the bosom of the church, rather than from theological seminaries." It is notable that at this Eldership Joseph Ross, grandfather of "Charlie Ross," the Philadelphia kidnapped boy of many years later, was licensed to preach the gospel.

9th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In 1837 "the Pennsylvania Eldership" met in Harrisburg, on November 13th. It was composed of forty-two teaching and ruling elders. An organization was effected by the election of James Mackey, Speaker, and Edward West, Clerk. Thomas Hickernell, of Ohio, was present. A "messenger from the Christian Conference was received as a member of the body," by the name of H. Gaylord. "A communication" was received by his hand "from the P. C. Conference," to which Winebrenner and West were appointed "a committee to reply." West was appointed a delegate to the Christian Conference. The Speaker appointed the Stationing Committee, while by resolution a committee was appointed to arrange for the camp-meetings. A delegate was also appointed to the Ohio Eldership, and such annual exchanges of delegates between the Elderships was urged. A resolution was passed "recommending to the brothers and sisters generally to observe plainness of dress." The characters of ministers were carefully inquired into, and discipline administered without favor. At this Eldership a committee was appointed during the reports of ministers "to investigate a charge of immorality brought against J. B. Porter," Clerk of the Eldership in 1836. The report of the first committee "was disagreed to," and another committee appointed which was "authorized to deal with him according to the nature of the case." Whatever may have been the action of this committee, or the character of Porter's offense, when his "case was taken up" again later, a motion to expel him from the Eldership "was unanimously agreed to." Because Walborn had accepted the position of "office collector on the canal, and attends to the duties of the same on the Lord's day," he was brought before the Eldership. He was "excused and acquitted from the charge of immorality" because he did it "from necessity, and not from a want of reverence for the day, or because he believes it unauthorized by the head of the church as a Christian institution." Discussion of various subjects was continued, but no actions are on record.

10th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—November 11, 1838, the Pennsylvania Eldership met in Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa., on Sabbath. Presumably on Sabbath evening, to hear what later became the regular "opening sermon," though the fact only is recorded by Flake in a letter of November 22nd, that Mackey "preached in the morning," and that "other brethren spoke in the afternoon and evening." He thought it to be "well to begin our yearly meetings with worshipping God for one or two days." Winebrenner was elected Speaker, and J. Walborn, Clerk. Among those licensed at this Eldership were Edward H. Thomas, who later filled so large a place in the counsels of the Church, and George McCartney, third Editor of The Gospel Publisher. Also John Hickernell, who, like most of the fathers, had no educational advantages, yet "so developed his natural talents that he has had few equals in West Pennsylvania in pulpit power." When Winebrenner, who some charged was somewhat hasty in receiving strangers into the ministry, presented the name of "Bro. Ringer" he was "advised to write Ringer to procure some evidence of his moral character and good standing among the people where he now lives." A Standing Committee is here implied to exist, as it was "authorized to withhold or grant him license according to the nature of his evidences which they may receive from him." Upon his acknowledgment of having "done wrong in taking too active a part in politics in the late election," Walborn was "forgiven by the Eldership." The case of Wm. C. Cresop, licensed in 1836, was "referred to the Standing Committee for examination," with authority "to expel or license." Against Joseph Ross, licensed with Cresop, "charges were alleged of backbiting, and that he indirectly lent his horse to be used at a political celebration." But "he was cleared." A resolution on "Strange Communion" was adopted unanimously, that "it is inexpedient for the members of the Church of God to intermarry with the unconverted." Attendance at the "yearly meetings, or sending a communication," was made obligatory on pain of not having "his license renewed, or be considered a member of this Eldership." The Pittsburgh mission was established, and J. Hickernell and E. West were appointed the missionaries. Besides this mission, there were only eight fields of labor mapped out, with eleven pastors. Winebrenner was appointed "a delegate to the General Conference of the Free-Will Baptists, in Ohio," and also, with Flake, "a delegate to the Ohio Eldership." After discussion, "the question whether unbaptized persons are fit subjects for membership of a church of God" was "indefinitely postponed." The term "Eldership" was defended on the ground that it is the same as "Presbytery," and the right to hold an Eldership was maintained as a deduction from the fact that while such a body existed in apostolic times in each particular church, so the "elders of any larger number would still be an Eldership."

11th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The eleventh annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Eldership began its session at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, Pa., November 11, 1839, with a membership of fifty-four teaching and ruling elders. Winebrenner was elected Speaker, and Edward West, Clerk. A Committee on Overtures, and a Committee on Journals were created. The first Rule was adopted, providing that "no one shall be permitted to speak more than twice on one subject without special permission." When William Miller reported, a preamble and resolution were offered based on the fact that he "has been faulted for preaching the doctrine of the witness of the Spirit as one of the evidences of religion." This looked too much like "a declaration of belief," and so it was agreed to strike out "resolved," and the rest was adopted:—"That we agree in holding the belief that the Spirit and the word of God are not to be confounded with each other, but that they are to be considered as separate and distinct from each other, as Christ and the word, or as soldier and sword; that the Spirit may operate with or without the word as a means; that he has, may and does teach men their duty in some things apart from the word and independent of it; yet not in contradiction of it, and that he may, and sometimes does, bear a direct witness with the spirits of believers that they are the children of God." George Kimmel was called to account under complaints that he held the following erroneous opinions:

1. That he was "authorized and able to forgive sins."
2. That "three of the Epistles, to wit, Hebrews, James and Jude, are not canonical."
3. Views of Christ "rather peculiar, yet not materially wrong."
4. Professing "to have the gift of healing." After committees had been in consultation with him for several years, the matter was adjusted and his membership continued. It was provided that "all committees appointed by this Eldership to try any member or members thereof shall have power to cite them to appear at such time and place as they may choose to name." The local churches had hitherto ordained men to the ministry, as they did prior to the formation of the Eldership. This became quite unsatisfactory, and so a resolution was adopted "advising the local and individual churches not to grant perpetual, but limited, licenses to such as they may authorize and appoint to preach." The Eldership also expressed its "opinion," that "church members are, and ought to be, admitted by mutual consent." Ten fields, with twelve pastors, were arranged by the Stationing Committee, Morrison's Cove appearing the first time as a circuit.

12th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The twelfth session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, held at Newburg, Cumberland county, Pa., beginning November 9, 1840, was one of the longest so far held, and in some respects one of the most important. There were eleven fields of labor, with fifteen pastors, and twelve "missionaries," or local ministers. Winebrenner was elected Speaker, and Edward West, Clerk. The committee which received and acted on letters and other documents is now called by the specific name, although different functions with such committees in other bodies, of Committee on Overtures. Its duties were "to examine and report on all communications and documents addressed to the Eldership." The Eldership also for the first time passed "censure" on a church "for proceeding in a disorderly manner in appointing a camp-meeting without consulting the Camp-meeting Committee, and for examining some preachers in good standing in this Eldership before permitting them to exercise at their meetings." The "missionaries" all reported work done, with encouraging success. The Eldership appointed "a Board of Missions, with a view to carry out a system of Home Missionary operation," with "power to appoint an agent or agents to raise funds for the support of one or more missionaries to be appointed and sustained by them." One minister was expelled "for immoral conduct." Wm. McElroy, of the Methodist Protestant Church, and Wm. Bauermeister and John Tucker, both of the Baptist Church, were received and ordained. Nineteen ministers were assigned to fields of labor, on twelve circuits and stations and two missions. The missions were Virginia, with Samuel Conrad as minister; and Morrison's Cove, with Lininger and Snavelly as ministers. Winebrenner insisted, for want of adequate support the previous year, that he be given "a regular appointment in future, or else that some reasonable guarantee be given for his support as a home missionary." He was assigned to Middletown, Harrisburg and Lisburn.

13th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In 1841 "the Eldership of the Church of God in Pennsylvania" convened at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, Pa., with thirty-nine ministers enrolled. Provision was made for "messengers," several delegates having reported who were not elders. They were granted the "privilege of deliberating upon all subjects before this Eldership, but not to vote." Winebrenner was elected Speaker, and Joseph Ross, First Clerk, and J. F. Weishampel, Second Clerk. Thomas Hickernell was a delegate from the Ohio Eldership. There were several ministers expelled, Walborn on account of "expressions which would seriously impeach the character of sundry of the teaching elders of this Eldership," and because he "refused to make confession that he did wrong;" Bauernmeister "for immoral conduct and hypocrisy," and J. Myers "for immoral conduct." But among the licentiates were two young men who filled a large place in the subsequent history of the Church, George Upton Harn and Carlton Price. The Board of Missions created in 1840 reported the receipt of $70.00, and the expenditure of $75.83. A committee was appointed to negotiate with Winebrenner for the purchase of his copyrights and stereotype plates of the "Revival Hymn Book" and the "Reference and Pronouncing Testament." Winebrenner offered to sell them for $2,000. William Miller was appointed to solicit subscriptions for this purpose in Pennsylvania, and Thomas Hickernell, in Ohio. The territory of the Eldership was divided into fourteen fields of labor, with sixteen pastors. Winebrenner and Flake were assigned to Lancaster City. The Eldership decided as its "unanimous opinion," "that baptism prior to conversion is unlawful, and therefore a person should be rebaptized after he becomes a believer."

14th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—When "the Eldership of the Church of God in Pennsylvania met at Fayetteville, Franklin county, Pa., on Monday the 7th day of November, A. D. 1842," twenty-nine ministers were enrolled. They elected George McCartney, Speaker, and M. F. Snavelly, First Clerk, and J. H. Bamberger, Second Clerk. When in 1831 a Committee on Rules was appointed, and its report later "ordered to lie on the table," it was never called up, and the Eldership had neither Constitution, nor Rules of Order. But at this Eldership Winebrenner offered a resolution "that a committee be appointed to draft an Order of, and Rules for, the transaction of business at this meeting." Winebrenner, Mackey and William Miller were appointed. They forthwith reported an "Order of Business" of six items, and eight "Rules of Order." These Rules provided for two daily sessions; religious worship at the opening of each session; election of Speaker and Clerks who shall preside and conduct the business; only ministers of the Eldership and delegates elected by the churches shall have the right to vote; speakers limited to half an hour on a subject and to two speeches; motions admissible when a motion is pending, and the right to appeal from decisions of the Speaker, except "when he gives the casting vote." Ministers had been required to withdraw when they had reported, and while their characters were being investigated. This rule was abrogated. About three hundred and fifty conversions were reported during the year. The committee to raise funds to purchase Winebrenner's stereotype plates reported $745.75 subscribed, and $559.00 paid in. In order to provide funds for missionary purposes a resolution was adopted directing each preacher, "if the churches for which he labors agree to it," to "lift two collections each year for missionary purposes." There were six stations and nine circuits to which nineteen preachers were appointed, and Baltimore City was to be supplied. Indiana circuit was created, with J. M. Kleinas pastor. Cumberland county circuit during the year 1841-2 had increased from fourteen to twenty-two appointments. Other fields were expanding.

15th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Following the great excitement incident to the Millerite movement, the "Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God met at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, Pa., on the 6th of November, 1843." Flake was elected Speaker, and Geo. McCartney, First Clerk, and J. H. Bamberger, Second Clerk. The "Rules of Order and Schedule of Business of last year" were adopted "for the government of the present Eldership." It had been suggested in advance by Weishampel that "the Eldership might give some wholesome suggestions to the churches on a number of subjects," and mentioned "the propriety or impropriety of attending to the ordinances at camp-meetings and other large meetings; on forming missionary societies in each local church, etc.;" but the Eldership ignored the suggestions. The first steps were taken to form another Eldership. A letter was received from the Ohio Eldership, "requesting the formation of a new Eldership in western Pennsylvania and the eastern part of Ohio." Mackey offered a resolution "that this Eldership agree to the proposition," and it was adopted, and J. M. Klein, pastor on the Indiana circuit, was "appointed as a delegate to the new Eldership, and be instructed by the Standing Committee." Two delegates were also appointed to attend "the extra session of the Ohio Eldership in December next." To guard against objectionable books being introduced into the families of churches of God, or to facilitate the circulation of approved publications, the Eldership appointed "a committee to examine the books of the American Baptist Publication Society, and recommend to the members of the Church of God such as they could approve." The first private session was held. An unusual number of conversions was reported, aggregating over one thousand. Keller reported "between five hundred and six hundred" on his field. Harn baptized "sixty or seventy." J. Ross "baptized about one hundred and fifty." Lininger "baptized between forty and fifty." Winebrenner said: "In no one year of the twenty-three years he had gone preaching the gospel had he witnessed such mighty displays of Jehovah's power in the conversion of sinners as during the past year." The resolution to grant licenses only to "applicants who are disposed to travel" was rescinded. Among the half dozen who applied for, and received, licenses was John C. Owens, "a preacher in the Methodist connection," but he was directed first to be baptized. The purchase of the stereotype plates having fallen through, it was "resolved that the money which had been, or may be, collected be paid over to Bro. J. Winebrenner towards the debt which the Eldership owes him." But the wishes of contributors were to be consulted.

16th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—For the first time it is "the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God," and it met at Linglestown, Dauphin county, Pa., less than a mile from Wenrich's Reformed church. The date is November 13, 1844. Some new problems confronted the fifty ministers and thirty ruling elders which sat together in serious deliberation. George McCartney was duly elected Speaker, and J. H. Bamberger, First Clerk, and E. H. Thomas, Second Clerk. The advisory members were made "full members," and voted as well as spoke on questions before the body. The idea of forming a General Eldership was brought before this Eldership by Winebrenner at the morning session of the second day. It had not been discussed in The Gospel Publisher; but Winebrenner had been at the Ohio Eldership October 14, 1844, and at the West Pennsylvania Eldership, on October 28th, in part to urge this matter upon them. He did so successfully. He therefore "brought before this Eldership the actions of the Ohio and West Pennsylvania Elderships touching the propriety of holding a General Eldership, for the transaction of business of a general character." After some explanations and an interchange of views, the Eldership endorsed the movement, and at once elected five teaching and five ruling elders by ballot as delegates. It also resolved "that said General Eldership hold its first meeting in the city of Pittsburg, to commence on the 25th of May, 1845." The three-year limit of pastorates was established. It also took an important step to strengthen the authority of the Eldership over ministers by adopting a resolution declaring "that any preacher belonging to this Eldership, who shall refuse to carry out any order or resolution thereof shall be liable to a charge of contumacy and insubordination before the Standing Committee, or before this body." Written reports of ministers were required, to be handed to the Clerk for publication in the Journal. During the Summer, in the absence of any Rule or Constitutional provision, Winebrenner had written strongly in defense of co-operation, because Welshampel, aided editorially by Mackey, had started an independent paper, called "Gospel Missionary." He stigmatized it as a "disorderly and disorganizing project ———, contrary to all good government." He insisted that "when he [Welshampel] entered the Eldership he pledged himself to the system of co-operation." And "there is no manner of use to adopt the plan of co-operation, and then every one ad libitum make a strike for independency." "Before he commenced his 'Gospel Missionary' he ought to have consulted his brethren, and obtained permission to do so." The Eldership took up the matter, and it sustained these views by declaring that it holds the course of these brethren "to be irregular and contrary to the plan of co-operation," because they had "taken in hand to start the publication of a paper, called the 'Gospel Missionary,' with-on the consent and approbation of the Eldership." Mackey made a public explanation of his course, and it was condoned, and his license was renewed. But Weishampel, because he was "guilty of an act of insubordination in starting a publication in violation of a pledge given to this Eldership," and "for contempt of this Eldership," and "unjust charges and unchristian epithets," and "for unjust charges against this body," was expelled. He was subsequently restored as at heart loyal, and upon good evidence of repentance. Samuel Crawford, a Methodist minister and a radical anti-tobacconist, received license. The first mention of an "institution of learning" was in a resolution recommending "the Cedar Hill Seminary to our brethren and friends," a school for "young ladies." A day of "fasting and prayer for the purity and prosperity of religion among us, and throughout the world" was appointed. There were ten stations and sixteen circuits, to which twenty-eight preachers were appointed.

17th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership met at Lancaster, Lancaster county, November 12, 1845. J. Flake was elected Speaker; George McCartney, Recording Clerk, and J. H. Bamberger, Transcribing Clerk. Winebrenner offered Rules of Order, which were adopted. Also a motion providing for eight committees. Upon invitation "from various ministers now met in the Presbyterian meeting-house in this city," the Eldership appointed a committee of five to attend a convention the first evening of its session "to adopt measures for the better sanctification of the Sabbath and the suppression of vice and immorality." The Gospel Publisher had been suspended in August preceding the Eldership, and hence arrangements were made to issue an edition December 12, 1845, to contain the Journal. The reports of ministers so far as published do not show as large a number of conversions and accessions as some former years. The circuits were mostly very large. Dauphin and Lebanon circuit reported twenty-seven appointments, with nine organized churches and seven houses of worship. The Hagerstown circuit, Md., had ten regular appointments. Many fields were reported in a very prosperous condition. As this Eldership followed the session of the first General Eldership, held in Pittsburg, Pa., May 25, 1845, when "a wise, just and equitable plan for general co-operation" was matured, a resolution was reported by the Committee on Journals, declaring that "this Eldership highly approves of all the doings of the General Eldership, and cordially pledges itself to co-operate with it according to the Constitution, or plan, unanimously adopted." This "report elicited considerable discussion" at the Saturday morning session, when it was postponed until the afternoon. The "afternoon was entirely occupied in discussing the resolution on the adoption of the Journal of the General Eldership." It was resumed on Monday morning, and again postponed "after a short time spent in the interchange of views." In the afternoon "the interchange of views and sentiments" was continued, until finally "the report was unanimously adopted." Upon objection formally made to members of churches of God "attaching themselves to, or belonging to, the 'Sons of Temperance,' or any secret associations," the Eldership adopted a resolution declaring it to be "inexpedient for this body to interfere with the rights and privileges of the members of this Eldership, and the private members of the local churches in mere matters of opinion respecting charitable and reform associations." A Board of Missions was appointed, and it was recommended to the churches "to raise missionary funds on the plan proposed by the General Eldership." A committee was appointed to arrange for the camp-meetings in 1846. J. A. Plowman submitted "a proposition for a union between this Eldership and what he calls the General Conference of the Church of God." He asked for a committee to be appointed to meet a like committee from said Conference at Smith's school-house, Bedford county, Pa., on January 2, 1846, "to mature and complete, on certain conditions, the proposed union." Owing to the fact that Plowman had formerly been a member of the church of God at Shepherdstown, Cumberland county, Pa., the Eldership declared that it "can not agree to notice any overtures from" him. The Eldership took strong and definite action on the question of starting a new paper. There were nine stations and eleven circuits. Among them were Philadelphia, Baltimore, Dauphin and Juniata counties, Broad Top and Awkwick, with two fields in Maryland.

18th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1846, which assembled at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, on October 28th, is the first one to be "opened with a discourse," which was delivered by Winebrenner. Subject—"A Zealous Ministry." Text—Gal. iv. 8. This was in accordance with a resolution of the previous Eldership. There were twenty-three ministers enrolled. Jacob Keller was elected Speaker; E. H. Thomas, First Clerk, and Abraham Swartz, Assistant. When the "Martinsburg station" was called, "George McCartney, teaching elder," the entry in the Journal is: "Non est inventus." He had withdrawn from fellowship with the Church of God. Mackey having been elected a member of the Legislature, the question was raised whether a minister may hold a political office, that of Justice of the Peace being also mentioned. The matter was referred to a "private session," and the "decision" asked for is not published. Most rigid discipline was administered, and charges against ministers were promptly taken up. Edward West, who had returned his license received in 1845, brought three charges against Winebrenner. The first was for "monopolizing the publication and sale of hymn-books in the Church, and treating as disorderly walkers those who spoke of publishing a hymn-book." The Eldership decided that the hymn-book in use was duly authorized. The second charge was one relating to the right of "a church to license preachers," which West maintained according to Winebrenner's teaching in 1829. But Winebrenner accepted the action of the Eldership assuming exclusive right to license preachers, and so insisted that West should "submit to the proper authorities, or he should be marked as the Apostle directs." The third charge was for inconsistency in this matter of the right of a local church licensing preachers. Winebrenner explained this with the statement, that he "holds that the Eldership has the sole right to license the preachers connected with, and being members of, that body; but does not deny the right of individual churches to give license to preachers of their congregations who are not connected with this Eldership."

For the first time applicants for license were required to go before a committee on license. P. Stanton, colored, licensed in 1844, was this year appointed to a mission in Carroll county, Md., the first colored minister to receive a charge from an Eldership of the Church of God. There were ten circuits, four missions and nine stations. Among the missionaries was E. Logue to Iowa. Harn had by this time so changed his views on Eldership titles from "Eldership of the Church of God," to "Eldership of churches of God," that he persistently used the latter in his communications to the Eldership. But it had not yet become a mooted question.

The Board of Missions reported the receipt of $90.37. Yet the Eldership authorized it for the following year "to appropriate one hundred dollars to the Philadelphia mission, and fifty dollars to the Baltimore mission," without any provision for the Pittsburg mission, the Iowa mission, the Lancaster and Berks county mission, and the Carroll county, Md., mission for the colored people.

19th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—As per resolution adopted in 1846, J. Flake opened the Eldership session of 1847 "with a discourse" on Wednesday evening, the 20th of October. On the following day, instead of the officers of the previous Eldership, two ministers were appointed to constitute the Eldership. There were twenty-eight teaching elders and nineteen ruling elders enrolled. E. H. Thomas was elected Speaker; Jacob Keller, First Clerk, and D. A. L. Laverty, Assistant. As there were no permanent Rules, and no Constitution, the old Rules were adopted. Among the committees was one on Education, but no report was made. The powers of the Standing Committee were defined in a series of six rules, authorizing it to grant licenses and "receive persons as applicants for admission into the Eldership; upon request by churches or preachers concerned to make changes; to inquire into complaints against the moral and ministerial conduct of preachers, and advise, reprove, rebuke or suspend them; act as mediators in church difficulties, and act as trustees of property belonging to the Eldership. Accordingly the deed for the property purchased in Baltimore for a meeting-house was directed to be made to the Standing Committee, and their successors in office. The General Eldership plan for raising missionary money through societies in the churches was adopted. The Board of Missions reported $151.75 received, and $127 paid out.

A new rule was adopted, by which all ruling elders in attendance were "entitled to full membership; but hereafter none shall be so admitted except such as are regularly appointed to represent the several stations and circuits equal to the number of their teaching elders." Provision was also now made to pay the expenses of the Standing Committee. J. H. Bamberger's "legacy left to the Eldership" was being contested by the heirs, and the Eldership disapproved of taking advantage on the part of any of the heirs "of a mere defect and technicality in law, and thereby frustrate the expressed wishes of the testator." Preachers were required to report hereafter the number of preaching places on their charges, and give the reasons for dropping any points.

Six teaching elders and six ruling elders were elected as delegates to the General Eldership in 1848. Collections were ordered "on the several stations and circuits for the purpose of defraying the traveling expenses of the delegates to the General Eldership." A camp-meeting committee was appointed. In the report of the Stationing Committee the stations were reduced to seven, and the circuits, to nine, with a mission in Illinois, unsupplied, and one in Iowa, with E. Logue as missionary.

20th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—According to resolution, the twentieth East Pennsylvania Eldership met at Orrstown, Franklin county, November 1, 1848. E. H. Thomas preached the Opening Sermon on Wednesday morning. The enrollment showed a remarkable condition. There were seventeen active teaching elders present, and six ruling elders as delegates. Also nineteen "missionaries," or teaching elders without appointments, while twenty-two teaching elders were absent. The officers elected were: Speaker, A. Swartz; Clerk, J. C. Owens; Assistant Clerk, Wm. Mooney. A Stationing Committee was elected by ballot. E. West withdrew from the Eldership and the Church of God, and published his reasons in a pamphlet. A committee was appointed to "report on the same," but no subsequent mention is made of the case. Further dissensions and troubles are indicated by the withdrawal of several other ministers, and the expulsion of three or four. Otherwise the prospects were reported as "good all around." A project was started to procure and publish in a book "the biographical sketches of the first one hundred ministers of the Church of God in North America." "The tithe system, as adopted by the General Eldership, was discussed, and after some debate was indefinitely postponed." The delegates to the General Eldership which failed to attend its session were required "to give their reasons for non-attendance." The number of circuits was increased by division of a few of the largest. The Dauphin, Lebanon and Schuylkill circuit, with its twenty-five and thirty appointments, was divided into the Dauphin circuit and the Schuylkill circuit. Lancaster circuit was continued, with its fourteen appointments; Perry and Juniata, with its sixteen preaching places; while York circuit, with its thirteen appointments, was divided into Lower End and Upper End. Cumberland had twenty appointments.

Another colored minister, Henry Goings, was licensed. The licentiates were for the first time formally addressed by a minister appointed by the Eldership. Benjamin Howard, Free Baptist, of New York State, was an advisory member.

The Eldership arranged to "create a fund for the relief of poor, worn-out preachers, preachers' widows and orphans," "by each member paying one-half per cent. annually on his whole income." The churches were also advised "to establish a church fund on the same equitable, reasonable and Scriptural principles." The desirability of the Church having an institution of learning was strongly expressed by the Committee on Education, and it recommended "the appointment of a committee of five members of this Eldership to consider the expediency of establishing such an institution of learning." The committee appointed was Winebrenner, Harn, Flake, Swartz and Thomas. Uniformity in the observance of the ordinances was insisted upon.

21st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—When the twenty-first Eldership convened at Washington Borough, Lancaster county, October 31, 1849, D. Maxwell, who had been appointed "to deliver the opening discourse," was absent, and B. Howard, of the Church of God, or Free Baptist Church, New York State, was appointed in his place. In the afternoon when the Eldership was constituted there were seven stations and ten circuits, six of which were not represented. Twenty-nine ministers out of a total enrollment of forty-six were absent. A. D. Williams, Free Baptist, was present, as was also S. B. Howard, son of B. Howard, a Free Baptist. These brethren, as advisory members, "suggested the propriety of a correspondence between the General Conference of the Free-Will Baptists and this Eldership." The Eldership took favorable action, and appointed "John Winebrenner and G. U. Harn corresponding messengers to the next General Conference of that denomination."

A Rule was adopted, "that the ruling elders of the churches have an equal representation with the teaching elders, and the right to vote." The first movement looking toward the adoption of a Constitution since in 1831, when a brief draft of one was laid on the table, was made when a resolution was adopted "to appoint a committee to draft a Constitution for the government of this body." Winebrenner, W. Hinney and A. Swartz were appointed. The project of holding "a model camp-meeting" was endorsed, and a committee appointed to conduct it. Sunday-schools were strongly approved, as "an institution peculiarly blessed of God, and destined ultimately to become the chief nursery of youthful minds in religion and morality." On the matter of an institution of learning the committee only advised that "the subject be agitated by all the ministers, and kept before the mind of the public." A number of new preaching points were reported. The work was extended westward from Matamoras, Dauphin county, into Juniata county. A circuit was created in Lehigh and Berks counties. T. H. Deshieri was transferred to Ohio; M. F. Snavelly and L. Lininger, to Iowa. Several ministers were expelled, on account of "the low, declining state of religion." "Friday, the 21st day of December next, be recommended to the Church of God to be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer."

The Eldership resolved that "the ruling power of the Church is vested in the teaching and ruling elders thereof." A Committee on Boundaries having been created, it reduced the stations to five, and rearranged the circuits so as to make thirteen. To these fields twenty-one ministers were appointed. The Board of Missions reported its receipts as having been $183.28; expenditures, $141.50.

22nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—With the Eldership which convened at Churchtown, Cumberland county, Pa., October 16, 1850, it entered upon the third decade of its existence. Yet this was the twenty-second meeting, three sessions having been held the first year. It is a decade which chronicled some of the most vital events which had transpired in the whole cycle of years since 1830. When this Eldership was constituted it was found that there were five stations and twelve circuits. Twenty-seven teaching elders "were found to be in attendance." Wm. McFadden was chosen Speaker, and G. U. Harn and J. Halfeligh, Clerks. There being no Constitution, and also no permanent Rules of Order, ten Parliamentary Rules were adopted, under which the business was transacted. Harn submitted four resolutions which were referred to committees. One proposed a committee of twelve which was "to select a site and erect, rent or purchase a suitable building or buildings in which to commence an institution of learning." The committee reported through The Church Advocate a well-devised plan to secure "a literary institution." The second suggested "the propriety of appointing a World's Convention for the purpose of presenting a new and improved version of the whole Bible." The third declared that the time had "arrived for the churches of God to take some efficient measures to sustain a missionary or misisonaries in heathen lands." The fourth, requiring church members upon removal "into other neighborhoods to take letters of recommendation and present them to the churches where they locate." The latter was adopted, but the other two were buried in committees. The committee appointed in 1849 "to draft a Constitution for the government of this Eldership" was not prepared to report. It was continued, and was instructed to "report through The Advocate." The presence of S. B. Howard, of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and Amos Sutton, of "the General Baptist body in England," awakened a strong sentiment of friendship and closer fellowship, especially in foreign mission work. Harn dwelt on this point in his report of his visit to the General Conference of the Free-Will Baptist Church, suggesting "the strengthening of the bonds of Christian fellowship, with the ultimate object of Christian union between the Free-Will Baptists and the churches of God." The report of Harn as delegate to the Free-Will Baptist General Conference occasioned the sharpest and most protracted debate on the floor of the Eldership which had hitherto been witnessed. Winebrenner, Harn, Thomas and Swartz were the principal speakers. Before the Free-Will Baptist General Conference Harn had "read the resolutions of the General Eldership on the subject of slavery, giving also a short account of the practice and views of the churches in relation to that subject, and an expression of his own, that the bare relation of master and slave should not debar from Christian fellowship in all cases." It was on this point that the "lengthy debate" took place. Thomas moved the adoption of the report. Swartz offered an amendment, declaring that the Eldership "holds the sentiment that the relation between master and slave, as it exists in this country, is sinful and subversive of Christian equality, and at war with republican liberty;" and further, "disclaiming Bro. Harn's views on slavery as expressed before said Conference." Winebrenner moved "to strike out the preamble and second resolution," leaving the first resolution as here quoted stand. Swartz then withdrew the second resolution, and so a ye and nay vote was taken on the motion of Thomas, "that his report be adopted." There were seventeen yeas and nineteen nays. Harn then "moved that this action be stricken from the Journal," but this was "not agreed to." Later Price "moved a reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of Bro. Harn's report." Winebrenner "moved that the call for the reconsideration of Bro. Harn's report be indefinitely postponed," which "carried." This disposed of the whole subject. The matter, however, was revived through The Church Advocate. Harn was dissatisfied, and claiming that "the hasty action of the late Eldership on the slavery question places me before the world and the churches of God, and especially the Free-Will Baptist denomination, in an unenviable predicament." He defended his course and position in a clear and cogent article published in The Advocate. A. D. Williams, Free-Will Baptist, took up the matter, and demanded a statement from Winebrenner as to "your own views upon the subject of slavery, and also with what you regard the true position of the Eldership in relation to it." This he did at some length, assuring Williams that, "we are happy to say that this difference of opinion has not led to strifes and divisions among ourselves, as unfortunately it has done in other bodies." Missionary interests received much attention at this Eldership, and an evening session was held to discuss mission enterprises. Two missionary agents were "appointed to canvass the entire bounds of the Eldership; present the claims of missions to the churches, and take up pledges, donations and collections in aid of the missionary cause." This was in view of securing the needed funds "to employ and send out three missionaries to Illinois and two to Iowa next Spring." The Eldership for the first time received a formal communication from sisters of the churches, in the form of a memorial, praying "your body to give public expression upon the subject of the use of tobacco as a luxury." A resolution was immediately adopted, "recommending to each member of this body, and all the members of the churches generally, to abstain from so filthy a practice." But there was opposition to the resolution, one minister offering a motion "that the whole matter be laid on the table." The territory of the Eldership was divided into six stations and fourteen circuits, with twenty-four pastors. The Standing Committee was made the Camp-meeting Committee, to arrange for the camp-meetings to be held in 1851.

23rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Prior to the meeting of the Eldership at Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa., November 5, 1851, the Committee to draft a Constitution, consisting of Winebrenner, Mooney and Swartz, reported through The Church Advocate. This long delay to adopt a Constitution resulted from opposition to such an instrument on the ground that it partook of the nature of legislation and creed-subscription, as found in other religious bodies. The Eldership after organizing by electing E. H. Thomas, Speaker; S. Crawford, First Clerk, and A. Swartz, Second Clerk, took up the draft of the Constitution, and considered it item by item. But without making any progress, the consideration was postponed until the session of Monday morning. It was then again postponed until Thursday afternoon, when it was resolved "that the further consideration of the Constitution be laid over for one year." Joseph Ross, one of the original members of the church at Middletown, was chosen Treasurer of the Eldership. A committee which had been appointed the previous year on Systematic Benevolence made its report, and it was made a special order for the evening session of Monday, when a number of addresses were made by prominent ministers, and "an opportunity was given to the congregation to aid in the missionary enterprise, and they contributed $151.60." The Committee on Education was continued, and the securing of an institution of learning strongly urged. Special efforts had also been made by D. A. L. Laverty and S. Knisley to establish an Academy at Shippensburg. This school was "recommended for patronage to the members of the Eldership." The ten-cent tax per capita of the members of all the churches was established to raise funds for superannuated ministers and widows of deceased ministers. A new committee was "appointed to make an effort to secure a place and use their influence to raise a General Camp-meeting during the coming camp season." The peculiar position in which the Eldership was placed by its action on the slavery question, and on Harn's report in 1850, led to the adoption without debate of a resolution declaring it to be "the opinion of this Eldership, that the relation of master and slave, as authorized by the laws that make and sustain American slavery, is a sufficient bar to membership in this body, and ought to be a bar to membership in all the churches where this institution exists."

24th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The twenty-fourth East Pennsylvania Eldership, held at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, October 23, 1852, listened to the Opening Sermon on Saturday morning, and convened for business in the afternoon. J. Keller was elected Speaker; J. F. Weishampel, First Clerk, and J. Halfleigh and S. Crawford, Second Clerks. A. D. Williams, Free-Will Baptist, was in attendance as "Corresponding Messenger from the Rhode Island and Massachusetts Yearly Meeting." The consideration of the Constitution came up through the Report of the Committee on Journals on Monday morning, and it was postponed, with the amendments offered in 1851, until Wednesday morning, when it was taken up and held first place in the order of business until near the close of the session on Friday. A number of amendments were adopted. In publishing this document Winebrenner defined "Constitution" to mean "a code of fixed laws defining equal rights and privileges, and showing what each one should do, and should not do." Omitting the "Preamble" and the purely Parliamentary Rules, the following are the most important provisions of the Constitution, viz.:

I. The name shall be "The East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God." Harn was in favor of the plural, "churches of God."

II. Provided for annual meetings, with provision for extraordinary sessions, and defining the purpose to be "for the transaction of such business as properly pertains to ecclesiastical bodies."

III. Regularly licensed ministers of the Eldership, with an equal number of ruling elders regularly appointed as delegates to represent the several stations and circuits, shall be entitled to membership, and equal rights.

IV. The officers shall be Speaker, Treasurer and two Clerks.

V. to X. relate to the duties of the officers, the tenth authorizing the Speaker to "appoint all the committees required by the Rules of Order."

XI. Provides for the election by ballot of a Board of Missions, a Standing and a Stationing Committee.

Articles XII., XIII., and XIV. fix the number of the Board of Missions, the Standing and the Stationing Committees, and prescribe their duties. The Board of Missions is to consist of "not less than three, nor more than seven persons." The Standing Committee is to be composed of three persons, and it "shall have all the right and authority of the Eldership, except to expel, or change preachers without cause." The Stationing Committee is to "consist of five persons, and their report shall always be final, except it be rejected by a vote of a majority."

XV. "All persons putting in for an appointment shall stand pledged to take and fill whatever appointment may be allotted them, and whoever shall fail to do so, without sufficient excuse, shall forfeit his right to any and all appointments for one year."

Article XVI. requires preachers "to use prudence and economy in their mode of living; to keep up in all cases the regular appointments on their fields; to open up new appointments wherever it is suitable and convenient, and in no case to drop old or new appointments without mutual consent and the approval of the Standing Committee.

XVII. This Article requires the churches "to give their ministers a competent support; to pay the same quarterly, and to make such timely provisions for them that they shall not suffer for the necessities of life, nor be obliged to leave them embarrassed with debt."

Article XVIII. provides for the two-fold membership and two-fold responsibility of all the ministers. For their moral conduct they are amenable to the church where they reside, and for their moral and official conduct they are all without exception amenable to the Eldership.

Under Article XIX. "ministers and churches who fail to comply with these rules of order and co-operation shall be liable to rebuke, suspension or expulsion."

The last Article (XX.) provides for amendments to the Constitution "when two-thirds of the enrolled members for that Eldership are present, and two-thirds thereof shall vote in favor."

Opposition to the Constitution continued for some time, as it was still regarded by some of the minority as differing in no essentials from "the fixed laws or Discipline of some of the sectarian Churches, or Conferences." Winebrenner defended it in answer to questions, declaring that "between the two there is a wide and vast difference." At this Eldership, and before the Constitution was adopted, under a special resolution, a Stationing Committee was elected, consisting of nine members, five teaching and four ruling elders. Much interest was manifested in Bible Revision, and a committee on the subject was authorized to report through The Advocate. This it did, strongly approving the "General Rules for the direction of translators and revisers employed by the American Bible Union. Winebrenner and Harn were specially interested in this work, the latter publishing a number of communications on the subject.

The territory this year was divided into eight stations, two of which were in Lancaster City, and twelve circuits. Winebrenner was appointed "agent to sell scholarships for Bethel College."

25th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The only Eldership of which Winebrenner was a member that he did not attend from 1830 to 1860, Annual or General, was the one which convened at Newburg, Cumberland county, Pa., October 26, 1853. He sent a letter, stating that he could not be present because he "had been sorely afflicted, but was convalescent, and able to sit up again, and to write, feebly, with my own hand." He suggested four things to "the attention and serious consideration at the present session of the Eldership." These were "the establishment of the Texas Mission;" "the purchase of a printing establishment;" "the material aid system," and "Advocate dues, which are growing larger from year to year." The first item the Eldership approved, and recommended to the Board of Missions the propriety of sending one or more missionaries to the State of Texas, and then referred it to the Stationing Committee. But said Committee made no appointment, and did not mention the Texas Mission. The second item was referred to the General Eldership. On the third item a resolution was adopted, directing "all the members of this body to urge on the churches the importance and necessity of all the members of the churches to pay twenty-five cents to liquidate the debt due Bro. Winebrenner." As to Advocate dues, the ministers were instructed "to make special efforts to have the dues collected." Twenty-two other ministers were absent. James Mackey was elected Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; Jesse Haffleigh, First Clerk, and Samuel Crawford, Second Clerk. A new Rule was adopted, depriving a minister of his license who failed to report for two consecutive years. The strong prejudice against the colored people manifested itself in the adoption of a resolution appointing "a committee to confer with Bro. Stanton [a colored preacher of the Eldership] respecting the propriety of organizing an Eldership of colored people, to be under the supervision of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." The aggregate number of conversions during the year, so far as reported, was 387. Harn, who for several years past had been discussing the use of the plural form of the word "church" in Eldership titles, offered a resolution, changing the title of the Eldership in the first Article of the Constitution "so as to read 'The East Pennsylvania Eldership of the churches of God.'" The resolution prevailed. Delegates to the General Eldership were elected, and were by resolution "instructed not to involve this Eldership in debt by the establishing of a Printing Establishment."

The early struggles for Prohibition cover the present decade, and it was generally agreed that the policy should stand or fall in accordance with the spontaneously expressed will of the people. And as there were avowed prohibitionists in the Eldership, on motion, "a special Committee was appointed to draw up resolutions on the subject of Prohibition." This committee reported resolutions stating that the Eldership "is decidedly favorable to the principle of Prohibition that seeks the abrogation of the sale and use of intoxicating liquors as a common drink;" "that it is the duty of all men, and particularly Christian men, to seek the passage of such a law"; and "respectfully petitioning Congress to pass a law prohibiting the importation of intoxicating drinks into this country for beverage purposes." The starting of a mission in Reading, Berks county, was approved. I. E. Boyer was "licensed as a missionary to Illinois." For the Eldership session of 1854 the Eldership provided that Winebrenner preach the opening sermon; E. H. Thomas, a sermon on Missions; G. U. Harn, on the claims of the Bible Union, or the revision and translation of the Scriptures; Wm. Mooney, on Education, and A. Swartz, on Systematic Benevolence. More general interest in camp-meetings was strongly urged, and churches were requested to send to the Camp-meeting Committee in good time their wishes respecting such meetings the coming season.

26th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Winebrenner, according to appointment the previous year, was to preach the opening sermon of the Eldership which convened at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, October 26, 1854; but "being unwell, Bro. Swartz officiated in his place." He was, however, in attendance during the session. There were ten stations, twelve circuits and three missions. Wm. Mooney was elected Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. F. Weishampel, First Clerk, and A. H. Long, Second Clerk. No permanent Rules of Order had as yet been adopted; hence, a committee was "appointed to report Rules of Order for the regulation of the session of this body." The inviolability of Eldership territory was embodied in a resolution of censure on Felix Hartman for "entering upon the West Pennsylvania Eldership's grounds without an understanding to that effect with that Eldership." The Eldership adopted blank forms for statistical reports, which the pastors were required to fill out each year for publication, and recommended similar forms to be used by all the Elderships. Provision was also made to keep the journals of the Eldership and all actions of the Standing Committee in permanent form. The Eldership, through its Committee on Temperance, again put itself clearly on record in favor of "a Prohibitory Liquor Law as a sure and safe remedy for this gigantic evil." At the missionary meeting held on Monday evening Winebrenner offered a resolution in favor of establishing a mission in Texas, accompanied with a pledge for its support. This was adopted, and $134.00 was pledged. Colder reported having received $578.16 from different churches which he had visited for the support and education of Ting-Ing-Kaw, a young Chinaman whom he had brought with him on his return as missionary to China. The Eldership recommended the churches "the continuation of their sympathy and assistance in carrying out the object contemplated in the education of the young Chinaman, Ting-Ing-Kaw." By the vote of the Eldership in adopting the Report on Slavery, the body "continued its voice of remonstrance and condemnation of this unmitigated evil;" recommended "the petitioning of Congress for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and the Nebraska Bill," and pronounced "the system of American slavery always unchristian, and under all circumstances iniquitous." Harn's resolution adopted in 1853, changing the word "church" to "churches" where it occurs in the Constitution of the Eldership, was rescinded, and the singular form again inserted "in the several Articles of the Constitution, thus making it uniform with the title of the General Eldership and all the other Elderships." Winebrenner, as delegate to the convention to organize a German Eldership, reported that "said Eldership had been organized, and wished to co-operate with this and all other Elderships, as directed by the General Eldership." He then offered a resolution, which was adopted, recommending to all the German brethren of the Eldership the propriety of patronizing and aiding in the circulation of "a German paper which said Eldership contemplates publishing." In making the appointments Lebanon and Schuylkill counties, and all the territory eastward, was left to the German Eldership to supply with preachers. But as the German Eldership had no boundaries, a mission was opened in Montgomery county, and A. H. Long was appointed as missionary. A. J. Fenton and Philip Shaw were appointed as missionaries to Iowa Mission.

27th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Under auspicious circumstances the twenty-seventh session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership was held in the fine new house of worship, Harrisburg, Pa., beginning November 3, 1855, with sixty-one ministers enrolled. But one had gone to Ohio and two to Iowa. The officers were A. Swartz, Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. Halfelgh and A. H. Long, Clerks. Permanent records of the doings of the Eldership, in the way of a "Protocol" for the Minutes of the Eldership, and Minute Books for the Standing Committee and Board of Missions were ordered. Upon motion by D. A. L. Lavery a committee was appointed "to prescribe a Course of English studies and Bible and Theological readings for all the young men who shall hereafter receive license." A three-year course was reported and adopted. J. H. Hurley seriously offered a resolution to create a committee "to prepare a liturgy for the use of the Church of God," but it was "not agreed to." But a "special day of prayer with each church for the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon the churches and for the promotion of spiritual religion among us" was at once adopted. Winebrenner's "Brief Scriptural View of the Church of God" was ordered republished, after it has been revised by him, and brethren were urged to "prepare small works on Baptism, Washing the Saints' Feet, the Lord's Supper, and other topics of general interest to the Church. This was for the purpose "of explaining ourselves to those around us," and so that "our peculiarities of faith and practice should be more generally and distinctly made known." The initial steps were taken to secure an Act of Incorporation from the Legislature of 1856. Additional preparation was made for systematic mission work, and Winebrenner was appointed General Missionary, to supervise collections over the whole Eldership. The Statistics of the Eldership, though not quite complete, showed baptisms, 174; fellowshipped, 256; number of members, 2,408; appointments, 125 on eight stations, 10 circuits and 6 missions; Widows' Fund, $113.82; Contingent Fund, $29.18; Missionary Fund, $52.14 (evidently not the total for the year); Sabbath-schools, 48; scholars, 2,603. The Clearfield Mission was established, and the Texas Mission enterprise was referred to the Board of Missions. The Eldership took strong action in favor of camp-meetings, and resolved to "appoint an efficient committee of five, whose duty it shall be to appoint the time and places of holding our camp-meetings the coming year." Winebrenner, Thomas, Swartz, Colder and A. Snyder were made the committee. Winebrenner preached the opening sermon, and Colder was appointed by resolution to preach the opening sermon in 1856. Winebrenner's sermon was published in a pamphlet, which he desired his "friends to help to circulate far and wide among the people." He reported the Eldership as having done its work "with great harmony and satisfaction," and that "the whole session was an unusually pleasant and interesting one." Important action was taken with reference to education. The Shippensburg Institute was endorsed, and a committee was selected "with power to draw up a plan for the effectual establishment of a Seminary or High School" for the Church.

26th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The church at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, entertained the Eldership which convened October 22, 1856. It was "not as full as was expected," as there were twenty-one pastors present, and fourteen "missionaries," while twenty-two "missionaries" were absent. The "missionaries" were local preachers, except Winebrenner, who was appointed General Missionary, with specific work to do. He calls the other "missionaries" "local preachers." A. Swartz was elected Speaker; James Colder, First Clerk, and A. H. Long, Second Clerk. As the committee to secure an Act of Incorporation failed to discharge that duty, it was continued, with instructions. The effort to have each church represented by a ruling elder was strongly opposed and "unanimously negatived." But resolutions to urge churches to build or buy parsonages; install "the heavy articles of furniture," and "to pay actual expenses of preachers in case of removal," were "unanimously adopted." The Committee on Slavery reported a strong resolution, adopted without debate, which denounced this system of monstrous cruelty and oppression as "destructive to our civil, social, moral, political and religious affinities as children of one common Parent." The effort to extend this system of "human bondage over free territories, and especially forever blast the virgin soil of Kansas by this heinous sin," was to be resisted by every "lawful, religious and constitutional means," to which the Eldership "solemnly pledges itself as a body, and individually." Schools to "teach the science of sacred music" were recommended to the churches. The Board of Missions received during the year $781.87. The lukewarmness evident in the temperance cause was deplored, and ministers were admonished "to stir up the minds of the people on a subject of so great importance to our social, political and religious institutions." Winebrenner was always heartily in favor of co-operation on the part of ministers, laymen and churches, and in strong terms disapproved any tendency toward the non-observance of established Rules, or the instructions of the Eldership. Near the close of the session he submitted two resolutions bearing on this matter, after declaring in the preamble that "some of the preachers and churches have heretofore repeatedly failed to carry out the recommendations, plans and resolutions of this body." In the resolutions all the churches were "earnestly requested to carry out truly and faithfully our whole plan of co-operation." But a penalty was necessary to give force to this request, and so in the second resolution it was declared, "that all delinquents in future, in this matter, shall subject themselves to the censure of this Eldership, unless a good reason for such neglect can be given." The Eldership agreed with its leader. Tracts were requested to be written for the Committee on Publication by Swartz, on Systematic Beneficence; Thomas, The Ordinance of Feet-washing; Colder, Missions; Flake, Sabbath-Schools; Winebrenner, the Lord's Supper; Laverty, Education; Mackey, Importance of External Religion; Crawford, Internal Religion; Mooney, Guide to Baptism for Converts, and Hurley, Use and Abuse of Tobacco.

readily be discerned in the proceedings of the East Pennsylvania Eldership which convened at Middletown, Dauphin county, November 4, 1857. The Eldership was, by resolution, to "be constituted according to the facts as they now exist." In 1856 J. Colder was appointed to Harrisburg, and W. Mooney, to Shippensburg. Neither was at his appointment when the Eldership convened, and so the two stations as put on the Roll are: "Harrisburg:—William Mooney. Shippensburg:—James Colder (by the election of the church)." The exchange had been made by the two ministers and the churches, but was "ratified" by the Standing Committee on September 23rd. The organization was effected by the election of G. U. Harn, Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; James Colder, First Clerk, and J. F. Weishampel, Second Clerk. A collection of all the Journals of the Eldership was ordered. The Act of the Legislature, incorporating the Eldership, was presented by the Committee, and was adopted. As Winebrenner had disposed of his interest in The Advocate to Colder, the latter was now in the editorial chair, which placed Winebrenner and the Church as he represented it at a disadvantage. The missionaries to Texas had been appointed and sent out by the Board of Missions between the two sessions of the Eldership in 1855 and 1856, and their action reported and adopted in 1856. It was but a short time after their arrival in Texas that it became conclusively evident to them, that to attempt to do work for the Church of God among slave-holding people meant a change of teaching and practice on the subject of slavery from that which characterized the Church in the North. The alternative to this course was to leave on the next boat. And so either from conviction, or the compulsion of their environment, or both, the missionaries in theory and practice made what was considered a radical departure from the views which prevailed in the Board of Missions and the Church generally. When this fact became known it produced a storm of opposition in the churches throughout the North. The friction created is mildly characterized in the preamble to Keller's resolution as "some difficulties with our missionaries in Texas." The resolution reveals more: "That we instruct our Board of Missions to appropriate no more missionary money in that direction." The Board had already held back money due them. The variance and division in the camp in East Pennsylvania Eldership are indicated by a preamble and resolutions intended as a substitute for Keller's, which "Weishampel offered in behalf of Winebrenner" on Wednesday morning. The preamble represents the missionaries in Texas as having been "brought into great trouble and embarrassment by the publication of certain unnecessary and harsh sentiments and strictures in The Church Advocate." Then the first resolution follows: "We highly disapprove of the Editor's course...and advise him to be more careful and prudent in future." The second resolution instructed "the Board of Missions to send our missionaries in Texas $200." The Eldership took time to deliberate, to think; but did not engage in a long discussion. Keller's resolution was offered on Tuesday evening, and, after a brief discussion, was "deferred until to-morrow afternoon." Weishampel's was "deferred for the present" without discussion. On taking the vote Wednesday afternoon, the motion "to strike out Brother Keller's resolution, and insert Brother Winebrenner's, was lost." On a yea and nay vote, Keller's resolution prevailed, fifteen voting for it and ten against it. The Board of Missions was then directed to "confine their labors within the bounds of this Eldership the present year." Mooney was reappointed to Harrisburg, and Colder to Shippensburg. Harn's resolution to change the Eldership title to "Eldership of churches of God" was "passed over, and will be discussed through the columns of The Advocate."

Extra Session East Pennsylvania Eldership.—While the relations between Winebrenner and Colder were becoming daily more relaxed, and conditions portentous of a crisis were fast taking shape, the first open conflict was doubtless precipitated by the sudden and unexpected death of Ellen Cordelia Colder, daughter of Winebrenner and wife of Colder, "one of the excellent of the earth," and the widely-lamented death of William Mooney, pastor of the Fourth Street church, Harrisburg. The former event made it advisable for Colder to remove from Shippensburg to Harrisburg; the latter opened Fourth Street pulpit to him. Without any published notice in The Advocate, suddenly and within two weeks of the date of the "call," the East Pennsylvania Eldership was summoned by the Speaker, G. U. Harn, to meet at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, Pa., "to hold a special or extra session, commencing on Tuesday, the 6th of July next, at 10 o'clock a. m." The call for this extra session is dated June 24th, at Wooster, Ohio. The "Petition" gives no reason why an extra session was asked. It is signed by twelve ministers and four delegates, and requests the call to be issued "immediately, and addressed to Elder J. Winebrenner," one of the signers. The Eldership met as per call, with twenty-five ministers and eight delegates present. Colder is enrolled as pastor of the church at Shippensburg; but, "J. C. does not claim to be pastor of the Shippensburg church, nor to represent it in the Eldership." The first and main business, being "Certain Charges against Colder, Winebrenner and McFadden, and against three ruling elders of the church at Harrisburg," these were at once "preferred and read." But there is no record of any but the first Charge, with three Specifications, against Colder, and that without the name of the accuser or accusers. The Charge is "Insubordination and violation of the Rules of the Eldership." The first Specification is that of "refusing to act with the Board of Corporation on the ground that he was no member of the Eldership, not having lifted his license; and then again consenting to act at the second meeting as a layman, or private member." The second, that he "attempted to introduce foreign Hymn-Books into the churches, for general congregational use, without authority from the General Eldership." The third, "Resigning his appointment at Shippensburg, and taking charge of the church at Harrisburg, without the approbation of the Standing Committee, and in direct violation of the Constitution, or Rules of Order, adopted for the government of the Eldership." Without any record of evidence or arguments, and after adopting, and then rejecting, a substitute for the first Specification, and considering the third, and then the second, Specification, A. Swartz presented a preamble, with three resolutions, which were adopted. The preamble recites that "the Eldership have learned the painful fact that a serious personal misapprehension is found to exist between Brothers Colder and Winebrenner, which has led to the preferring of a number of Charges against each of them, involving their moral character; but believing from their well known personal Christian character that these personal Charges are founded in a mistaken view of each other's conduct; therefore, we earnestly recommend to them as Christian ministers, the duty of burying forever these personal difficulties, and that they hereafter unite in our common work." The first resolution declares that "the church at Harrisburg erred in their late action in electing Colder, and he in his acceptance of their call as pastor without their referring it to the action of the Standing Committee." This affirms the third Specification, and the church is advised "to refer their action to the Standing Committee" and abide by the disposition it may make of it. The second Specification is also affirmed, and Colder's action is declared to have been "unconstitutional and in violation of the action of the General Eldership." It is then resolved that "if the above parties fail to meet the above recommendations, then the Standing Committee is authorized to proceed and deal with the parties according to our Constitution." All were then granted "liberty to withdraw their Charges." As much ill-feeling had grown out of the rejection by Colder of articles furnished for publication by Winebrenner and others, a resolution was adopted directing that such articles be referred to the Board of Publication, whose decision should be final. This trial led to the adoption of the Rule, that Charges and Specifications, with the names of at least two accusers, must be presented to the accused at least five days before the meeting of the Eldership. The Eldership was in session Tuesday forenoon, afternoon and evening, and Wednesday forenoon.

80th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Although but four months intervened between the adjournment of the extra session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in July, and the regular session, which met at Shiremanstown, Cumberland county, Pa., November 3, 1858, it at once became evident that not only was nothing settled at the extra session, but that conditions had become much more serious. The Eldership convened on Thursday morning. C. Price was elected Speaker; J. Haisfeigh, First Clerk; J. F. Weishampel, Second Clerk, and J. Ross, Treasurer. The business was taken up and disposed of with unusual deliberation, as if the body were recoiling from a distasteful task. All day Thursday, and Friday forenoon, were taken up with practically routine business; such as constituting the Eldership, adoption of Rules, election of Board of Missions, Stationing and Standing Committees, and action on the Report of the Committee on Journals. This Report laid before the Eldership "a document from a part of the church at Harrisburg, who claim to be the Eldership party, setting forth the unhappy and deplorable state of things in the church brought about through the influence and intrusion of Elder J. Colder...and preferring Charges against Elder Colder and that part of the church they believe he has misled." This document was made the first order for Friday afternoon. The Charges were prepared "at a meeting of a number of the members of the church of God at Harrisburg, held on the 26th of October, to deliberate on our unhappy church matters and consult each other as to what course to pursue." Isaac Stees was made Chairman of the meeting, and Henry P. Rodearmel, Secretary. The deliberations resulted in the framing of Charges against James Colder, and "against certain officers of the church at Harrisburg." These are all presented over the signatures of the officers of the meeting, no other names appearing as accusers. There are three Charges against Colder:

I. "Insubordination and factious conduct." Under this Charge are six specifications, viz.: 1. Refusing to submit his case to the disposition of the Standing Committee. 2. Refusing to abide by the decision of the Standing Committee. 3. Refusing to pay over Hymn-Book money in his hands to the Treasurer. 4. Getting up a meeting, August 16th, and declaring himself the legal pastor of the church before the proceedings of the Standing Committee were read. 5. Refusing to publish the Speaker's call for an extra session of the Eldership. 6. Getting up an illegal proceeding against Brother Isaac Stees, one of the elders of the church, and having him suspended.

II. Colloging with Elder George Sigler in an unlawful detention of a certain letter and package.

III. Falsely accusing and misrepresenting Elders John Winebrenner and William McFadden before the late extra session of the Eldership, and on other occasions. Colder, joined by two other ministers and an elder and delegate of Fourth Street church, offered a "Protest against the reception, consideration and publication of the document" containing the charges; but the Eldership refused to "agree to the Protest." The Eldership then proceeded with the trial, Winebrenner acting as attorney for the prosecution, and Colder conducting his own defense. When both sides "rested" and the case was submitted upon the evidence adduced, the verdict was as follows: Under Charge I. the first Specification was "sustained" by a vote of 32 to 5; the second by a vote of 25 to 9; the third by a vote of 23 to 15; the fourth Specification was divided, the first item being sustained by a vote of 20 to 9, and the second, 17 to 5; the fifth Specification was lost by a vote of 13 to 15. The second Charge was lost, the vote against it being unanimous. The third Charge was sustained by a vote of 13 to 9. The first Charge was then sustained by a vote of 28 to 8. There, so far as official action is concerned, the trial ended. No censure, no penalty was imposed. It is stated that "by mutual consent Brothers Colder and Winebrenner were authorized to submit their personal difficulties for adjustment, as soon as practicable, to the Standing Committee." "Colder reported. His report was accepted and license renewed." "Winebrenner reported. His report was accepted and license renewed." Was it "the truce of God?" Winebrenner was generous, sometimes to a fault; he however was also possessed of that staunch and invincible manhood which in the face of what he conceived to be wrong made him inexorable. A scene at the trial revealed these traits. His address in summing up was a masterpiece of affecting, convincing, incisive reasoning. As he reached its culmination, Colder, under the charm of his impassioned eloquence, arose, walked toward Winebrenner and reached out the hand of reconciliation and fellowship. "No!" slowly said Winebrenner, withholding his hand; "the time is not yet for the hand of reconciliation!" But when the court had rendered its decision, he would not ask for punishment, and he was ready for peace and amicable relations. Colder was not removed from Harrisburg, but for the year beginning April, 1851, he was appointed to Camp Hill. He announced editorially that he is "willing to acquiesce in the decision of the Eldership in the difficult and unpleasant task it had to perform."

The "Charges against certain officers in the church at Harrisburg" were, in substance, as follows:

I. Greatly misrepresenting Winebrenner and McFadden in a published letter.

II. Assailing and slandering Winebrenner in said letter.

III. Conspiring with Colder to break down the Rules of co-operation of the Eldership.

While testimony was submitted by plaintiffs and defendants, no vote on either Charge is recorded.

The Board of Missions was "instructed to settle with the missionaries in Texas." P. D. Collins, known as the Indian Preacher, a native of Virginia, and minister in the Methodist Protestant Church, received license at this Eldership. He became "one of the most successful as well as faithful ministers." He was later transferred to the Illinois Eldership, but returned to Pennsylvania. When the Maryland and Virginia Eldership was organized he became a member. He died at Warfieldsburg, Md., May 13, 1875. The Eldership closed hopefully.

81st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—It was not in the fruition of the hopes which had been cherished at adjournment in 1858 that the Eldership convened at Goldsboro, York county, Pa., November 2, 1859. The gravity of the situation had increased after the close of the session of 1858. The "personal difficulties" which the Standing Committee was expected to adjust, continued, and became more insuperable. Colder, with a majority of the church at Fourth Street, resisted the authority of the Eldership, declared themselves independent, and refused to accept the services, as supplies of the pulpit, of Flake and Winebrenner, and the regular appointee of the Eldership from April 1, 1859, A. X. Shoemaker. Charges were preferred against Colder by Isaac Stees and Henry Clay, and he was notified to appear before the Standing Committee on January 18, 1859, and answer to the same. This he "neglected to do." Hence, at said meeting the Committee "suspended him from the functions of the Christian ministry in the Church of God, until such time as he retraces his steps, and submits to the proper authorities of the Church." On a motion to adopt this Report, the vote was 36 yeas, and 1 nay. Following this vote, a resolution of expulsion was offered, declaring, that "James Colder be, and he is hereby, expelled from this Eldership," etc. On the adoption of this resolution the yeas were 42; nays, 0. Ministers of the Eldership who "continued to fellowship James Colder after they knew that he was suspended" were warned not to continue such acts of fellowship. The course of the Committee in instituting "a suit in equity against the seceding party in the church at Harrisburg," to recover possession of the church building and other property, was approved, and the Eldership agreed "to assist and sustain them in defraying the expenses of the prosecution."

The Roll of the Eldership as constituted showed a membership of sixty-six ministers, of whom thirty-one were absent, and twenty delegates. An organization was effected by the choice of A. Swartz, Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. Halfeligh, First Clerk, and J. F. Weishampel, Second Clerk. In addition to the Report of the Standing Committee in the Colder case, it also reported charges against three of the elders of the church at Harrisburg, and had notified them "to appear before the Eldership at Goldsboro and answer" to the same. This they failed to do. And the Eldership believing "from the testimony before it" that "the charges are fully sustained," "declared the said elders excommunicated from the ecclesiastical body associated together by the name, style and title of the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God in North America." The Standing Committee was "authorized and instructed to cite the deacons and members of said church who have aided, abetted and adhered to the factious and disorderly proceedings of said elders to trial for their conduct, and, if they cannot be reclaimed, to deal with them according to the Constitution." Shoemaker, the pastor since April, 1859, and who was reappointed, was instructed "to reorganize the church under the provisions of their charter." The Eldership adopted a resolution "disapproving of preachers forming the habit of reading their sermons." Also against preachers "complaining in the pulpit of their support," and "advising churches to pay their preachers quarterly." The importance of "pastoral visitation" was emphasized. The proposition to "open a new mission in parts of Schuylkill, Carbon and Luzerne counties," was referred to the Stationing Committee, but it made no appointment. Winebrenner was made General Missionary by action of the Eldership, and was also, by resolution, appointed to preach the opening sermon in 1860. An action on church polity was taken, giving it as "the opinion of this body, that the preachers in charge and the ruling elders in the churches do constitute the scriptural authority before which disorderly members should be tried."

ner was called. He had been "transferred" to "the general assembly and church of the first born, which are enrolled in heaven." McFadden was substituted in Winebrenner's place to preach the opening sermon. Mackey was appointed "to write out and prepare for publication a sermon on the life and death of our late and lamented Father Winebrenner," which he had preached before the Eldership. The Committee on Obituaries also reported resolutions, speaking of "the sterling character and success of his ministry, associating his name with the most noted and acknowledged reformers of modern times." It also included in its Report the name of William Clay, who was licensed in 1849, "a young man of genius, talents and usefulness," and an active, successful minister during his brief period of service. Also Christian T. Forney, "a lay preacher of extraordinary talents and gifts for usefulness in the church and in the world;" a delegate from the Dauphin circuit for a number of years, and several times a delegate to the General Eldership, and a close personal friend and admirer of Winebrenner. As these older workers came down from the walls of Zion, younger men stepped forward to take their places. C. H. Forney had been licensed on September 25, 1860, by the Standing Committee, on their own initiative, and for the first time took his seat in the Eldership at this session. W. L. Jones and H. E. Reeve were licensed at this Eldership and added to the active working force in the field. The Eldership organized by electing J. C. Owens, Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. Haisfeigh, First Clerk, and C. H. Forney, Second Clerk. There were present thirty-five ministers and twenty-three delegates, while thirty-two teaching elders were absent. There was a fair number of judicial cases before the Eldership; but they were settled without extreme measures being necessary, except in one case, in which the Special Committee concluded "that under existing circumstances we as a body can use the accused no more as a minister among us." Immediate action was taken "to publish a Life of Elder Winebrenner," authorizing the "Publishing Committee to employ an Agent to collect funds for that purpose." As the revision of the Constitution was in the hands of a Committee, Harn, in a letter addressed to the Eldership containing his Report, offered a resolution "to alter and amend the title of the Eldership so as to read, The East Pennsylvania Eldership of Churches of God, and that we recommend conformity to this style by all other Elderships, Synods, Conferences, or ecclesiastical conventions of like nature." The Eldership was in no mood to entertain such a resolution by the newly made grave of Winebrenner, champion of the negative of this proposition, and so without debate it "laid the preamble and resolution on the table." The appointments made this year were fifteen stations, twelve circuits and three missions. Altoona was added to the list, and was made a mission station, with S. S. Richmond, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, as pastor.

38rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1861 was the first one to sit after the opening of the War of the Rebellion, and there were several painful reminders of this fact. From some of the homes in Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Pa., where the session was held, sons, or fathers, or husbands had gone to the army, and as well from all the other churches represented in the Eldership. The session began with the Opening Sermon by A. Swartz, on Wednesday evening, October 30th. There were present forty-three ministers and twenty-six delegates, twenty-seven ministers were absent. Forty-two ministers were classed as "Local Preachers." The officers chosen were E. H. Thomas, Speaker; Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. Haisfeigh, First Clerk, and C. H. Forney, Second Clerk. The Eldership was so well pleased with the Opening Sermon that it ordered it printed in pamphlet form. Certain articles of the Constitution were amended, one of which increased the Stationing Committee from five to seven members. Among the difficulties brought before the Eldership were charges against the officers of the church at Mt. Joy by the pastor, whose services had been rejected; and charges against one of the ministers "for preaching in the Fourth Street Bethel, Harrisburg, Pa., for a party who are in open rebellion against the Eldership, and especially while the suit of equity was pending." The Committee on Slavery has given way to the "Committee on the State of the Country." The Report of this Committee declared "in unmistakable words our unwavering confidence in, and loyalty to, our Constitutional obligations;" tendered to "the Government our warmest sympathies and prayers for its final and triumphant success," and recognized the duty "always to remember in our private and public devotions the numerous brethren we have at present in the army." The Report was adopted, and later reconsidered, and again adopted, when on Roll Call twenty-eight votes were cast in favor of adoption, and none against. The project of purchasing the Mt. Joy Academy was brought before the Eldership, and Thomas, Swartz and Forney were appointed a committee to confer with Principal Moore. Forney and Moore were "granted cordial permission to go throughout the bounds of this body to obtain subscriptions of stock for the contemplated purchase of said Academy." Arrangements were made "to publish the Life of Elder John Winebrenner," and also to erect a monument over his grave. "The increase and prosperity of the last year," said the Committee on the State of Religion, "will not compare with some years of our past history;" yet nearly four hundred persons were received on profession of faith. The total number of members reported was 2,607. The two-year Rule being in force, Shoemaker's reappointment was "noticed as a specialty" on the Journal. A committee consisting of J. Keller and C. H. Forney, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and George M. Hepler, of the German Eldership, met a committee of the "Union Brethren" at Dr. George Ross's, Lebanon, Pa., January 1, 1862. Said Committee consisted of Elders Christian Sechrist, David Zimmerman and Henry Flowers. The object of the conference was to determine a basis of union between the two bodies represented. After carefully canvassing the material points of faith and polity of the two Churches, "it was agreed by the undersigned Committees, that since there is no material difference that could hinder a union from being beneficial to both Societies, from henceforth we mutually co-operate for the purpose of consummating a more perfect union at our next annual Eldership." This received the signatures of all the members of the Conference. The Eldership by resolution expressed its judgment, that "it is inexpedient for any member of any of the churches of God within the bounds of this Eldership to administer the rites of Christian baptism, the Lord's Supper and matrimony without a license from this body." A "Course of Studies for our young ministers" was prescribed, in which they were to be examined annually.

34th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—James Mackey delivered as an Opening Sermon to the Eldership, which convened at Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, Pa., October 29, 1862, a discourse of a political character, on the rights of, and duties of citizens to, the Government, based on Matt. xxii. 21. He was chosen Speaker, and Joseph Ross, Treasurer; J. Haifleigh, First Clerk, and C. H. Forney, Second Clerk. Friday and Monday evenings were set apart for general discussion of subjects selected by a committee: Said Committee submitted three questions, viz.: 1. What measures, if any, can the ministers of this Eldership adopt to make their labors more efficient, both in extending the cause of God within our borders, and in giving more permanency and stability to the churches, and to counteract the terrible reaction that so frequently follows great revivals of religion?" 2. "Are we as an Eldership following the apostolic practice in setting apart men for the Christian ministry?" 3. "Do we as a Church generally follow the practice of the Apostolic Church in the order of administering the ordinances?" Twenty ministers participated in the discussions. Laverty, Swartz and Long were the Examining Committee, and they reported in favor of a three-year Course of Studies, naming the studies. Each minister was directed "to preach at least one sermon on the subject of Temperance during the coming year." Churches which had been supplied by the German Eldership were coming back to the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and were received, thus creating contention between the two Elderships. A committee was named "to confer with the German Eldership" on the matter. Upon the Report of the Committee on Conference with the "Union Brethren" being received, Forney, Keller and Petry were designated as a Committee "to visit the Union Brethren's Eldership." As these brethren were located principally in the south-eastern section of Lebanon and the adjoining north-eastern section of Lancaster counties, a mission was created, to be known as the Lancaster and Lebanon County Mission. The Report of J. Keller, C. H. Forney and J. S. Gable, as Committee on Slavery, was the occasion of an animated discussion. It was considered seriatim, one resolution amended and three "stricken out," but published. The three-year time limit was suspended in the case of the Fourth Street church, to permit the reappointment of Shoemaker. In all itinerant Churches in those early years the time-limit at first was practically, if not constitutionally, one or two years. Such a rule furnished a splendid opportunity for sifting out the useless, or changing the unfit, or most effectually utilizing the strong when the list of strong men was unavoidably limited. The Stationing Committee reported fourteen stations, fourteen circuits and six missions. All the ministers were taxed $1.00 a year for the Superannuated Fund. The total of $255.00 was paid to widows of deceased ministers. Into this Fund each minister was also required to pay $1.00 annually.

35th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The exhortation of Thomas published a week before the Eldership met, October 28, 1863, at Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa.: "Let all the churches be fully represented, and let all the ministers of the body, whether local, missionaries, or itinerants, attend," doubtless had its effect, for of the thirty-one "itinerants" only five were absent. Thomas preached the Opening Sermon. Shoemaker was elected Speaker; J. Rife, Treasurer, to succeed Joseph Ross, deceased; J. Haifleigh, First Clerk, and A. H. Long, Second Clerk. The committee on topics for discussion submitted three: The purpose of the apostolic practice of the imposition of hands; the relation of children of one or both believing parents to the church, and the progress of the Church, is it commensurate with our privileges and duty. When the first subject was under discussion "Elder Forney offered the following resolution: 'Resolved, That in future the licentiates be specially dedicated to God by prayer, when the Report of the Committee is received, on the floor of the Eldership, and addressed by the Speaker.'" An amendment was offered—"that they be set apart by the imposition of the hands of four elders"—and then the resolution and amendment were postponed to the first day of the session of 1864. In line with this action, it was agreed that in future an ordination sermon be preached before the Eldership on the last evening of the session, by a minister appointed the previous year. Laverty submitted strong resolutions on the observance of the Sabbath, which were adopted. C. H. Forney was appointed First Clerk, pro tem. "J. S. Stamm and others of our brethren in the ministry having been drafted into the military service of the United States," the Eldership earnestly recommended the churches "to aid them in the payment of the commutation." The Eldership resolved "to raise $1,500 the coming Eldership year for missionary purposes," on motion of Thomas, always the strong advocate of missions. At once $242.00 were subscribed. There were still churches without Sabbath-schools, and so the Eldership urged "the brethren throughout the bounds of the Eldership to organize Sabbath-schools in all the churches." Books for libraries the churches were advised to buy from the Baptist Publication Society. The attention of the churches was specially directed to the importance of reading the Bible in the families, the observance of the Lord's day, the weekly prayer-meeting and the "training of children in the teaching and practice of the Church, so that, as they grow up, they may follow in the same way." The Eldership was emphatic in its insistence on discipline, declaring that "it is an essential element to preserve order and to secure the dignity and perpetuity of the Church of God," and "that such discipline can only be secured by a strict adherence by all the members of this body, and the churches in connection therewith, to the disciplinary acts and decisions of the proper judicatories of the Church." Having at times "been under the painful necessity of expelling unworthy and disorderly members," which were received into other Churches, the Eldership "highly disapproves of the course of such denominations as pay no regard to the disciplinary decisions of other Christian bodies." As many readers of The Advocate were annoyed by the personalities and often bitter reflections on each other by writers in their discussions, Long submitted resolutions, which were adopted, advising writers "to refrain from public crimination and improper personalities," and requesting the Editor "to refuse publicity to any article that contains such obnoxious features." The pastors were "requested to appoint female collectors to wait upon the members of their respective churches to collect funds for missionary purposes." The Rule was adopted, "that the Speaker of the Eldership hereafter preach the Opening Sermon at the next meeting of the Eldership." By a rearrangement of fields of labor, they were reduced to fourteen stations, eleven circuits and four missions.

36th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Though Shoemaker was not appointed by the Eldership in 1863 to the Chicago Mission, he was enrolled in 1864, when on October 26th, the Eldership convened at Newburg, Cumberland county, Pa., as the appointee to the Chicago Mission. Holding his membership in this Eldership, he was entitled to preach the Opening Sermon; but it was preached by B. F. Beck. Theme:—"The Saints' Perseverance." D. A. L. Laverty was honored with the Speakership, and J. Rife was chosen Treasurer; J. Haifleigh, First Clerk, and C. H. Forney, Second Clerk. Among those ministers of other Elderships "received as full members of the Eldership during its present sessions" was Mrs. M. J.

Beecher, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, the first woman to preach before the East Pennsylvania Eldership. A minister of the "Christian Connection," John Hunter, was received and a license granted him. When the postponed resolutions on Ordination came up, they were discussed, and then "the subject was indefinitely postponed." The serious condition of the country was strongly set forth by the Committee on the State of the Country, Mackey, Thomas, Forney, and was at once adopted. Richmond, Beck and Sterner, Committee on Temperance, were unusually concise in their Report, but recommended at least two sermons to be preached by all the pastors. On Education, Forney, Stamm and Ross, Committee, a recommendation was submitted and adopted, inviting all the Elderships to co-operate with the East Pennsylvania Eldership in "the erection of a suitable college building, centrally located, easily accessible and in a healthy locality." Instead of $1,500 missionary money, the Board of Missions received only $679.31. The Eldership decided "to appoint a meeting to be held annually on Whitsuntide, to be known as the Pentecostal Meeting." By the adoption of a new Constitution, making Maryland a free State, the Eldership saw enlarged opportunities for mission work, and recommended to the Stationing Committee the opening of a mission there. Frederick County Mission was accordingly placed with the list of appointments, with S. Spurrier as missionary. Swartz's Ordination Sermon, by direction of the Eldership, was published in The Advocate. Thomas was chosen to preach the Ordination Sermon in 1865. Though the subject of Ordination had been "indefinitely postponed" on Friday morning, on Wednesday morning Owens offered a resolution granting to any licentiate who desired it hereafter the right "to have the hands of elders laid on him," and that such ceremony shall take place "at the time of the Pentecostal Convention." But the Eldership postponed it "until after the Ordination sermon at the next Eldership." On the "state of religious enjoyment and external manifestations, such as refreshings at meetings and reformations in the local churches," the Committee, Soule, Hunter and Weishampel, was "not prepared to speak flatteringly," "for there seems to be a lack at present," which, the Committee said, "is traceable to the present civil war, occasioned by this wicked rebellion in our land."

37th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—When the Eldership was in session in the Bethel of the Fourth Street church, Harrisburg, Pa., beginning October 25, 1865, Thomas' editorial appeared, in which he discussed the "Relation of the Churches to the Eldership." It seems that a number of "brethren regard the Elderships not only as separate and distinct bodies from the churches; but also as laboring for distinct, and even for antagonistic, interests and objects." The secret of this impression was the authority of the Eldership in the appointment of ministers, in which it was felt that the interests of the churches were subordinated to those of the ministers. The Opening Sermon was delivered by D. A. L. Lavery, on "The Christian Ministry." C. Price was chosen Speaker; J. Rife, Treasurer; J. Haidleigh, First Clerk, and C. H. Forney, Second Clerk. There were eleven stations, sixteen circuits and four missions, including Wooster station and Chicago Mission. An animated and lengthy discussion arose over the report of the Standing Committee, in which it developed that one station had refused the appointee of the Eldership, and had called another minister of the Eldership. By this act the Committee declared that "a severe blow has been struck at the honor and integrity, as well as the future peace and prosperity, of the churches, and one which we think now demands a thorough sifting . . . . and such reproof as will prove a salutary warning against such open contumacy and insubordination in the future." The report was adopted by a resolution declaring that the Eldership saw no way "of escape from our duty," but to adopt it, "seeing that the harmony and co-operation of the Church of God in its various locations might be preserved and peace and harmony prevail in the whole membership." The action met a crisis which required some years wholly to overcome. The Committee on the State of the Country presented an elaborate Report, "hailing with joyful gratitude the complete subjugation of the slaveholders' rebellion;" deploring the assassination of President Lincoln; gratefully remembering the soldiers and sailors and pledging needed aid to them, and "the orphan children of the gallant dead," and insisting that the lessons of the war regarding slavery taught us by providence be impressed on all, and ever held sacred. The Licensing Committee was empowered "to determine whether a licentiate shall be a member of classes for examination. The Board of Missions consisted of C. H. Forney, J. S. Stamm, E. H. Thomas, D. A. L. Lavery and J. Keller. The Standing Committee, E. H. Thomas, A. Swartz and J. C.

Owens. A Committee on Revision of the Rules was created, consisting of C. H. Forney, A. Swartz and W. O. Owen. After a missionary meeting on Monday evening, by resolution, the Eldership discussed "the vicarious sufferings and death of Christ, and the Second Advent." The Committee on Education recommended that "we proceed forthwith to make an effort to establish an institution of learning." The Eldership heartily endorsed and recommended the American Bible Union translation of the New Testament. When the Philadelphia Mission project was discussed, a resolution prevailed to raise $3,000 to purchase the house of worship on Diamond street. Forney, Swartz, Thomas and Lavery were appointed the Examining Committee. The time-limit was changed by a resolution submitted by Thomas, so that no preacher could remain longer than two years on one charge. The Rule was subject to change only by a two-thirds vote. This was the Methodist Rule at this time. Churches were strongly urged to build parsonages. Mackey was appointed to preach the ordination sermon in 1866. These sermons were a discussion of the affirmative and negative of the ordination question. Evils, or unwise plans, often change themselves. And so with the plan of building monuments to deceased ministers. After an experience of a number of years it was found advisable to drop the purpose entirely. The Eldership considered that the collections made personally by Shoemaker exonerated it from paying the $300.00 per annum to that mission. The Chicago Mission was omitted from the list of appointments.

38th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1866 expressed its appreciation of the presence of J. M. Domer and P. Loucks, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, by doing the unusual thing of receiving them "as full members of this body during its present session," and giving them places on two important committees. It met at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Wednesday evening, October 31, 1866, when C. Price preached the Opening Sermon from John i. 29. Theme—"The Atoning Lamb of God." The Committee on Rules of Order—Forney, Swartz and Owen—reported a complete body of Rules, which with few changes have been the permanent Rules of Order since. By resolution Thomas, Swartz and Forney were "appointed a committee to revise the Article published by Elder Winebrenner in the History of All Denominations for publication." This committee favored the publication of the Article verbatim as the production of Winebrenner, except the section treating of Polity and Statistics, which it suggested should be revised and enlarged. Also, that there should be added resolutions on the Bible cause, education, deeding of church property, book concern, slavery and temperance passed at the first General Eldership, together with the Constitutions of the East Pennsylvania and the General Elderships. Authority was given to sell the Diamond Street Mission property, Philadelphia, and buy or build a more suitable house of worship. On a ye and nay vote a resolution to restore the three-year rule was lost by a vote of 31 nays to 5 yeas. A resolution declaring that "the use of instrumental music in the public worship of God is scriptural and beneficial, and should be encouraged by the ministers of this body," was laid on the table, after some discussion. The "action of the various Orders of Temperance in endeavoring to banish the demon rum entirely from our country" was heartily endorsed. A comprehensive system of mission work was proposed, by recommending "that the Board of Missions of the General Eldership open correspondence with the Boards of Missions of the various Elderships, with the view of providing a large missionary fund for the purpose of sending missionaries into the States and Territories of the mountains and the Pacific to open new territory, purchase properties, erect houses of worship and extend the cause generally." Swartz, by request of the Eldership, delivered "an able and eloquent address on the life and labors of Elder G. U. Harn." The licensing of exhorters was provided for by authorizing the Committee on License to "recommend applicants either as exhorters or preachers." The action of the General Eldership with reference to Centralia College and a Central College was endorsed, and the brotherhood was urged to respond liberally when the College Agent calls upon them "for funds for educational purposes." The Standing Committee was made the Camp-meeting Committee. A committee to assess the different stations and circuits for missionary purposes made an aggregate apportionment of $1,955.00 for the following year. Thomas, Swartz and Keller were made a committee with instructions to "address a pastoral letter to the ministers and churches with reference to the general prosperity of the cause." The Eldership was pronounced "one of the most pleasant ones we ever held." It was presided over by J. Haffleigh, with J. Rife, Treasurer; J. S. Stamm, First Clerk, and A. H.

Long, Second Clerk, who received "a vote of thanks for the able manner in which they discharged their respective duties."

39th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The General Eldership in 1866 had recommended the publication of Annual Eldership Journals in pamphlet form; but in 1866 the East Pennsylvania Eldership decided against doing so, and resolved to publish its entire Journal in The Advocate. But the session held at Newville, Cumberland county, beginning November 13, 1867, "appointed J. F. Welshampel as reporter of this body, to prepare a synopsis of the Journal for The Church Advocate." He was an advisory member, being a member of the German Eldership. J. Haiffeigh delivered the opening sermon from Acts xx. 28. The Eldership was constituted with thirty-four teaching elders, and thirty-two ruling elders and messengers. The latter had no vote. A. H. Long was the Speaker; J. Rife, Treasurer; C. H. Forney, First Clerk, and G. Sigler, Second Clerk. The Eldership decided to make memorial services each year a regular order, "in honor of any ministerial members who may have died during the year." "A lengthy and spirited discussion" took place during two sittings, on several resolutions "relative to the continuance of the 'itinerancy among us.'" They were offered by E. H. Thomas, and declared that "the itinerancy, as we have understood and practiced it, is fundamental to our system of co-operation;" that "every effort to annul or set aside a fixed or specific period for a preacher to remain on any appointment is revolutionary and subversive of the system of co-operation practiced by this body," and urging "the General Eldership at its next session to pass a constitutional Article, declaring the system of itinerancy as it has existed among us for nearly forty years fundamental to the existence of our plan of co-operation." The resolutions were adopted. Eight brethren were licensed, and were addressed, and prayer offered for them, by Long and Keller. The Board of Missions was "directed to devise ways and means whereby the sum of $500.00 may be secured as a partial remuneration for the highly efficient labors of this beloved father in Israel"—E. H. Thomas. Ministers removing within the territory of any other Eldership were requested to take Transfers. Thomas, Swartz and Forney were designated as a committee "to examine all the records of the Eldership to ascertain on what points of doctrine, practice and Church polity the Church has already declared her views." The report showed that the Eldership had: 1. Made all ministers amenable to it for their official and moral character and their theological faith. 2. Reserved to itself the right to fix boundaries and assign the ministers to their fields of labor. 3. That "plainness of dress" is a Christian characteristic. 4. That none but justified believers are fit subjects for baptism; that baptism prior to conversion is unlawful, and therefore a person should be rebaptized after he becomes a believer. 5. That the Spirit and the word are not to be confounded or identified with each other; that the Spirit may operate with or without the word. 6. That it is inexpedient for the members of the Church of God to intermarry with the unconverted. 7. Persons should be received into church membership by mutual consent. 8. On temperance, education and slavery the records were simply referred to. 9. Withholding from preachers by the churches of their promised support made them guilty of an act of immorality. 10. Refusing to interfere with the personal rights of members in the matter of benevolent and secret associations outside of the Church. 11. Enjoining on members the observance of public days of fasting, thanksgiving, etc. 12. The duty of members of the Church to assist in establishing Sabbath-schools. 13. Insisting on uniformity by all the ministers in the observing of the ordinances as held by the Church. 14. That the ruling power of the churches is vested in the teaching and ruling elders. 15. Against the followers of Christ mingling in the vain amusements of the world, such as the theater, the circus, dancing, trifling parties, light reading, extravagance and gaiety in dress and furniture. 16. The right of ministers is denied to leave their appointments without the consent of the Standing Committee, as also the dropping or neglecting of appointments. 17. Insisting on pastoral visiting. 18. That the itinerancy is fundamental to our system of co-operation. It can not be said that this report is exhaustive. The Eldership was in debt to the Treasurer to the amount of $2,731.51, and the Board of Missions was empowered to employ an agent to collect funds to pay off this debt. Exhorters' licenses were to be limited to "persons contemplating the Christian ministry." J. Rife resigned as Treasurer, and Dr. George Ross was elected. By resolution of the Committee on Temperance, "temperance covers all excesses," but the "occasional or habitual use of spirituous, vinous, malt or fermented liquors as a beverage" was declared to be "in direct antagonism with Christianity and unbecoming any professor of religion." Assessments for $2,700.00 were made by the Board of Missions. The territory was divided into fourteen stations, fifteen circuits and four missions, including Wooster, Ohio.

40th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—On July 8, 1868, the Assistant Editor, C. H. Forney, announced in an editorial, that at the Eldership which would convene at Unlontown, Md., October 21, 1868, he would offer an amendment to the Constitution making "the Journalizing Clerk also the Stated Clerk of the Eldership, who shall take care of all the papers pertaining to the Eldership," etc., and for which extra work he was to receive ——— compensation. The reasons for this amendment were set forth. After the Eldership was constituted and J. Keller elected Speaker; George Ross, Treasurer; C. H. Forney, Journalizing, and B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerks, Forney submitted the proposed amendment, which was referred to a special committee composed of Thomas, Deshong and Long, which reported favorably, and the amendment, covering the provision for a Stated Clerk, more fully defining his duties and those of the Transcribing Clerk, and creating the office of Financial Clerk and defining his duties, was adopted. Thereupon the resignation of Forney as Journalizing Clerk, offered when the amendment was submitted, was taken from the table and accepted, and he was elected Stated Clerk. As the East Ohio Eldership had recommended "the sale of the Bethel at Wooster, for the purpose of paying the debt and building a smaller house," the Eldership proposed "to assume all responsibility, pay the debt and supply that congregation with a preacher, provided the East Ohio Eldership transfer all its rights thereto to the East Pennsylvania Eldership." Members of the classes in the Course of Studies being somewhat negligent, the Eldership resolved that their licenses should be withheld after "having failed for two consecutive years to comply with the action of the Eldership." This session of the Eldership definitely fixed the months in which the various collections for its regular Funds are to be lifted. The Eldership's right to hold preachers amenable for doctrine taught was asserted in the case of H. L. Soule, who was "instructed that he be careful to preach only the gospel," and in the case of J. S. Stamm, concerning whom it was "reported that he is not in harmony with the views of this body in a particular point [feet-washing], and his license be placed in the hands of the Standing Committee." Dissatisfaction was expressed with the present liquor law, and the Legislature was "earnestly implored to enact a downright, positive prohibition law." A vote was called for to be taken "by the Maryland members of this Eldership," "whether they desire the delegates to the General Eldership to ask for an Eldership in Maryland." It was "decided not to apply for permission to organize said Eldership." The propriety of holding an Eldership camp-meeting was recommended to the churches throughout the Eldership. Ministers were assigned to seventeen stations, including Wooster, thirteen circuits and four missions. The first minister placed on the Superannuated list by the Eldership was A. Swartz.

41st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The fears of the Eldership in 1868, that Thomas might not be one of its number, when on October 20, 1869, it convened at Washington, Lancaster county, Pa., were painfully realized. He who had "in a masterly manner conducted our Church organ for ten years" had ceased from his labors and entered into rest. The officers chosen were A. Swartz, Speaker; C. H. Forney, Stated Clerk (but no election was required); George Ross, Treasurer; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Haffleigh, Financial Clerk. The Standing Committee of which Thomas had so long been a member was now composed of Swartz, Forney and Laverty. By direction of the Eldership the funeral sermon of E. H. Thomas was preached on Sabbath morning by C. H. Forney, at which time an address which had been delivered by J. Mackey, was also ordered to be read. Text of the sermon, Heb. xi. 4, and the sermon was ordered to be published in The Church Advocate. The Report of the Committee on Temperance, which was adopted, recommended "petitioning the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and Maryland to pass laws doing away with the license system." If this is impracticable, then "petition the judges of the courts to license no liquor selling houses in the townships, boroughs and cities in which they are located." At his request, J. S. Stamm was "dismissed from the ministerial fellowship of this Eldership." An effort failed to amend the Constitution so as to admit one ruling elder from each organized church who shall be regularly appointed to represent the same." At a missionary meeting, held on the last evening of the session, "cash contributions and pledges to the amount of $1,157.50 were given." Strong resolutions on the death of Thomas were adopted, declaring that "his record will be cherished by the members of this Eldership as an able and efficient expounder of the doctrine of the Church of God and an able Editor of The Church Advocate."

42nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Presumably up to this date the East Pennsylvania Eldership and its members had been very innocent in the matter of prearranging tickets. It was the theory that in all ecclesiastical elections every member would, without bias or persuasion, cast his ballot for men he thought should hold certain official positions. But brethren had become more or less interested in politics, and learned political methods, so that immediately after electing Mackey unanimously Speaker; Geo. Ross, Treasurer; E. D. Aller, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Haifeigh, Financial Clerk, of the forty-second annual session, at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, November 9, 1870, a motion prevailed "to appoint a committee to investigate the movement to elect a picked ticket of the Eldership, consisting of Keller, Lavery and Price." The committee made no report. The office of Stated Clerk being permanent, C. H. Forney continued. On account of neglect by some pastors to lift collections for certain funds, they were required to return to their fields and lift them. An instance of the evil of misappropriating funds by religious bodies occurred at this meeting, when indirectly $150.00 missionary money were appropriated "to pay a debt contracted by two churches" in consequence of a change in the appointments two years ago. By constitutional amendment it was made the duty of ministers on fields of labor to ask each member for ten cents annually for the Widows' Fund, and to lift other collections named during given months. Other amendments being desired, it was directed "that a committee of three be appointed, of which the Editor, C. H. Forney, shall be chairman, whose duty it shall be to revise the Constitution and Rules of Order." This committee announced a meeting in April and invited suggestions, so as to be ready to report at the next Eldership. The report of the Treasurer shows that he had received for the Missionary Fund $1,252.14, and paid out $1,690.32; for the Widows' Fund he received $386.94, and paid out $338.63; for the Contingent Fund he received $215.67, and paid out $128.93, and for the Superannuated Fund he received $309.91, and paid out $165.00. It was required that hereafter the Treasurer give bond in the sum of $5,000.00. The tendency toward formal ordination is seen in a resolution, which was adopted, directing "the Speaker to appoint a minister to receive into the ranks of the ministry by the right hand of fellowship and an appropriate address and prayer those who receive licenses from this body;" and, "that said ceremony shall take place after an appropriate sermon on the work of the ministry on Monday evening of the Eldership." Payment for services by the clerks of the Eldership was made a rule. The appointments numbered seventeen stations, twenty circuits and six missions. The enrolled ministers at this Eldership numbered eighty-one, with seven exhorters. One of the most important actions of this Eldership was that directing "that a convention of ministers of this body be held at Harrisburg in January next" to form a Ministerial Association, "to promote the literary and spiritual improvement of the members." It was also recommended that "local poor funds be established by the various churches."

48rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—It may be inferred that the Committee on Revision of the Constitution made important, if not radical, recommendations from the fact that the Eldership which met in Harrisburg, Pa., October 25, 1871, consumed nearly two whole days in the consideration of its Report. Yet editorially it was stated by Forney, the Chairman, that "the changes made are not of a material character." The Report being ready, it was handed in shortly after the organization, and its consideration entered upon. Its consideration was finished and the whole report, with a few changes, adopted on Saturday morning. The yeas and nays were taken on an amendment to the Committee's Report of Article I., changing the title from "Church of God" to "Churches of God," which prevailed by a vote of 40 to 28. In the Report of the Committee the former two-year limit for pastors was changed to three years. As there developed a tendency to still further lengthen the term, the provision being only a By-Law, subject to amendment by a majority vote, the friends of the fixed limit secured the adoption of an amendment giving it the character of a Constitutional Article, so that it would require a two-thirds vote to change it. In the organization of the Eldership B. F. Beck was made Speaker; Dr. Geo. Ross, Treasurer; E. D. Aller, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Haifeigh, Financial Clerk. C. H. Forney, Stated Clerk, resigned his office, "to take effect at the close of the session," and "Bro. H. C. Demming was elected to succeed him." A. H. Chase, Free Baptist, was present and participated in the deliberations, for which he received the thanks of the Eldership. He was especially "interested in our missionary operations." The delegates to the General Eldership in 1872 were instructed, (1) To vote as a unit; (2) for a Managing Editor; (3) for a Corps of Editors, and (4) rescinding an Article of the Constitution of the General Eldership. The name of L. B. Hartman and W. O. Owen, men of standing, ability and influence, were "stricken from the Roll of Ministers" for failure to co-operate faithfully with the Eldership. The Reports on Temperance and Education were brief and conservative. The disposition and power of the Eldership to guard against heterodox teaching were evidenced in the withholding of license from J. W. Collins because he was charged with advocating "soul-sleeping or materialism." A new form of Ordination, to take the place of one adopted in 1870, was incorporated in the By-Laws by the Committee on Revision, and was used at this session. Among the missions is "Freedmen's Mission—J. H. Gaines" (colored). There are eighteen stations, twenty-one circuits and five missions. The Eldership directed three Ministerial Associations to be organized so as to be within easy reach of all the ministers, and appointed C. H. Forney, C. Price and G. Sigler to fix the boundaries of the districts.

44th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—When the Eldership met at Mechanicsburg, Pa., November 6, 1872, it stood face to face with the question as to whether it would or would not accept the verdict of the General Eldership of 1872, directing all the Annual Elderships to use the singular form of the word "Church" in their titles. After the organization, which resulted in the election of D. A. L. Lavery for Speaker; Geo. Sigler, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfiegh, Financial Clerk, and Geo. Ross, Treasurer, Forney offered a resolution intended to make submission as easy as possible in the part of the majority of 1871, which provided, "that, irrespective of our individual beliefs on this question, the East Pennsylvania Eldership acknowledges the propriety of uniformity in Eldership titles, and re-adopts the title by which it has from the first been designated, viz.: 'The East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God.'" It was made the special order for Monday. When it was taken up the absence of "that mild and gracious temper" which Milton commends in him "who hears and judges," was evinced when Swartz "moved to strike out 'all after the word 'Whereas,'" in Forney's preamble, "and insert a preamble, declaring that 'the General Eldership is the creature of the Annual Elderships,'" and that "the Church of God modeled after the pattern contained in the New Testament, do not delegate the right to determine the appropriate use of Church title to the Annual Elderships, and through them to the General Eldership." This was followed by a resolution declaring that "legislation in response to the faith, practice and policy of the churches of God only belongs to Christ, their head, and that it is daring usurpation to appropriate the divine church title contrary to its significant meaning and use." But the consideration of the matter was again deferred; and on the fifth day the battle was fought out under the leadership of Swartz for his amendment and Forney against it and for his resolution, with the result that the action of 1871 was reversed, and "the original resolution of C. H. Forney was adopted. Yeas, 43; nays, 21." The Constitution was amended accordingly. This settled the question of Eldership titles for twenty-one years.

An important Board was added by constitutional amendment to the Boards of the Eldership, viz: the Board of Education. The statistics indicated encouraging growth in all departments of the Church. The number of members had increased to 4,270, with 426 additions during the year. There were 194 preaching points; 111 Sunday-schools, with 7,224 scholars, and 1,648 teachers. A mission was projected for Lancaster City, and at the missionary meeting $1,000.00 were raised for missionary purposes.

45th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Free Baptist Church had for many years manifested such a friendly, fraternal spirit, and made unofficial overtures for co-operation, that it was no surprise when the Eldership met at Middletown, Dauphin county, Pa., October 29, 1873, to find Dr. G. H. Ball, Editor of "The Baptist Union," New York, and Rev. Bryan, in attendance. The Eldership by formal resolution expressed its pleasure at their presence and cordial greetings, and promised "heartily to seek to further any means whereby the various bodies holding sentiments similar to our own may be brought into closer and more general Christian and ecclesiastical fellowship." To this end a committee, consisting of G. Sigler and B. F. Beck, was appointed to "visit the Free Baptist Association next Fall, in Providence, R. I." An organization was effected by electing G. Sigler, Speaker; Dr. Geo. Ross, Treasurer; B. F. Beck, Stated Clerk; J. W. Deshong, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Halfleigh, Financial Clerk. The Eldership refused to make it mandatory to elect one ruling elder on the Standing Committee and three on the Stationing Committee. Resolutions by C. H. Forney for a fuller accountability of ministers were adopted, which provided for a more "careful inquiry into the character and extent of their labors outside of the pulpit, and the faithfulness with which they have carried out the rules of co-operation." Reports of the delegates were also provided for in the resolutions in connection with the reports of the pastors, and a committee was empowered to arrange "a series of questions to be used in the examination of preachers." The Report of the Treasurer showed that $2,637.16 had been received for missionary purposes, and $3,967.28 expended. The Eldership made arrangements to furnish a preacher for the Maine mission, which had during the year been in the hands of the Standing Committee, and it appointed J. C. Seabrooks to that field, but he declined to go. The Eldership was not disposed to commit itself definitely on the matter of "Christian Union," on which Mackey had submitted a resolution, although Dr. Ball insisted that "the demand for union among liberal Baptists in these central States is imperative." He favored organic union between the Free Baptists and the Church of God. "Philadelphia Mission" in addition to the Philadelphia church, which had become self-supporting, was placed among the stations, with B. F. Beck as pastor. The spirit of Christian patriotism always characterized the Eldership, and accordingly it did not hesitate to act upon certain documents received from the Executive Committee of the United States Centennial Commission. A "Select Committee," composed of C. H. Forney, H. C. Demming and J. Kennedy, was appointed to consider and report on said documents. After canvassing the subject said Committee advised the appointment of a committee of three to collect the necessary data for "the writing and publication in suitable form of a history of the Church of God in the United States, which shall embody all the items of information called for by the circular letter of the Centennial Commission," relating not only to organization, but doctrines, articles of faith, polity and statistics. The committee was considerate enough to anticipate objections by those who would likely see a Creed in such a work by adding a separate resolution, "that nothing in this work, if published, shall be regarded or construed as a Creed, Confession of Faith, or authoritative Church Standard."

46th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The forty-sixth Annual East Pennsylvania Eldership had an enrollment of one hundred and twenty-two members, divided as follows: Preachers, 64; delegates, 35; messengers, 22; Treasurer, 1. Eighteen enrolled were absent. In the organization C. H. Forney was chosen Speaker; B. F. Beck, Stated Clerk; J. M. Carvell, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfleigh, Financial Clerk, and Geo. Ross, Treasurer. Many churches had become more or less embarrassed financially, and made appeals for help. The matter was referred to a committee; but the Eldership could only permit said churches to go out and canvass for funds. To shorten the session the device of early fixing the time for final adjournment was resorted to, and also the holding of night sessions. The attendance had become so large as to make the Eldership session burdensome to churches entertaining it. Two missionary meetings were provided for, at which a large sum was secured for missions. The first action was taken to change the time from Spring to Fall for pastors to go to their new fields by the appointment of a committee on the subject, which reported in favor of the change, but action was deferred "to the first day of the next Eldership." The opening of a Bookstore in Harrisburg, by Dr. Geo. Ross, was strongly commended, as was the action of the Board of Publication in deciding to begin the publication of "The Sabbath-School Record" in January, 1875. "Certain ecclesiastics of the Romish Church, alienated from our Constitution and laws by their supreme allegiance to a foreign Potentate," being charged with "openly and unqualifiedly avowing themselves enemies of our public school system," resolutions were adopted, disapproving in severe terms of their course, declaring "that intelligence, virtue and religion are the main pillars of the Republic; that our public schools are necessary to the one, and the Bible, without note or comment, in our public schools, is necessary to the other, and that the enemies of either are the enemies of the Republic." The delegates to the General Eldership having been elected, they were instructed to "use all proper measures to secure the freedom of the press so far as The Church Advocate is concerned;" "to vote for a corps of editors," and for "a just settlement". of certain claims. Temperance having become a political issue, the Report of the Committee was more thoroughly discussed, and there was strong dissent by a small minority to a provision, declaring it to be "the duty of every Christian to use the ballot against this cruel system whenever opportunity is offered; and in order to do this we should vote only for men who are avowed temperance men, irrespective of party." Ecclesiastical electioneering was forcibly condemned, with a penalty for any one found guilty of deprivation of the office for that year for which he electioneered. The Committee on the State of Religion made a pessimistic report, stating that it was sensibly impressed with the fact that in the last year, and in years which have passed, we have failed and come short of accomplishing the good to the people of our generation which we might have done, and which we should have done in the name and strength of our divine Master." To secure well prepared obituaries of deceased ministers for the memorial services it was now made the rule to have the Committee on Obituaries appointed a year in advance. The Examining Committee was also to do its work before the Eldership convened. The session was held at Shippensburg, Pa., in 1874.

47th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—A conflict between the Standing Committee and the Board of Missions developed during the year, in the matter of control of mission funds. The former assumed authority to appropriate money out of said Fund, which the latter resisted. This was under an old provision of the Constitution, giving the Standing Committee all the powers of the Eldership. The Board of Missions resisted this, and was prepared to defend its position, and have the question determined in 1875. Accordingly after the organization on October 20th, by the election of W. L. Jones, Speaker; B. F. Beck, Stated Clerk; J. M. Carvell, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haifeigh, Financial Clerk, and Dr. Geo. Ross, Treasurer, the special order was suspended to take up the Report of the Standing Committee. All items containing appropriations out of the Missionary Fund were stricken out. The retiring Speaker, C. H. Forney, contrary to rule, did not read his sermon, and thus also broke the prevailing custom of publishing the opening sermon in The Advocate. The question of changing pastors in the Fall was again postponed for one year. Two of the doctrinal sermons ordered to be preached at this session were ready, and were delivered—one by Swartz and the other by Beck. Dr. D. M. Graham, Free Baptist, was in attendance, bringing the greetings of the Central Association of New York and Pennsylvania. A part of the church at Lancaster having withdrawn and organized a separate church, after a protracted discussion it was recognized and received into the Eldership. The effect of the Prohibition party organization was more clearly revealed at this session. The Committee on Temperance sought to avoid both Scylla and Charibdis, and so brought in a Report "reaffirming our former views on the temperance question." But Sigler moved a substitute in which it was declared to be "the bounden duty of all ministers, Christians and well-wishers of mankind to assume an attitude of uncompromising Prohibitionists," and that it be "our duty to withdraw our votes from parties which have hitherto only disappointed our expectations upon this question, and give them to a party pledged to secure all our interests that are at stake, and at the same time prohibit the liquor traffic." So entirely unprepared was the body for such a radical departure from its past traditions that it "laid the whole subject on the table" by a yea and nay vote of 37 to 13.

The Eldership prohibited the granting of certificates by pastors without the concurrence of the elders. It also expressed its favorable judgment on "the use of unfemented wine at the Lord's Supper." November 14th was named as "a day of prayer throughout the East Pennsylvania Eldership for a revival of religion," and the ministers were "requested to preach suitable sermons" on said day. Upon Dr. Graham's address to the Eldership, Swartz, Kennedy, Ross, Gable and Forney were appointed to draft recommendations for the Eldership to adopt. They reported in favor of a foreign mission in connection with the Free Baptist Mission in India; the appointment of delegates to the Free Baptist Association of New York, and favoring "a general convention of religious bodies holding similar views to those of our own and of the Free Baptists." Forney, Sigler, Ross and Smuller were appointed the delegates to the Free Baptist Association. The Eldership was held at Mt. Joy, Pa.

48th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Roll of the Eldership which convened at Middletown, Dauphin county, October 18, 1876, contained one hundred and forty-nine names. Of this number forty-two were pastors, thirty-two are classed as local ministers, forty-eight delegates and twenty-three messengers, the latter having no vote. B. F. Beck was chosen Speaker; J. M. Carvell, Stated Clerk; A. Wiley, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisleigh, Financial Clerk, and George Ross, Treasurer. The Eldership was favored with the presence of Dr. D. M. Graham, delegate from St. Joseph's Yearly Meeting of the Free Baptist Church, Mich., who addressed the body, whereupon, "to express our fraternal sentiments" the Speaker appointed C. H. Forney, A. H. Long and W. L. Jones a committee to draft suitable resolutions. As Dr. Graham dwelt upon union of "liberal Baptists," the Committee's Report expressed "belief in the propriety of the Christian people of all beliefs striving for the unity of the Spirit;" especially did it favor "a closer union between ourselves and all those Christian bodies whose sentiments are so nearly similar to our own;" expressed the belief that "it is possible to enter into some arrangement" for co-operation, but that "we cannot entertain any proposition looking toward organic union that would oblige us to compromise any of the distinctive Bible principles and doctrines which we hold," and suggested the "appointment of a commission by each of the bodies in contemplation of conferring together upon all matters in reference to which co-operation is proposed." Forney, Sigler and Beck were appointed "Commissioners." The question of changing preachers in the Fall, after receiving some consideration, was postponed one year. The temperance question became a live issue on account of the activity of ministers in promoting "local option;" yet the Eldership did not take definite action, but in a general way insisted that it is "the bounden duty of all ministers, Christians and well-wishers of mankind to assume the attitude of constant and untiring opposition to the liquor system." The terms "politically" and "ballot-box" were stricken out of the Report. The Stationing Committee was instructed to send a missionary to Maine, to prepare the way for the organization of a Maine Eldership. The Eldership prohibited any one from canvassing for funds who has not been "publicly accredited as such by the Standing Committee." The Committee on Education insisted that "the ministers of the Eldership endeavor to create a strong and wide-spread sentiment in favor of a Church College." The use of unfermented wine for Communion purposes was recommended. Arrangements were made to start a new mission in Huntingdon, county-seat of Huntingdon county, and a committee was named to canvass for funds. Also an agent was authorized to be appointed to visit during the year all the appointments in the Eldership "to work up our missionary interests, the collections for the various funds," etc. J. W. Deshong was appointed "to collect money and purchase a lot in Columbia, Lancaster county, for the future use of the Church for a mission." The Eldership now had twenty-two stations, nineteen circuits and three missions, with two new missions in contemplation.

49th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—While the Commissioners on union with other bodies had done nothing, and made no report at the Eldership held at Harrisburg, Dauphin county, beginning October 24, 1877, said action of 1876 did not create a breach in the friendly relations between the Eldership and the Free Baptist Church. Dr. Graham was again present, representing the Free Baptist Central Association, and Dr. J. L. Phillips, Free Baptist Missionary to India. Co-operation in foreign mission work was the burden of their message. Following their addresses before the Eldership, it was agreed to send "two representatives to their next General Conference;" to formulate "a plan of operation for foreign mission work," and to create a Board of Foreign Missions." The following directors, with the Treasurer, Dr. Ross, to constitute said Board, were elected: A. Swartz, D. A. L. Lavery, C. H. Forney, B. F. Beck and J. Kennedy, ministers, and J. S. Gable, I. Frazer, Geo. Smuller, A. Hostetter and D. C. Kolp, laymen. Balloting for officers of the Eldership resulted in the choice of C. H. Forney, Speaker; A. Wiley, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisleigh, Financial Clerk, and Dr. George Ross, Treasurer. The Treasurer's report showed that collections for the year were:—Home Missionary money, $1,900.94; Widows' Fund, $378.19; Contingent Fund, $107.18; Superannuated Fund, $145.09. The Columbia mission project was reported in good condition, as a lot had been bought, and everything seemed encouraging. The Committee recommended that the mission be created, and J. W. Deshong appointed to raise the money to build. W. L. Wright received an "honorable dismissal to the Free Baptist denomination." C. W. Cooper, J. Cooper and J. Jontz also applied for honorable dismissals, but a committee on their cases reported that the last named only "be granted a dismissal from the body," and that it did not consider the first two "worthy of ministerial fellowship, and therefore recommend that their names be stricken from the Roll." The report of the Committee on Temperance, after being laid over for several sittings, was adopted, which declared it to be "the duty of all Christian people to use the ballot as well as every other lawful means in the suppression of the whiskey system." An effort was unsuccessfully made "to institute an inquiry into the present inequality of the districting of the territory of the Eldership, with the view to equalize the labor, as well as the support, of the various ministers in the field." The secularizing of the Lord's day was emphatically condemned. The Standing Committee was empowered to act in the matter of "the semi-centennial of this body," and it was requested that "every member of the several churches make special donations into the treasury of the Eldership." The Eldership favored the holding of a general camp-meeting, and place the matter into the hands of a committee. The Eldership mourned the death of J. Mackey, J. Stamm and B. Mateer. After hearing the address of P. Loucks, fraternal delegate from the West Pennsylvania Eldership, C. H. Forney and J. S. Gable were appointed delegates to said body in 1878.

50th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Step by step the organization of the East Pennsylvania Eldership was brought to its present state of perfection. Boards and committees were created to meet new conditions, or to do more efficient work. One of these new departures characterize the Eldership in 1878, which convened at Philadelphia on the evening of October 23rd, when the retiring Speaker, C. H. Forney, preached the Opening Sermon, from Acts i. 8. Theme:—"The Power of the Ministry." A. Snyder was chosen Speaker; J. M. Carvell, Stated Clerk; A. Wiley, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisleigh, Financial Clerk, and George Ross, Treasurer. Upon report of the Standing Committee, H. Mills, of Maine, was received as a member of the Eldership. The Report of the Treasurer showed quite a decrease in the amount of missionary money received, being only $1,091.91. A resolution was introduced by C. H. Forney, creating a new Standing Committee, to be known as the Judiciary Committee. This committee was to have charge of all judicial cases at the Eldership and during the year. It was a movement which aroused some suspicion, as there were at this time, and for some years, cases of alienation in the Eldership and latent enmities. The matter was referred to a committee, which, however, reported favorably, except that feature which made the committee a Standing Committee. Instead of sermons in the evenings of the sittings of the Eldership, a committee was named "to decide on subjects for discussion in the evenings during the Eldership." To meet and answer reports circulated westward, to the effect that in the East Pennsylvania Eldership the ordinance of Feet-washing "has been more or less neglected, and is becoming unpopular," a poll of the pastors was ordered, by resolution submitted by Forney, in answer to five questions, to wit: 1. Whether the two ordinances are observed together. 2. If not, how often, when and where do you observe the Lord's Supper? 3. How often, when and where do you observe the ordinance of Feet-washing? 4. If you observe them together, how often, when and where? 5. Are both ordinances generally observed by the membership? The answers were tabulated and published in the Journal, and were a complete refutation of the report. The Eldership camp-meeting was reported "a grand success," and one was ordered to be held in 1879. The licenses of half a dozen ministers were placed in the hands of the Standing Committee, some of which were never renewed. About as many cases went to the new committee—the Judiciary Committee—an evidence of its utility. The importance of the Ministerial Association was so fully recognized that ministers were "instructed to attend these meetings more regularly." The Eldership was painfully surprised when B. F. Beck "requested a certificate of his standing as a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." This was done in terms significant of his unimpeachable character and the high esteem in which he was held by the entire body. Authority was given to "the German brethren of the Eldership to start a Ministerial Association in addition to the one authorized in 1874." The starting of "a beneficiary fund for the education of young men for the ministry," as recommended by Forney, Beck and Haisleigh, Committee on Education, was duly authorized. The death of John G. Price and W. H. Anderson, as ministers "highly respected and esteemed," were duly memorialized. It was decided "to perpetuate the Board of Foreign Missions," with the membership unchanged.

51st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Simultaneously with the publication of the Journal of the Eldership held in 1879, at Lancaster, Pa., the Opening Sermon by A. Snyder was published. It was based on I. Cor. i. 21, and was delivered on Wednesday evening, October 22nd. The theme was:—"The Preaching of the Gospel God's Plan of Saving the World." The Eldership elected G. W. Seilhammer Speaker; A. Wiley, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisleigh, Financial Clerk, and George

Ross, Treasurer. But later in the session Ross resigned, and S. Knisley, Orrstown, Franklin county, was elected. Sigler was "specially commended for his able and faithful defense" of Feet-washing against Dr. Swartz, of the Lutheran Church. Forney moved the appointment of "a committee to prepare a program for the semi-centennial anniversary of this Eldership." The committee reported, that the session in 1880 meet one day earlier; that on Tuesday evening a "semi-centennial sermon" be preached; on Wednesday morning "a sermon on the mission of the Church;" Wednesday afternoon "a memorial service be held;" on Wednesday evening "a general reunion and ordinance service be held." C. H. Forney was appointed to preach the "anniversary sermon," and A. Swartz, "the sermon on the Mission of the Church." Prof. Ege and son submitted to the Board of Education a proposition for the sale of the Cumberland Valley Institute to the Eldership, which was considered, and again referred to a committee, consisting of Forney, Ross and Long, which reported in favor of appointing a committee to visit the Institute, and take such action as they may think advisable. The committee was Ross, Frazer, Gable, Haifeigh and Esterline. "The Religious Education of Children" was made the subject for general discussion on Saturday evening. "The religious interests of the State of Maine" were placed in the care of a committee composed of Forney, Price and Hershey, which reported in favor of organizing a Sisters' Eastern Mission Society; that one evening of each Eldership session be given this Society, and that bi-monthly or quarterly collections be taken in all the Sabbath-schools in the Eldership. The Society was duly organized. Every pastor was "requested to preach more frequently on the duty and obligation of the Sabbath, pointing out the numerous ways in which it is profaned, and showing the proper manner of its sanctification." The matter of the Salem church, Lancaster, came up in connection with the renewal of the license of J. Tucker, local minister, and member of said church. A committee, consisting of Jones, Price and Forney, was sent to confer with said church. The committee reported its visit to Salem church, and its answer, "that said church do not consider themselves members of the Eldership, and will not co-operate." The report being recommitted, a second visit was made to Salem church, after which the committee recommended "that the Eldership refrain from any further action at this time, but permit matters to remain as they are for the present." This was approved. "The permanent location for a camp-meeting ground" was placed in the hands of the Camp-meeting Committee. The Ministerial Association having ceased to meet, a committee, consisting of J. M. Speese, J. H. Esterline and G. W. Getz, was appointed to reorganize it. The Eldership appreciated the presence of T. Hickernell, of Ohio, and invited him to make an address, and the Committee appointed him to preach on the last evening of the session.

52nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—This was the semi-centennial Eldership, though numbered here as the "fifty-second." Its official number is "the fifty-first Annual Eldership," three sessions having been held between October, 1830, and October, 1831. Very appropriately it was held at Harrisburg, where it was originally organized. It met in the Fourth Street Bethel, at 7 o'clock p. m., October 20, 1880. But a preliminary meeting was held during the preceding day. The afternoon was devoted to educational matters, when "the importance of immediate action by the body was urged in the direction of the establishment of a school under the control of the Eldership." In the evening a "memorial sermon" was preached by D. A. L. Lavery. On Wednesday morning A. Swartz preached on "The Mission of the Church." The afternoon was set apart for a regular memorial service, at which C. Price delivered an address on "The Faith of the Fathers," preceded by "the reading of the Roll containing the names of forty-four of our departed brethren and fellow-laborers in the ministry." The Opening Sermon on Wednesday evening was dispensed with, and a "re-union and ordinance meeting was held." It was the largest Eldership held up to this date, the enrolled membership consisting of eighty ministers, fifty-six delegates, forty-four messengers, seven exhorters and the Treasurer. The officers elected for this semi-centennial session were C. Price, Speaker; D. S. Shoop, Stated Clerk; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haifeigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisely, Treasurer. The sermons by Lavery, Swartz and Price were ordered to be published in The Advocate. The W. C. T. U. was also in session in Harrisburg, and G. Sigler offered resolutions, which prevailed, heartily endorsing its work, and providing for the appointment of "a committee of three to convey to said meeting our greetings," and urging "our women to give their energies and influence to the furtherance of the end contemplated by the W. C. T. U." The actions of the Educational Convention held the day preceding the Eldership were reported, and received the unanimous endorsement of the Eldership, which declared it "to be the sense of the Eldership that a school should be established for the education of the youth of the Church, as well as others, under the auspices of the Church." C. H. Forney offered the following, which was adopted: That the Eldership authorize and direct the Board of Education to appoint a proper person to canvass the territory to raise funds for the purpose of establishing a school under the auspices of the Church." The committee added to this the words "that the time has come when, without further delay, the Eldership should enter upon this work." A special sitting was held on Friday evening to canvass the whole subject more fully, when the sentiments of the Convention were more directly embodied in resolutions of its own by the Eldership. Thursday evening the special order was the consideration of a resolution offered by G. Sigler, as to "what can be done to make the work of the Lord committed to us more effective." At the same sitting Forney's resolution, that "during the coming year the special efforts of the Eldership and the Board of Missions shall be directed toward the strengthening and enlarging of the weak charges which at present are unable to give their pastors a living support," was discussed. After these subjects had been thoroughly considered they were referred to a committee, consisting of Sigler, Forney and Hunter. Said committee reported these items, which were heartily adopted: "Pledging ourselves anew to the heartiest co-operation to advance the cause of God within the bounds of the Eldership;" to give special attention to the weak fields of labor, and to mature plans to attach new points to them, or insure a living support to the pastors; requiring the Stationing Committee to appoint men to the weak charges who are best adapted to build them up; urging ministers on other fields to interest themselves and their churches in the work on these weak fields; advising that laymen on adjoining fields visit and encourage the membership at the weaker points; seeking to cultivate more of a sense of the vital unity of the body, so that the interests, the progress or the sufferings of one charge may be made the same to all the churches; the deepening of a sense of individual responsibility of each member for the success of interests committed to the Church, and recommending the creation of a Church Extension Fund and the appointment of a Board of Church Extension. Another new board created, under a resolution by H. C. Demming, was the "Board of Sunday-school Work." One minister, Alexander Wiley, had died during the year, concerning whom the Committee on Obituaries declared that "words are inadequate to express the sterling worth of this eminent servant of God." The sense of the Eldership was expressed by resolution, "that persons unbaptized, and who do not believe and practice the ordinances as preached by our ministers, should not be elected as elders of the church." The General Eldership was requested to prepare and publish "the Semi-centennial history of the Church of God in the United States, with a biographical sketch of the lives of the members connected with said history." The charges as fixed by the Stationing Committee were: Stations, twenty; circuits, twenty-two; missions, four.

53rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The number of deaths reported by the Committee on Obituaries, appointed the year before, was so much larger than usual as to evoke the inquiry, "Has the Great Head of the church a controversy with us that so many of our number have been removed by death?" They were John Brown, "reared under the bitter, cruel, accursed scepter of slavery," "cut down in the midst of his days;" Israel Brady, a convert of 1830, licensed in 1832, died "at the ripe age of 71 years and 2 months," who, "during all these years to the day of his death continued faithful to his trust as an honored member of this body;" Ayers L. Hilsher, "a young man of considerable promise," who was licensed in 1879, whose "pure life, irreproachable character and useful labors gained for him an influence which was full of promise for the future;" S. S. Richmond, aged 58 years and 5 months, licensed by the Ohio Eldership in 1843, a man with "natural abilities of a high order, a well-stored mind, and a power of penetration and a firmness of grasp which enabled him to grapple with the most intricate problems;" G. W. Coulter, licensed in 1848, a man "possessed of excellent natural qualifications for the ministry, of a meek, and quiet and patient spirit;" and among the prominent laymen, Dr. George Ross, twelve years Treasurer of the Eldership, eight times a delegate to the General Eldership, a member of the Board of Publication from 1857 to the day of his death, November 30, 1880, he was honest and conscientious as a steward and treasurer, served the Church with an enthusiastic zeal, and an intelligent devotion worthy of all commendation, and "excelled most other Christian men in the energy, activity and zeal with which he prosecuted the Lord's service," and John S. Gable, who died August 11, 1881, one of the first members and elders of the church at Lancaster, for years a member of the Board of Publication, "a man of many admirable qualities of head and heart and mind." It was with these dark clouds hanging over it that the Eldership convened in annual session at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, October 19, 1881. On said evening C. Price delivered the opening sermon, from John i. 14. J. M. Carvell was chosen Speaker; D. S. Shoop, Stated Clerk; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Haisfeigh, Financial Clerk. H. Mills was transferred to the Maine Eldership, where he had been laboring as a missionary. The Judiciary Committee had considerable work, and proved to be a very useful committee, always elected by the Eldership. S. Knisely, Treasurer, made his Report, showing that $1,096.10 had been received for the Missionary Fund; $54.67 for Foreign Mission work; $230.49, Widows' Fund; $174.24, Contingent Fund; $130.74, Superannuated Fund; $38.84, Church Extension Fund; $133.00, Educational Fund. A final settlement was made with B. Ober, missionary to Texas in 1856, by the payment of $50.00 on appropriation which had been withheld. What was known as "Speculative Life Insurance" was declared to be "of the nature of gambling; and as all gambling is immoral and against all law and order in all cases, and especially is it so when human life is the subject of the transaction," and accordingly "all the brethren, whether in or out of the ministry, are urged to abstain altogether from all business schemes, which are of a doubtful, suspicious or speculative character." The observance of the ordinances during the session of the Eldership, which had been required by the By-Laws, was made optional, at the request of the church where the Eldership holds its session. The sale of Mt. Zion Bethel, Lebanon county, was ordered, the proceeds to be applied on the Hummelstown church debt. The question of holding an Eldership camp-meeting in 1882 was considered by a committee, which made a favorable report, and an Eldership Camp-meeting Committee was appointed. In order to "cultivate more of a fraternal feeling, and for the spiritual edification of the churches," the Eldership advised "a more frequent exchange of pulpits on the part of the ministers on the various charges." Ministers were requested to give attention to "the reading of the Holy Scriptures as an important part of the public worship of God." A change was made in the use of the funds collected for Church Extension purposes, so that they are to be used "first for the payment of interest on church debts, and, secondly, for the helping of weak charges and the opening of new ones." The Eldership manifested quite a degree of concern over "the lamentable falling off in our missionary and other collections, thereby hindering the carrying forward of the work of the gospel." The ministers were directed "to make special efforts to lift all collections as speedily as possible." It congratulated "the brotherhood at large upon the auspicious inauguration" of the College enterprise. In some respects the Report of the Committee on Temperance was radical. It affirmed the Eldership's "inflexible opposition to the importation, manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors, and the use of narcotics, opium in all its preparations and modifications, tobacco in all its various forms," and asked "of our legislative branch of the State government a constitutional prohibitory statute against the manufacture, importation, licensing and sale of the above-named beverages, drug and weed." Ministers who "sign any application for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall answer to this body," and churches were "requested to require of all their members to refuse to sign such applications under penalty of reproof or expulsion."

54th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—As an evidence that the sanguinary hopes of strengthening of weak points entertained in 1880 were not fully realized, the Eldership in 1882 received the Reports of two committees which in 1881 were empowered to sell two houses of worship. Mt. Zion Bethel was sold for $150.00, which was paid toward the liquidation of the debt on the Hummelstown Bethel. The church property at Carlisle was sold for $1,171.25, of which $1,060.93 was paid George Ross & Co., cancelling their claim against the Hummelstown Bethel, and the balance was paid to the Treasurer of the Eldership. The Board of Incorporation was "authorized and empowered to make sale of the property of the Eldership situated in the city of Reading, Pa." The session of the Eldership was held at Mt. Joy, Lancaster county, beginning on Wednesday evening, October 18th, when J. M. Carvell preached the Opening Sermon from Col. i. 28—"Christ the Theme of Our Ministry." J. W. Deahong was elected Speaker; D. S. Shoop continued in the office of Stated Clerk; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisfeigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. A singular case was disposed of by the Special Judiciary Committee elected in 1881. A minister of the Eldership had secured a divorce upon grounds disapproved by the Eldership, and said Committee reported its findings, and the penalty. The Report was re-committed, when in view of the fact that the guilty minister had "applied to this body in the year 1878 to have his official relations with it dissolved, and the Eldership neglected to do its duty in complying with the request," the Committee reported "that his name be now stricken from the Roll of Ministers." The Eldership then adopted the further report of the Committee, "That it is the decided opinion of this body that any one putting away his wife except for the cause assigned by the Great Head of the church, and marrying another woman, is guilty of the sin of adultery, and that any minister marrying such parties is accessory to said sin." The growing sentiment against the three-year limit of the pastorate evidenced itself in the action laying on the table the Report of the Committee on Art. X. of the By-Laws, which "deemed it inexpedient at this time to make any change" in said Article. Yet it was not strong enough to extend the time-limit. The death of but one minister occurred during the year, that of John C. Owens, aged 77 years, 6 months and 16 days. He was a native of Cecil county, Md.; was converted at a Methodist camp-meeting, and became a member of said Church and was by it ordained to the gospel ministry. He became a member of the Eldership in 1843, having been baptized during the session by Winebrenner at Angle's Mill, near Shippensburg. "His ministerial character was uniformly affectionate and unusually attractive, and was inviting to the people, and it therefore received public approval and commendation." The "Foreign Mission Fund" was "incorporated in the Home Mission Fund." The "Hymnal prepared by the Committee of the General Eldership" "received the hearty endorsement of the Eldership. D. S. Shoop resigned as Stated Clerk, which was accepted, and H. E. Reeve was elected.

55th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The sentiment in favor of a change in the time-limit of the pastorate continued to grow, and manifested itself in an amendment by G. Sigler to a resolution by J. H. Redecker, appointing "C. H. Forney, J. M. Carvell and D. A. L. Laverty a committee to collect the various amendments to the Constitution and Rules of Order, and publish a new edition." The amendment directed "this Committee to revise the Constitution, and report at this Eldership," and it was adopted. A number of important changes were recommended, among which was the creation of a Board of Education, and the elimination of the time-limit. The first Board of Education elected under this new provision of the Constitution consisted of C. H. Forney, George Sigler, J. M. Carvell, S. D. C. Jackson and J. B. Lockwood. A spirited discussion of the recommendation on the time-limit was had, when by a yea and nay vote of 36 to 31 it was agreed to. But the point of order was raised that it required a two-thirds vote to amend the Constitution. This was over-ruled by the Speaker on the ground that this provision does not apply when the entire Constitution is undergoing revision, and so making every minister subject to removal "at the end of any one year," and give the Eldership power to reappoint for an indefinite number of years. This session of the Eldership was held at Altoona, Blair county, and began November 7, 1883. J. W. Deshong delivered the Opening Sermon on said evening, from Rom. viii. 31. The enrollment showed 60 ministers, 8 exhorters, 39 delegates and 24 messengers. The election for officers resulted in the choice of C. H. Forney, Speaker; H. E. Reeve, Stated Clerk; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfleigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. Rev. Joel Baker, of Bell Vernon, New York Central Free Baptist Association, was received as Corresponding Messenger. A special order was made for Friday afternoon to hear his address to the Eldership. The expressions of "fraternal greeting, and the cordial and kindly spirit" evinced in Baker's address were reciprocated in resolutions adopted, and "a messenger" was directed "to be appointed to represent us to our Baptist fellow laborers in Christ at their next Annual Association." The actions of the Convention of Liberal Baptists held at Minneapolis were approved. They provided for the publication annually of a Year Book, containing the names and post-offices of all the ministers in all the bodies represented, with a sufficient history of each body; the publishing of a quarterly, or magazine, in the interest of a closer affiliation; the union of all these bodies in foreign mission work; the change of ministers from one body to another "without considering himself as having left his society, and the patronizing of the literature of the different churches represented." Four of the eight items as adopted by the Convention were not agreed to. The death of A. Swartz, which occurred December 30, 1882, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, was fittingly commemorated. He was converted under the labors of Winebrenner. "His early educational advantages were limited; but he was gifted by nature with a strong intellect, clear perceptive faculties, a retentive memory, sound judgment and a thirst for learning, and soon acquired a fund of solid and useful knowledge." He was licensed in 1842, and "was a man of marked ability and distinguished worth." The sale of the Reading church property had been effected for $3,500.00, leaving a balance, after all liabilities were paid, of $487.30. Strong resolutions were adopted on the observance of the Sabbath, and the ministers were advised by their example upon this subject, and by faithful and repeated preaching on the same, to be ensamples to all the flock and a standing exemplification to their fellow men of the necessity, wisdom and blessedness of maintaining the distinctive Christian character and the strictly religious observance of that day which is emphatically contrasted with all other days as 'the Lord's day.' The modern camp-meetings, as conducted by ministers of the Church and of other Churches, were condemned, and "our brethren are requested not again to countenance or participate in any camp-meetings conducted in such a manner as to violate the sanctity of the Sabbath." The Eldership placed itself on record against any one but a properly ordained minister of the gospel administering the ordinance of baptism, or performing the marriage ceremony.

56th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In 1884 the Eldership convened at Lancaster, Lancaster county, on Wednesday evening, and listened to the Opening Sermon by C. H. Forney, on "The Ministry—Its Mission and Rewards." The enrollment consisted of 65 teaching elders, 45 delegates, 32 messengers and three exhorters. Four names were added to the Ministerial Roll during this session. The election for officers resulted in the choice of D. S. Shoop, Speaker; H. E. Reeve, Stated Clerk; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfeligh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The attempt to limit the election of members of the Eldership to but "one board, committee or office of this Eldership" failed of adoption after being "discussed at length." As a committee "on uniformity in the preparation for, and observance of, the ordinances of the Church, C. H. Forney, J. Halfeligh, C. C. Bartels, H. C. Demming and John Rae, recommended that "the matter be placed in the hands of the delegation from this Eldership to the next General Eldership." E. O. Dare, layman, proposed that "the Stationing Committee shall hereafter consist of three teaching elders, three delegates and one teaching elder who is not actively engaged in the ministry," was ruled out of order by the Speaker, who, upon an appeal being taken, was sustained by the Eldership. The agitation of the question, however, resulted in the election of one lay member on the Committee. But three of the nine members of the Board of Missions were laymen. W. J. Grissinger introduced the question of a change in the time for pastors to move to their new fields, when the Eldership decided that "they shall move on, and take charge of, the fields to which they have been appointed immediately after the close of the Eldership." The Roll of the dead this year contained four names. Wm. Figard died January 4, 1884, aged 67 years, 4 months and 23 days. He was licensed in 1871. "Religion was evidently a life work with him, for during all the years of service in his Master's cause he held on his way, and never faltered in the Christian race, nor looked back upon the world he had left behind." J. E. Arnold died February 4, 1884, aged 37 years, 1 month and 27 days. He was ordained in 1868. "His ministerial work was crowned with abundant success. He was an earnest, and fruitful revival preacher. His conversation and deportment were truly exemplary." S. W. Naill died February 24, 1884, aged 35 years, 9 months and 3 days. He was received into the Maryland and Virginia Eldership in 1872, and came into the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1881. "As a Christian minister he was without a blemish. He was a respectable preacher, earnest, interesting and successful." D. A. L. Laverty died December 23, 1883, at Mechanicsburg, where he was born and converted, and ordained in 1846. He entered the active ministry in 1861. "He was an efficient minister, an earnest and valuable counsellor, and filled with ability, credit and general acceptance a number of the principal charges of the Eldership." The death of Laverty, on motion of G. W. Seilhammer, induced the Eldership to agree "that a fund be created for the purpose or erecting a suitable monument to mark his resting place," which, on motion of G. Sigler, was so enlarged as to provide for "the erection of suitable testimonials of honor to the memory of these brethren," and of other "prominent ministers of this body whose resting places remain unmarked by any token of honor." An effort made to restore the three-year pastoral limit failed of success, a resolution to that effect being "indefinitely postponed." Allowing trafficking at camp-meetings in "such articles as ice cream, watermelons, candies, peanuts and tobacco on the Lord's day" was attempted to be made "a misdemeanor, and the brethren having charge of such camp-meeting shall be held amenable to this body;" but the resolution was "laid on the table." The tendency to regard the validity of ordination as dependent upon its being performed by the Speaker was checked by an action of the Eldership to the contrary. The Eldership provided for an annual sermon on Mission Interests, on Educational Interests and on Publications and General Benevolent Interests, and for the session of 1885 appointed J. B. Lockwood, J. M. Carvell and C. H. Forney to preach these sermons, and J. Halfleigh to preach the ordination sermon on Sabbath evening, as provided for. A Mutual Beneficial Society having been organized, a committee appointed for the purpose reported "Articles of Association," which were adopted. The object of the Society was to secure "a mutual benefit in case of death." The Eldership pledged itself to "use all legitimate means to bring about an amendment to the State Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in this Commonwealth, except for mechanical, medicinal and scientific purposes."

57th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—An enterprise of special interest to the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1885 was the auspicious opening of the Bookstore at No. 335 Market Street, Harrisburg, Pa., by the Board of Directors of the General Eldership. The event was announced in The Advocate of September 9, 1885: "To-day the first step in this enterprise is a reality"—that is, in the large enterprise of establishing a Publishing House and Book Room. It finally settled the question, mooted for forty years, of some western location for the "Printing Establishment." The Eldership naturally was enthusiastic in its "endorsement of said enterprise," and expressed "hearty approval," and promised "faithful support," and "recommended it to the favorable mention of the entire brotherhood." The Eldership held its session at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, October 21-27, 1885, the Opening Sermon being preached by D. S. Shoop, from Acts v. 20. Seventy ministers were enrolled, and fifty-two delegates and thirty-two messengers. F. L. Nicodemus was elected Speaker; H. E. Reeve, Stated Clerk; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfleigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. Forney, Sigler and Price were elected on the Standing Committee. The Eldership welcomed O. R. Bachelor, Free Baptist Mission of Bengal, India, as an advisory member, and instructed the "Committee on Arrangement to appoint him to preach the annual missionary sermon." The amount received for the year by the Missionary Fund was $2,551.41; Widows' Fund, $354.07; Contingent Fund, $211.64; Superannuated Fund, $219.61; Church Extension Fund, $183.44. The amount of $400.00 was received for "damages to the Chambersburg church property from the Western Maryland Railroad Company" on account of the laying of its tracks in close proximity to the Bethel. This money was ordered to be paid "into the Widows' Permanent Fund, as part repayment of a loan made by said Fund to the Board of Incorporation for the original purchase of the Chambersburg house" in 1859. P. H. Woodworth and Mrs. M. B. Woodworth, of the Indiana Eldership, were received as advisory members, the latter having gained considerable notoriety as an evangelist. Failing to secure sufficient means to erect a monument over the grave of Laverty, the money on hand was ordered to be paid to Mrs. Laverty. Sigler was appointed agent to receive funds for a monument in memory of Mackey. The Committee on Resolutions affirmed that the "changing of pastors in the Fall, and the unlimited Rule, are not proving satisfactory," and recommended a return to the old system of moving on the first of April, and re-establishing the three-year limit. The vote on the first question was: Yeas, 40; nays, 41. It was moved to indefinitely postpone the second question, on which the vote stood, yeas, 44; nays, 25. Yet the question was reopened, and on a direct vote to "restore the former limit of three years," the yeas were 37 and the nays, 36. But as it required a two-thirds vote to amend the Constitution, the resolution was lost. The obnoxious term "expelled," in the statistical table, was ordered changed, and "disfellowshipped" substituted. Co-operation with the Free Baptist Church in foreign mission work, as per action of the General Eldership in June, 1884, was endorsed, and each church was to be given the privilege to contribute toward this work. On temperance a moderate report was adopted, yet rejoicing over the "aroused public sentiment and the security of legislation which is a sure earnest of a grand and glorious victory in the near future all over our land." Unfermented wine was recommended to be used at the Lord's Supper. The Judiciary Committee had an unusual amount of work, and several ministers received adverse verdicts, one name being directed to be stricken from the Roll "as the Committee cannot approve a recommendation that he be given an honorable dismissal." A peculiar case was that of S. D. C. Jackson, who purposed removing to California, and desired a special "certificate of membership in this Eldership," as he had prospects of a call to some other Church. Beck, Forney and Sigler were named as a committee to prepare a certificate, who reported a form, stating Jackson's "good character and eminent qualifications as a minister," and giving "the consent of the Eldership to transfer his membership to any other ecclesiastical organization." The Eldership seemed dissatisfied with the disproportionate amount of time which was annually "given to merely secular affairs of the churches," and ordered, "that in the future a larger proportion of time shall be devoted to the preaching of the word." There were twenty-five stations, twenty circuits and one mission. The total membership of the churches was given at 5,308.

58th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—At the Eldership in 1885 there were no deaths reported in the ranks of the ministry; in 1886, two had answered the question, with James Hurdic,

"What is death
To him who merits it with an upright heart?
A quiet haven, where his shattered bark Harbors secure, till the rough storm is past."

One was the veteran Simon Fleegal, born January 9, 1808; converted about 1828, an elder of the first church of God organized in Maryland; ordained in 1843, and died December 1, 1885. He "was specially gifted with the power of exhortation; had always a pleasant word for every one; was of a cheerful and confiding nature," and a very acceptable and useful preacher. The other was John Hunter, a native of Ireland, who died July 16, 1886, having attained the age of 69 years. Raised in the Presbyterian faith, he began his ministerial life as a missionary. He preached experimental religion, and was cruelly persecuted. He came to America in 1847, where he became a member of the Christian Connection; but becoming acquainted with the Church of God, he began his labors as a member of the Eldership in 1864, and continued in the active work to the end of his life. He was specially adapted to revival work, and was often called "the eloquent Irishman." It is no disparagement to a body of people co-operating under an organic law somewhat frequently to amend its Constitution. Motion is the law, the essence of life. If organic life stands still it degenerates into inevitable machinery, and becomes mechanism. Rules and orders need to be frequently recast, except fundamentals, so that theories may be made to fit to new facts. Hence, amendments were frequently made to the Constitution, in the Rules and the working plans of the Eldership. The loose order of Elderships in earlier years gave way to new and flexible, but stringent, regulations. In 1886 several radical ideas were embodied in an amendment to Art. XVIII.: "That the relation of pastor and people established by authority of the Eldership shall not be severed except by previous consent of the Eldership, or of the Standing Committee." The Eldership in 1886 convened at Middletown, Dauphin county, October 6th, when the retiring Speaker, F. L. Nicodemus, delivered the Opening Sermon, from Rom. xv. 30-33. J. H. Esterline was chosen Speaker on the morning of the 7th; H. E. Reeve continued Stated Clerk; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haffleigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The Board of Missions elected had on it three laymen, while the other elective boards and committees, except the Board of Church Extension which had one layman on it, were all composed of ministers. The Evangelical Temperance Association addressed a communication to the Eldership, on which the Committee on Temperance took action, directing the Speaker and Stated Clerk to "sign a petition to the Legislature for submission to the voters of Pennsylvania of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholics as a beverage." It repudiated all forms of license, and affirmed that prohibition is the remedy for the evil of intemperance. Greater stress was laid on the duty of members of the classes in the Course of Studies to pursue the studies diligently, and appear before the Board for examination. The Board was instructed to meet the classes at noon of the day the Eldership convenes, and it was tacitly agreed that the personnel of the Board be changed less frequently. The applicants for license were five for license to preach, one being a United Brethren minister; also five for exhorters' licenses, one of them a sister, the latter being reported by the Committee with a negative recommendation, "because the East Pennsylvania Eldership does not license women to preach." This the Eldership approved. To prevent the constant loss of members of churches through removals without certificates, it was made the duty of pastors "to give them certificates, and to write to the minister in charge of the church into whose locality they move." The name "Bethel Church" was entirely repudiated, as "there is no scriptural authority for such title." "Annual fees" for clerks were fixed for the future. "Carefully prepared papers" were directed to "be furnished for the Eldership next year," by ministers named, on "The Interpretation and Authority of the Holy Scriptures," "The Divinity of Jesus Christ," "The Church and Its Mission," "Christ the Mediator," and "The Second Coming of Christ." A resolution was adopted, "that any person applying for a license to preach the gospel shall be required to pledge himself to abstain from the use of tobacco."

59th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The "papers" directed in 1886 to be prepared and read at the Eldership in 1887 were read "during the first half hour of each morning session." In the organization of the body the question of "life elders" was indirectly decided. J. B. Rae, of Saxton, presented himself as a delegate from the Saxton circuit, having been elected an elder, some years previous, of the church at Fairplay. His seat was contested on the ground that elders are elected at Saxton for one year, and not for an indefinite period, and that an elder of one church on a field is not by virtue of that fact an elder of any other church to which he might remove. He was seated, as well as the contestant, because the circuit was entitled to two delegates; but "with the definite proviso, that this act shall not be a precedent for the future." The retiring Speaker preached the Opening Sermon when the Eldership convened at Washington Borough, Lancaster county, October 5, 1887, from John xx. 21. Twenty-eight stations and twenty-three circuits were represented by as many pastors, and there were twenty-three other ministers enrolled. C. C. Bartels was chosen Speaker; H. E. Reeve, Stated Clerk; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The members of the boards and committees elected by the Eldership were all ministers, except one on the Board of Missions. Two ministers requested, and were granted, "letters of withdrawal from the Eldership." At this Eldership two brethren were ordained who have attained high places in the general body—F. W. McGuire and C. I. Brown. Formal ordination services were held on Saturday evening. C. D. Rishel's proposed Year Book received the endorsement of the Eldership. W. P. Winbigger, who had died at Uniontown, Md., shortly before returning to the East Pennsylvania Eldership, in October, 1886, was remembered, in suitable resolutions, "as a worthy brother, of no small talent; full of holy zeal for a righteous cause, and a bold defender of Bible truth." H. L. Banzhoff had succeeded in establishing a church in Hollidaysburg, Blair county, and the Eldership received both pastor and church, and made Hollidaysburg a station. While the holding of a camp-meeting at William's Grove, where the annual Grangers' Picnics were held, was disapproved. C. H. Forney, J. M. Carvell, George Sigler, H. N. Bowman and Samuel Knisley were appointed a committee "to consider the advisability of holding a reunion of the brotherhood, at such time and place as it may deem proper, during next Summer." A new and more complete form of statistical blanks was reported by a committee, and was approved.

60th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—While the Eldership in 1887 named Roaring Spring, Blair county, as the place for holding the session in 1888, the body convened at Maytown, Lancaster county, October 3rd, when C. C. Bartels delivered the Opening Sermon, from Matt. xxviii. 19. The following morning, the Eldership being constituted, J. M. Speese was elected Speaker; H. E. Reeve continued Stated Clerk; B. F. Beck was chosen Transcribing Clerk; J. Haisleigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The "papers" ordered to be prepared on doctrinal subjects were read at different sittings. The Standing Committee, Forney, Carvell and Sigler, who were re-elected, during the year had to deal with a matter vitally affecting the general polity of the Church. The General Eldership Constitution, Art. XXIX. of the Constitution of 1885, prohibits any "members of one Eldership from removing into the territory of another Eldership, or laboring within its territory, without becoming a member of said Eldership." Mrs. Woodworth, without becoming a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and without the consent of its constituted authorities, came within its territory and held evangelistic services with several churches. The Standing Committee, believing that such meetings would prove seriously detrimental to the churches and the peace and harmony of the Eldership, through her advocacy of trances, faith-healing and other peculiar views, ordered her to desist from these labors and leave the territory of the Eldership. It directed the Bethel at Chambersburg to be closed against her. It also formulated charges against her, and laid them before the Eldership of which she was a member. When the Committee reported, these actions provoked a lengthy discussion, but they were "unanimously approved." The Bald Hills Bethel property, York county, and the lots for a house of worship at Renova, Clinton county, were directed to be sold. J. Ross, who died during the Eldership year, made a bequest to the Eldership, which was ordered to be paid into the Superannuated Fund. He had reached the age of 79 years, having been a minister of the Eldership since 1856. "His Christian character was above reproach." Two other ministers, who had lived to a ripe old age, had heard the voice.

"I make you blessed—
I call you home to a glorious rest!"

These were Henry Borgner and John Tucker. The former was a German preacher, licensed in 1859, but at the time of his death he was a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. He died in the 66th year of his age. "He was a good and faithful man, and exerted a healthful influence in the community where he lived." Tucker had reached the age of 86 years. He had been a minister in the Baptist Church, but became a member of the Eldership in 1840. "He was a pious and godly man, and a strong believer in the personal, pre-millennial advent of Christ." All the churches were "requested to organize missionary societies at once." Extreme action was taken on temperance, recommending the "laying aside of all sectarian and political prejudices, and unite in one solid compact. . . . and either demand of existing political parties further legislation, or by constituting a party whose ultimate end shall be the entire prohibition of the liquor traffic." On the state of religion the Committee reported "that it is not satisfactory. There is much worldly conformity, powerless profession, cold formality and attachment to forms and outward ceremony." An additional incentive to the churches to pay larger salaries was adopted. The Speaker was directed to inquire of each delegate, after the pastor's report, "the amount of salary paid, and if the full amount has been paid." And "churches were requested to set a stipulated salary, and report the same to the Stationing Committee." There were twenty-six stations and twenty-five circuits. The Stated Clerk, elected for an indefinite period, resigned, and I. A. MacDannald was elected. He had been licensed in 1885; was the son of a minister, of whom, in 1886, the Examining Committee reported that he "has proved himself a good student, and has completed the course with credit to himself and satisfaction to the Committee."

61st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—A new enterprise was set on foot during the sixty-first session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. "A communication was received from C. H. Forney in regard to an East Pennsylvania Eldership Beneficiary Fund," on which a committee was appointed for whose report a special order was made. It consisted of C. H. Forney, Geo. Sigler, J. M. Carvell, D. M. Bare, G. W. Getz and W. J. Grissinger, which reported favorably. The Board of Education was made the custodian of the Fund, the "Fund to be raised by donations, bequests, and in extraordinary emergencies by special collections." The unusual coincidence of the death of the Speaker marked this Eldership. J. M. Speece had died July 19, 1889, aged 41 years. He had been licensed in 1870. "He was a good preacher, kind, affable and courteous, and deserved the esteem of all." On the Roll of Death with his name was engraved that of P. Stanton, a colored minister, licensed in 1835. "As a preacher he was courteous, prudent and uncompromising, an acknowledged leader among the people of his own race." The session was held in the Fourth Street Bethel, Harrisburg, beginning October 2, 1889, when A. H. Long, appointed by the Standing Committee, preached the Opening Sermon, from I. Cor. i. 23. Twenty-six stations and as many circuits were on the list, and seventy-two ministers and fifty-seven delegates were enrolled when the Eldership was constituted by the new Stated Clerk. An organization was effected by the election of C. H. Forney, Speaker; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haffelgh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. An innovation by the Speaker was the placing of every minister and delegate present on some committee. Williamsport, Lycoming county, with J. A. Brown (colored), pastor, was one of the fields of labor. The Treasurer's Report indicated a fair condition of the finances. There were $1,594.81 received into the Mission Fund; $422.82, into the Widows' Fund; $374.05, into the Superannuated Fund; $104.34, into the Church Extension Fund; $149.32, into the C. E. Contingent Fund; $478.94, into the General Eldership Missionary Fund. Among the advisory members were nearly all the pastors of Harrisburg Churches, including S. C. Swallow, D. D., late candidate for President of the United States on the Prohibition ticket; J. A. Saxton, of the Maryland and Virginia Eldership; J. A. Shuler, Illinois, for some years Treasurer of the General Eldership, and W. J. Schaner, Illinois Eldership, who brought, with him his transfer. There was a prevalent feeling that "there is not that degree of prosperity among the churches that is desired," and so the Eldership adopted a resolution offered by Sigler, "that the third Sunday in December be set apart as a day of special prayer to God for his blessing upon the churches, and for an increase of earnest men for the ministry." Strong resolutions favoring prohibition and endorsing the W. C. T. U. were passed. The former order, to have a number of doctrinal essays prepared and read before the body, was changed so that the Standing Committee would "appoint from time to time a man to preach a doctrinal sermon during the session of the Eldership." The loss to the Church of children of Church families was deplored, and the "Eldership earnestly urged upon the brotherhood to put forth their earnest endeavors to have all their children saved to the Church." A general missionary was provided for, "to open new appointments and assist in holding protracted meetings." So varied and numerous were the preambles and resolutions of the Committee on Resolutions, that nearly one-fourth of them were tabled, one series being a denunciation in most vigorous language of "bands of outlaws, known as 'Regulators' and Roughs, who tortured and murdered innocent and inoffensive negroes in Louisiana, and imperiled the lives of several ministers in Tennessee while on their way to the National Colored Baptist Convention at Indianapolis, Ind." A uniform course of studies for ministers of all the Elderships was made a subject of instructions of the delegates to the General Eldership. Also to have the representation in the General Eldership reduced to one for every twenty ministers.

62nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—With the sixty-second East Pennsylvania Eldership said body began to publish its Minutes in pamphlet form, as per action taken on the report of a committee on the subject. With this first Journal thus published the Opening Sermon delivered by the retiring Speaker, C. H. Forney, was also published in full. The new Speaker, W. J. Grissinger, and B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Halfelgh, Financial Clerk, were not elected until after the Committee on Printing the Journal was provided for, and the Treasurer's Report had been made. Ira A. MacDannald was Stated Clerk. The Eldership held its session at Mechanicsburg, from October 2-7, 1890. The Eldership consisted of 74 ministers and 90 delegates and messengers. The Treasurer's Report showed the following amounts received during the year by the various Funds: Missionary, $1,743.55; Widows', $453.54; Contingent, $222.87; Superannuated, $255.32; Church Extension, $135.23; General Eldership Contingent, $54.47; Sinking, $450.00. Forney, Sigler and Carvell were elected as the Standing Committee. The Examining Committee was made an elective committee. Considerable friction developed on account of the adoption of the following: "Resolved, That we are not fully satisfied with some actions of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership, and ask that the objectional features in past actions be obviated in the future, to the end that our efforts to collect needed funds may not be hindered." The Board of Missions resented this, and the controversy continued for several years. The "indifference manifested in our Eldership Missionary Meetings" is seen in the amount raised on Friday evening, after "an earnest missionary sermon by B. F. Beck—$40.81." The Board of Missions consisted of J. M. Carvell, C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop, J. H. Esterline, Geo. Sigler, Geo. W. Getz, B. F. Beck, C. C. Bartels, M. M. Foose. The Eldership's right to overrule actions of a local church was exercised in the case of the Saxton church, where a special election for church officers was ordered, at which the Chairman of the Standing Committee was directed to preside. Also in the case of the church at Shepherdstown, where names erased from the Church Record were directed to be restored, and the council "directed to act in regular order in all cases in dismissing members to other churches." It decided that "the minister of a church or churches is a member of the Board of Elders, and as such he has the rights and privileges of an elder; and that in the ruling of the church, the reception and disciplining of members, and in transferring members from one church to another, he has only equal powers with other elders."

A resolution was adopted, declaring "that it is the moral sense of this Eldership that electioneering and combinations of all kinds in the Eldership are wrong and injurious." Emphasis was laid on the order of attending to the ordinances. In "the apostolic order" Christian baptism comes first, "and the importance of making this order prominent in the teaching and practice of ministers" was urged upon all. The "alarming indifference manifested in regard to missions" was deplored. "Unity and co-operation" were made the subject of an earnest resolution. There were twenty-seven stations and twenty-four circuits. And while no appointments are designated as "missions," thirteen received appropriations out of the Missionary Fund, from $15.00 to $125.00. Rules were reported by the Board of Education, governing appropriations out of the Beneficiary Educational Fund. The money in this fund was directed to be "invested in good interest-bearing securities, in real estate, stocks, bonds, or scholarships, or loans on first mortgages." A form of bequests to the Fund was also approved. The new Board consisted of C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop, B. F. Beck, C. I. Brown, J. M. Carvell.

63rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The session of the Eldership held at Altoona, Blair county, Pa., October 7 to 13, 1891, had a few exceptional incidents. President Latchaw, of Findlay College, was an advisory member, and by invitation spoke on the Report of the Committee on Education. By special action, laymen were placed on the Auditing Committee. The Constitution was amended in several Articles which had remained undisturbed for many years. One of these related to "messengers." The Eldership was becoming so large that a sentiment developed against "messengers," provided for in Art. II. They were also considered wholly unnecessary, as each charge was entitled to a delegate for the pastor and for each local minister living on the field. Letters to the number of eighty-six were also sent to the Eldership this year, representing the wishes of the fields. And so the provision for "messengers" was "stricken out." The echo of the discussion of "the Stationing Committee" was heard in a proposed amendment to the Constitution providing that said Committee "shall not have the power to sever the relations between pastor and people when harmony prevails." Another amendment to this Article, of which notice was given, proposed that all ministers shall be subject to change at the end of any one year, but may be reappointed for four consecutive years. The Opening Sermon was preached on Wednesday evening, by W. J. Grissinger. Theme:—"The Preacher's Intimacy With Christ." Text:—John xiii. 23. The presiding officer of the Eldership was J. W. Miller; Stated Clerk, Ira A. MacDannald; Transcribing Clerk, B. F. Beck; Financial Clerk, J. Haifeigh, and Treasurer, S. Knisley. The Eldership took favorable action on "tithing," affirming it to be "in accordance with the word of God, and that it should be so taught and practiced within the bounds of this Eldership." A unanimous protest against the keeping open the gates of the World's Fair at Chicago, in 1893, was adopted, and a copy of the resolution ordered to be sent to the President of the World's Fair Commission. It was proposed to have a "Children's Missionary Day;" but on account of its possible interference with Children's College Day it was made optional. The death of one minister was duly memorialized. Isaiah T. Brown, a colored man, "loved by his people, a zealous young man, whose labors were not in vain," "fell on the victor's field." The Christian Endeavor Society was "recommended to pastors of churches within the body as being helpful in bringing souls to Christ." A bequest of $1,000.00 to the Church "by Sister Ridenower, of Chambersburg, was acknowledged, and it was ordered to be paid into the Beneficiary Educational Fund. The Bethel at Paradise, Clearfield county, was ordered to be sold, with a view of building a new Bethel in West Clearfield. The pressing needs of Findlay College for funds were fully realized, and President Latchaw was requested in person to bring them before the churches of the Eldership. The ministers were "urged to prepare the way for him, and to render him all necessary assistance." The appointments consisted of twenty-nine stations and twenty-three circuits. While no appointments are classed as missions, fifteen had received appropriations from the Board of Missions the previous year. The total amount of missionary money reported by the Treasurer was $1,732.43. The "State of religion within the bounds of the Eldership," the Committee reported, "is quite encouraging. More accessions to the Church have been reported this year than last year." The ministers were exhorted "to devote their time, their strength, their talents to this one thing, viz.: The saving of souls."

64th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1892 adopted a new rule "to facilitate and expedite the business." It made the election of delegates to the General Eldership in 1893 a special order. It provided that no sitting should be held on Friday afternoon; but that all the committees were to meet and prepare their reports, and the Board of Missions was to hold a meeting to finish its work. The session was held at Lancaster city, from October 5th to 12th. G. Sigler was elected Speaker; B. F. Beck, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfieigh, Financial Clerk, and Samuel Knisley, Treasurer. Dr. J. J. Summerbell, of the Christian Church, was given permission to present "the greetings of the American Christian Convention." The committee to "prepare a suitable memorial in reference to the overtures "which he presented to this body," reported that the "Eldership cordially reciprocates the generous overtures so fittingly presented," and "requested the Eldership to send a Commissioner to represent this body at the next meeting of the Christian Convention." B. F. Beck was named as the fraternal delegate. The Eldership decided that a local minister can not serve "as a delegate from a local church." On temperance the Eldership declared "that all sanction of the liquor traffic, by high license or low license, by ballot or by indifference, is a great sin." The state of religion was represented as revealing "the lamentable fact that there is a lack of deep and ardent piety among us as a people; a growing conformity to the amusements of the world; an increasing spiritual apathy and indifference, and a marked neglect of the divinely appointed means of grace." "Days of fasting, confession, humiliation and prayer on all the charges within the bounds of this Eldership, "were recommended." The Eldership mourned the death, during the year, of D. W. Keefer, for the entire body felt that "over our hearts and over our lives" a deep shadow had fallen. His labors were limited to a few years, as he was ordained in 1886. He was a faithful preacher of Christ, and always "endeared himself to his people." The change of sentiment in the Eldership on several constitutional questions was strikingly evidenced by the votes on three pending amendments. The first was on "changing ministers at the end of four years." The vote stood: Ayes, 13; nays, 54." On "discontinuing the sending of messengers" the vote stood: Ayes, 41; nays, 36. On "vesting in the churches and ministers the power of stationing preachers," the vote was: Ayes, 32; nays, 49. An analysis of the vote shows that of the 32 aye votes 24 were by ministers and 8 by laymen; of the 49 nay votes, 32 were by ministers, and 17 by laymen. However, the proposition to do away with the Stationing Committee was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Constitution, which consisted of C. H. Forney, J. M. Carvell, D. S. Shoop, B. F. Beck and George Sigler. Action was taken "recommending the appointment of commissioners by different nations which shall constitute a Supreme Council or High Court, to which shall be referred all differences or difficulties existing or arising between nations for adjudication, without resort to war." Opposition was expressed against boards of the General Eldership employing any of their members in salaried positions. The College was strongly endorsed, and the President's services commended; but there was an implied conviction that there was lacking at the College "a definite Church sentiment," which the body positively favored. The Standing Committee was empowered, by amendment to Art. x. of the Constitution, "to nominate persons to fill vacancies on the Board of Trustees of Findlay College." An effort was made to restrict membership of any one person to not exceeding three boards or committees. The matter was referred to the Revision Committee. The Eldership placed itself on record against annual licenses by instructing its delegates to the General Eldership to vote for life certificates. The question of holding "an Eldership camp-meeting" was placed in the hands of a committee of five to report in 1893.

65th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Great changes occurred during the year, so that when the Eldership met at Shippensburg, October 4, 1893, instead of the presence at its session of the first President of Findlay College, W. N. Yates, Acting President, was received as an advisory member, and "the Eldership accorded to him an expression of entire confidence in his qualifications and adaptation to his responsible vocation." Continuing Ira A. MacDannald as Stated Clerk, the Eldership made choice of C. D. Rishel for Speaker; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfieigh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The revised Constitution was discussed during four sittings. The Article changing the title of the body to "East Pennsylvania Association of churches of God" was adopted by a vote of ayes, 44; nays, 13. Two Articles are recorded as "defeated," though the vote on Art. viii. is given as, "yeas, 40; nays, 28." But the opposition united on the final vote, and "the Constitution as a whole was rejected by the following vote: Yeas, 18; nays, 52." The funds of the Eldership were in satisfactory condition, the Treasurer's Report showing Missionary Fund, $1,696.73; Widows', $567.31; Contingent, $158.96; Superannuated, $347.16; Church Extension, $609.95; General Eldership Contingent, $83.52; Sinking, $100.00; General Eldership Mission, $398.03; G. E. Delegate, $281.93; Foreign Mission, $37.11. Three men, "with tidings of salvation shod," dropped out of the ministerial ranks during the year. J. M. Stouffer, licensed in 1856, died January 25, 1893, "an excellent helper of his pastor," as he "labored almost exclusively as a local preacher." Thomas Still, ordained in 1861, died August, 1893; "a successful laborer, and possessed the happy faculty of endearing himself to the people he served." John W. Swank was received from another Church in 1875, died shortly before the Eldership, at the time being Chaplain of the Lancaster County Almshouse and Prison. "His memory survives." The Eldership disclaimed all authority "to influence the vote of any member or church on any political question, or in favor of any political party." Yet it expressed the belief that "It is not only the duty of every Christian to abstain from the use of intoxicating drink, but also to vote always and only for men and measures which openly favor the vigorous enforcement of present laws and the enactment of laws prohibiting the sale and manufacture of alcoholic beverages." The committee created the year previous reported negatively on the matter of holding an Eldership camp-meeting. A much more elaborate course of studies was reported by the Revision Committee, which was adopted. It provided for an "Entrance Course" of four branches; a Three Years' Pre-Licentiate Course, of five and six branches in each year, and a Four Years' Post-Licentiate Course, with five and six studies in each year. The Stationing Committee, according to a new Rule, reported one sitting before the final one. There were 32 stations, and 23 circuits. Very positive resolutions were adopted against whatever "tended toward the secularization of the Christian Sabbath;" advising "ministers and church members to discountenance the Sunday paper, excursions of all kinds, traveling on the railroads on Sunday, as well as all forms of Sunday desecration."

66th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—A new and pleasant incident at the first sitting of the Eldership at Middletown, Dauphin county, October 8, 1894, was the introduction to the body, by the pastor, C. I. Behney, of the members of the Middletown Ministerial Association. Through its Secretary, Rev. J. H. Groff, of the Presbyterian Church, a series of resolutions was presented, "extending most heartily the fraternal greetings to the Eldership of the Church of God, and bidding them welcome to the town." H. E. Reeve was elected Speaker; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haffey, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The enrollment showed that the membership consisted of 55 active ministers, 50 delegates, 16 local ministers, 4 superannuated, 1 general evangelist, 1 editor of The Advocate. C. H. Grove was received on Transfer from the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and J. A. Staub from the Maryland and Virginia Eldership. Seven applicants for licence were also received.

During the year $1,356.32 was paid out of the treasury for missionary purposes. In anticipation of a change of place for the holding of the General Eldership in 1896, a Petition to the Executive Board was adopted, asking that Harrisburg be selected. Advancement was reported to have been made during the year "in every department of Church work. We believe that there are more consecrated, self-denying, active Christian workers among us at the present time than there have been at any former period in our history." During the year "the reaping angel has thrust in his sharp sickle, and three of our number have been gathered home." It was a sad, dark sitting at which the Committee on Obituaries in mellowed tones recounted the virtues of C. H. Blough, Henry Hackenberger and J. M. Carvell. Blough was licensed in 1889; died June 26, 1894, aged nearly 36 years, and "was an active, energetic minister and pastor." Hackenberger was ordained in 1870; died June 9, 1894, aged a few days less than 76 years. Carvell was received into the Eldership in 1866, and died September 1, 1894, aged 51 years. He "was a diligent student, as well as minister and pastor; a faithful, earnest preacher of the gospel and an exemplary Christian in all life's varied relations." A communication "from Rev. G. W. Reed, United Presbyterian, touching the Sabbath question" was acted upon, by declaring that a day of rest "is a fundamental law in the divine government;" that our best interests demand "rest from all secular employment, except acts of mercy and necessity, and devoting the day to the culture of our spiritual natures." But "inflicting punishment upon persons who from honest religious convictions prefer to keep the seventh day instead of the first" was disapproved. The question of the "verbal inspiration of the Scriptures" was by special action limited to one hour. After the discussion the Resolution affirming verbal inspiration was "indefinitely postponed." The Eldership "most heartily approved of the action of the Incorporate Board" in assuming $5,500 of the $24,000 debt resting on the College, and which had "threatened its destruction as a Church school." There was a failure on the part "of a number of ministers and churches to observe Children's College Day," and "the duty and necessity of observing said day" was emphatically set forth.

67th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The sale of church properties was always an unpleasant item of business for the Eldership, and action was at times too long delayed to dispose of them to advantage. The Board of Incorporation had the following properties to sell in 1894-5: At Crete, and at Barada, Neb., and at Paradise, Clearfield county, Pa. On October 2, 1895, the Eldership met at Landisburg, Perry county. The Opening Sermon was delivered by H. E. Reeve, from Zech. xii. 1. Theme: "Burden of the word of the Lord." The preacher received the compliment of a request "to hand the sermon to the Editor of The Advocate for publication." Officers were chosen, as follows: J. T. Fleegal, Speaker; F. L. Nicodemus, Transcribing Clerk; J. Haffeligh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. The enrollment showed a membership of seventy-seven ministers, and seventy-one delegates and messengers. Being the year before the meeting of the General Eldership, arrangements were made at the first sitting for the election of delegates to said body, and "immediately thereafter, the questions handed down by the General Eldership shall be taken up and discussed." Accordingly, on Friday afternoon the question of a change of Eldership titles was taken up, when C. H. Forney introduced resolutions as the basis for discussion and action which affirmed, that the term "church of God" is used in two senses, the one to designate all true believers in the world, sometimes called the universal or invisible church, and the other, to designate a local body of Christians organized according to the New Testament. Also that the use of the term "Church of God" in a provincial, national or denominational sense is discordant with the New Testament; that the term as it occurs in the title of this Eldership is not according to New Testament usage, and that it should be changed to "churches." Also that the body of men in each local church known as "elders" is the Eldership of that church, and that there is "no other body in the New Testament called an Eldership, and that what we call an Eldership is not known, and hence not so called, in the New Testament. Thus the conclusion was reached that "the Eldership of the Church of God" should be called "Association of churches of God." These resolutions were adopted by a vote of ayes, 39; nays, 37. The Eldership also voted in favor of Life Ordination, and of Certificates of Ordination in lieu of "Preachers' Licenses." To revive the Ministerial Association a committee, consisting of C. H. Grove, C. I. Brown, G. Sigler, J. W. Deshong and O. E. Houston, was appointed. On temperance it was determined as "the sense of this body, that when a Christian exercises the right of suffrage he should vote for men and parties who are openly pledged in favor of the absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic." The posture in public prayer was the subject of action, in which it was declared that "the most appropriate and scriptural attitude is that of deep humiliation," and, hence, the Eldership disapproved of any other than the kneeling posture, and "urged upon all ministers and elders the duty of guarding against any innovations which will change this appropriate custom to any other posture in public worship." The "slow progress" of the Church was recognized, and it was recommended that "pastors and churches inquire into the causes and remove them as far as it may be in their power," and to "pray earnestly for the reviving, sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit." The total membership is given as 6,492.

68th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—On its Journals the East Pennsylvania Eldership does not, as a rule, distinguish its colored ministers and churches from the others. The Roll of ministers and delegates in 1896 had on it the names of three colored ministers and five churches; but the fact is nowhere indicated. And the ministers enjoyed a perfect parity of rank and privileges. The session of 1896 was held at Elizabethtown, Lancaster county, from October 7th to 13th. It had the gratification of welcoming to a seat as an advisory member, Clara Landes, shortly to sail as missionary to India. She was given the privilege "to address the Eldership in its official capacity," and one evening was set apart for her to make a public address. The Opening Sermon was preached by J. T. Fleegal, from I. Cor. iii. 11. Theme: "Christ the Foundation and Chief Corner-stone of the Church." The number of appointments was fifty-six, served by as many pastors. There were also thirteen "local ministers," and four superannuated. The Eldership was organized by electing the following officers: Speaker, J. W. Deshong; W. J. Schaner, continued Stated Clerk; C. H. Grove, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfeligh, Financial Clerk, and Samuel Knisley, Treasurer. A fund of $100.00 was raised to secure a home in an institution for incurables at Philadelphia for W. Sanborn, a superannuated minister. The Eldership at this time had eight different Funds, all in fair condition. The receipts during the year were $1,387.38, Missionary money; $467.77, Widows' Fund; $90.42, Contingent Fund; $211.39, Superannuated Fund; $500.00, Church Extension Fund; $546.72, General Eldership Missionary Fund. The Memorial Services were more than ordinarily impressive, as two comparatively young ministers had gone to "inherit some holier cause, some vaster trust." These were F. L. Nicodemus, ordained in 1869, and M. M. Foose, in 1884. Strong resolutions were adopted, which gave suitable expression to the deep sense of loss sustained in their death. The standard of activity and attainment reached by these men is worthy of study and emulation by aspiring young ministers. Arrangements were at once made to raise money from the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor for the purpose of erecting a monument over the grave of Foose, as he had been one of the most active promoters of the organization. Action on the temperance question was embodied in more moderate terms, but it favored prohibition in that it declared that our "aims and our efforts should be unceasingly directed toward the abolishing of the liquor traffic, until our State is free, and we can touch hands with Maine and rejoice with Iowa and all other States which are uniting in one common brotherhood of States in shaking themselves free from this monster evil." Increased stimulus was given the missionary work of the Eldership and its Woman's Missionary Society by the prospective opening of a mission field in India. Pastors were directed "to present the subject of missions to the churches by sermons or otherwise as frequently as possible, and to assist in organizing societies" and raising funds for home and for foreign mission work. The Eldership held that "camp-meetings in which Sunday trafficking, railroad excursions and the toll system are conspicuous features, are not in harmony with the true idea of worship, and are generally more derogatory than helpful to the cause of the Christian religion." It also placed its seal of condemnation "on the transformation of the pulpit into a stage, and the church of God into a play-house in which secular and unchristian performances are given." It also "denounced the 'Santa Claus' farce and like exhibitions as subversive of the true spirit of worship, and destructive of the spirituality of the Church." The deed of conveyance of a fine grove in Huntingdon county was accepted, the grove to be used as a permanent camp ground.

69th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—"The proper time to do a thing is now," is an old aphorism. Has it been improved by the sage remark of a more recent age: "Whatever you are going to do, do it yesterday?" The Stationing Committee in 1896 reached a compromise on the appointments to two charges, by which a certain minister was to be appointed to a given station in 1897. The Committee in 1897 failed to do this, which resulted in the calling of an extraordinary session four weeks after the regular annual session closed, and in complications and antagonisms which required years to adjust and tranquilize. Both the regular and the extraordinary sessions were held at Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county. The former convened October 7, 1897, the Opening Sermon having been delivered the previous evening by J. W. Deshong, from Jer. xxxi. 7. C. I. Behney was elected Speaker. W. J. Schaner, who had been elected Stated Clerk at the close of the session of 1895, was continued without re-election, according to the provision of the Constitution; C. H. Grove, Transcribing Clerk; J. Halfeligh, Financial Clerk, and S. Knisley, Treasurer. A pleasant incident occurred on Saturday, when, upon invitation of the President of Irving College, the Eldership visited said institution in a body. Much time was given to the discussion of the report of the Committee on Revision of the Constitution, said report involving the discontinuance of the Stationing Committee, and the substitution of the call system. The result was the adoption of a compromise proposition, whereby the "question was postponed, and the matter ordered to be sent down to the churches for consideration and action." This action was to be reported in 1898, and "the delegates shall be instructed to vote in harmony with the action of the churches, and the matter shall be decided by popular vote." The amendments were to strike out of Art. viii. the words "Stationing Committee," and to replace Articles xiii. and xiv. with two others, vesting in the churches themselves the power to secure ministers; denying to the Eldership the power to dissolve the relation of pastor and church except by their previous agreement, and making "the Standing Committee an Advisory Board to which churches having no ministers, and ministers having no charges, may apply, and mutual arrangements may be made between churches and preachers." The month of September, 1898, was designated as the time when the churches shall vote on the questions submitted, and the ballots were to be printed respectively "For the Eldership," and "For the Churches." A majority of the former ballots would mean that the existing system should continue; a majority of the latter, that the call system should be adopted. No pastor was permitted to "seek to influence the vote of any church" on the subject. The Board of Incorporation was empowered to sell the Hollidaysburg church property. The state of religion throughout the Eldership was very satisfactory. There was "evident growth in membership," "new houses of worship were erected, and others remodeled and repaired," "ministers and churches are alive and zealous," and "the labors of the brethren on the various stations and circuits have been graciously blessed." After a long life of usefulness, one member of the body, J. W. Collins, "was called from labor to reward" during the year. G. W. Seilhammer, who had removed to the Maryland Eldership, and who died during the year, was also "called home to wait the final gathering of the faithful." Affecting memorial services were held. There were one hundred and thirty-two organized churches in the Eldership, and one hundred and seventeen houses of worship.

The call for the extraordinary session of the Eldership, which convened at Mechanicsburg, November 18, 1897, was issued by the President upon "petition signed by fifty-three ministers and delegates of the regular session of October, 1897." The call, quoting the language of the petition, stated that the Eldership had failed to supply Fourth Street Church, Harrisburg, with a pastor, and that after having exhausted all its powers under the Constitution, the Standing Committee was unable to do so, and, hence the Eldership is reconvened for that purpose. All the committees of the regular session were revived, except the Stationing Committee, which at the regular session consisted of C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop, G. Sigler, C. I. Brown, J. W. Deshong, J. H. Esterline and C. C. Bartels, was changed by a regular election to the following: C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop, C. I. Brown, F. W. McGuire, C. H. Grove, J. T. Fleegeal and H. Whitaker. This committee made three changes in the report of the Committee at the regular session, and approved six made by the Standing Committee. It also adopted, and handed down to the churches a proposition to re-establish a time-limit for pastors, making it 3, 4 or 5 years as the vote might result. The referendum was thus incorporated again in the practice of the Eldership.

70th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Agreeably to the action of the Eldership in 1897, the vote on the proposed amendments to the Constitution by the churches was taken in September, 1898. The result was as follows: "For the churches," 641; "for the Eldership," 2,462. The former meant "the settled pastorate; the latter, the continuation of the system of appointment of pastors by the Eldership. On the time-limit the vote was: "Limit," 1,454; "no limit," 1,511. On the length of the pastoral term the vote stood: Three years, 857; four years, 340; five years, 865. The question of "messengers" from churches to the Eldership was decided in the negative by the following vote: Yes, 1,308; no, 1,660. On the method of voting for pastors the following was submitted: "An annual vote for pastor shall be taken in each church, but it shall be by the representatives known as the church council, said action to be submitted to the church at a congregational meeting for approval." The vote was: Yes, 1,269; no, 1,564. Less than half of the reported number of church members voted on any one of these questions; but they were thus finally settled, and all agitation ceased. The Eldership which computed the ballots convened at Saxton, Bedford county, October 13, 1898. The previous evening the Opening Sermon was delivered by C. I. Behney, from II. Tim. iv. 2. Theme—"Preaching the Word." Officers were chosen as follows: President, F. W. McGuire; C. H. Grove, Transcribing Clerk, and Samuel Knisley, Financial Clerk. After the Treasurer's Report was audited Knisley was re-elected Treasurer. One of the aged ministers of the Eldership mysteriously "disappeared during the year"—S. Spurrier—and the matter was placed in the hands of a committee, instructed to "make all possible investigation concerning his case." The Eldership felt the need of practicing economy in its contingent expenses, and a reduction in sundry expenses was ordered. The bars were put up against the incoming of illiterate ministers on transfers from other Elderships, by "requiring them to appear before the Board of Education and pass a satisfactory examination under the same rules that govern our own men." Action was taken to "apportion the Eldership funds to be raised among the churches in the same manner and proportionate amounts as the missionary money is now apportioned." The Eldership deeply mourned the tragic death of one of its younger members, and the passing away of a beloved minister who reached the final goal and received his passport to life at a good old age. S. G. Corbin "met with a shocking and sudden death in a wreck at Altoona, December 20, 1897." He was ordained in 1883, but had retired from the active ministry some six years prior to his death. J. B. Lockwood died September 3, 1898. While he was only eleven years a member of the Eldership, he had been a minister of another body for a number of years. The Eldership was conservative in its deliverance on temperance, favoring local option by "recognizing the possibility of extending the work of prohibition into the different towns and communities and counties until the whole State is freed from the rum curse." But it insisted on "personal prohibition on the part of the believer." The delegates to the General Eldership were "instructed to use their influence to have the Board of Missions of the General Eldership open mission work in one or more of our larger eastern cities." Also to "vote as a unit for a change in the form of The Church Advocate," and against having published otherwise than in a condensed form the minutes of Elderships, church societies and church meetings. The body rejoiced in the encouraging work of the Woman's Missionary Society, "the grand and good work" of the Y. P. S. C. E.; yet regretted "that the Church as a whole is not meeting fully her high calling and obligations."

71st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—During the Winter of 1898-9 the Field Agent of the Eldership, C. I. Brown, with the active co-operation of the Treasurer, C. H. Forney, and pastors and trustees of the College, succeeded in raising enough money to pay in full, principal and interest, the obligation of the Eldership of $5,500 toward the debt of said institution of $24,000, or $25,000, in 1894. "The entire Eldership rejoiced in the accomplishment of a purpose which means more than any other single act for itself and for Findlay College within the past fifteen years." "As we are giving more we are rejoicing more." Under such auspices the Eldership met in Washington Borough, Lancaster county, October 5, 1899, F. W. McGuire having preached the Opening Sermon the evening before, from Acts xxiv. 14, 15. Theme—"Paul's Confession." The Eldership as constituted by the Stated Clerk consisted of 51 stations, with as many pastors and an equal number of delegates, and 26 other ministers. C. I. Brown was elected President; C. H. Grove, Transcribing Clerk; Samuel Knisley, Financial Clerk, and also Treasurer. Three ministers during the year "departed in the triumphs of the faith for which they had long contended." B. F. Beck died March 20, 1899; J. Hainfeigh, July 26, 1899, and William Sanborn, November 10, 1898. The Eldership expressed its "admiration for the character of these brethren, and rejoiced in the excellencies which adorned their lives, and will hold them up as patterns for imitation." While there are intimations in the Minutes of some internal troubles, the fraternal, co-operative disposition of the ministers and delegates proved as oil upon the troubled waters. The Funds were in gratifying condition. Missionary Fund, $1,944.84; Widows' Fund, $862.92; Contingent Fund, $140.50; Superannuated Fund, $426.30; Church Extension Fund, $272.28; General Eldership Missionary Fund, $610.31; Y. P. S. C. E. Church Extension Fund, $196.62. The sum of $114.68 was raised for the Foose Monument Fund. All bequests to the Eldership were ordered to be placed in "Permanent Funds, to be held sacred as such, and invested, and only the interest thereof to be annually used." The religious condition of the churches was so favorable that the Eldership "acknowledged with deepest gratitude to God the favor and measure of success which he has given in the accessions made both to the ministry of this body and to the churches, and an increase in interest in the Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor work." The committee, however, "recognized the great and essential need of the 'fulness of the Holy Spirit' dwelling in the heart, greater humility, more earnest prayer and a deeper sense of that co-operation taught in God's word and embodied in our Constitution." The number of stations was thirty-three; circuits, twenty. Apportionments were made to the fields of labor for six different Funds aggregating $3,169.00. There were seventeen parsonages, one hundred and seven houses of worship and one hundred and twenty-seven regular preaching places. Total membership, 6,740.

72nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—In constituting the Eldership in 1900 the enrollment consisted of fifty-three pastors, three superannuated and seventeen local ministers, and fifty-seven delegates, a total of one hundred and thirty. The session was held with the Green Street Church, Harrisburg, where the Opening Sermon was preached on the evening of October 3rd, by C. I. Brown, from Ps. xvi. 8—"The Conscious Presence of God." Balloting for officers resulted in the election of I. A. MacDannald, President; C. H. Grove, Transcribing Clerk; Samuel Knisley, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. The Chairman of the Standing Committee returned to the Eldership the Certificates of Ordination of four ministers, which were annulled, and one other minister was requested to return his Certificate. The Report of the Treasurer showed the following balances: Missionary Fund, $394.42; Widows' Fund, $450.56; Contingent Fund, due Treasurer, $80.45; Superannuated Fund, $285.23; Church Extension Fund, $17.87; General Eldership Contingent Fund, $0.37; General Eldership Missionary Fund, $346.81; Y. P. S. C. E. Church Extension Fund, $4.80. The receipts in the same order were, $1,887.40; $940.56; $197.83; $460.23; $434.06; $52.12; $646.81; $168.68. The Judiciary Committee had an unusually aggravated case of immorality on the part of a minister to deal with, and recommended that the guilty party be "most solemnly deposed from the office of the ministry of the churches of God." Seven applicants were recommended for ordination. "Ministers, Sunday-school teachers, editors and all others engaged in the moral education of mankind" were called upon to "speak in clear and emphatic terms against every phase and form" of the whiskey traffic. Also, that it is "the duty of the Christian citizen to vote from the high conviction that he is responsible to God and society to the extent that his vote determines whether or not the evils of the whiskey traffic shall continue to be inflicted upon the people." The deaths of two of the young ministers of the Eldership occurred during the year. David B. Herr, born in 1868, was qualifying himself for his chosen work at Findlay College, when he was stricken with the fatal malady which ended his life. "He was faithful!" Elias F. Eshleman, who had made diligent preparation at College for the ministry, and was licensed in 1895, ended his promising career on July 14, 1900. He was a young man of "noble character, deep-seated piety and sanctified ambition." Conditions in the Eldership were regarded as in "a very encouraging state;" yet there is a "lack of piety and spirituality." There was a good measure of enthusiasm and a resolute purpose to continue earnestly to contend for the cause and to revive the churches into more hopeful activity, that the work might be prosecuted with power. The growing flippancy regarding conceptions of sin was considered one of the greatest moral perils of the age. The Statistics show that there were 53 charges, 124 appointments, 105 houses of worship, 19 parsonages, 6,819 members.

73rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Within six months after the adjournment of the session of 1900 one minister "laid down the cross to wear the crown." William Palmer died March 15, 1901. He was ordained in 1867. He was an earnest Christian, a zealous and devoted minister, a close student of God's word, spiritual in temperament and life, and free from a worldly spirit and worldly tastes. He had good controversial powers. He loved to dwell on the glorious certainties of the unseen world. The Eldership held its annual session at Mt. Carmel, Northumberland county, where on October 2nd I. A. MacDannald preached the Opening Sermon, from Rom. x. 14—"The World's Need, and Its Remedy." On the morning of the 3rd O. E. Houston was chosen President; J. R. Stonesifer, Transcribing Clerk; S. Knisley, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. In electing the delegates to the General Eldership the Eldership decided to make the first ballot a nominating one, when all receiving five votes and upward were to be considered in nomination. A petition to the Executive Board of the General Eldership was adopted, requesting it to change the place for holding the session of said body from Anderson, Ind., to some other point, and not accept the offer of the "Commercial Club" of Anderson, Ind., "to provide entertainment" on account of the weak condition of the Anderson church. The proposed reunion of the churches of the Eldership the following Summer was favorably acted upon. The Board of Education, under whose authority the Beneficiary Educational Fund had been placed, finding a demand from students at Findlay College for aid increasing, availed itself of a privilege granted to it for an offering from each church for the benefit of the Fund. The interests of the College were presented by the Agent,

J. C. Forncrook. The Eldership lamented the evident decrease "in the number of conversions and accessions to the churches during the past year;" but "the financial condition of the churches is very encouraging." The assassination of President McKinley, one of the greatest of our Chief Magistrates, having occurred on September 6, 1901, it was to be expected that such a loyal and law-abiding class of men as an Eldership of the churches of God would "utterly condemn and protest against anarchy and all other depredations against our Government, as well as those who are prompted by an evil spirit to lay violent hands upon those who are in authority." The Anti-Saloon League was endorsed, and it was declared that "all sanction of the liquor traffic, whether the sanction of silence or of the ballot, is a sin." A local option law was heartily recommended, making the unit wards, boroughs and townships; but the belief was expressed that the only successful way of dealing with "the giant evil is the total prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage." There were eighty ministers on the Roll, and fifty-one delegates were enrolled. The Eldership also received ninety-one letters from churches and ministers. There were fourteen "fields of labor on the Board of Missions," and these received an aggregate of $1,690.00. The country churches were reported not in as flourishing a condition as those of the towns and cities. Conditions existed in the country which rendered successful church work more difficult.

74th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The death of the Treasurer of the East Pennsylvania Eldership in office had never occurred until the year 1901-2, when S. Knisley, who was first elected in 1879, departed from the active scenes of mundane life. The Board of Incorporation elected his successor in the person of H. M. Angle, a most estimable and responsible member of the church at Shippenburg. He made his first report at the Eldership held at Columbia, Lancaster county, beginning with the Opening Sermon on Wednesday evening, October 1, 1902. He was later elected Treasurer for the following year by a unanimous vote. O. E. Houston preached the opening sermon from I. Cor. i. 24—"Christ the Power of God and the Wisdom of God." The officers elected were C. H. Grove, President; J. R. Stonessifer, Transcribing Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk. The session had added interest by reason of the presence of Brother and Sister A. C. Bowers and Sister Viola G. Hershey under appointment as missionaries to India. The Board of Incorporation of the Eldership of 1901 was continued, and "recognized as the proper and legal representative of this Eldership, to make full and final settlement with the executor of the will of Samuel Knisley, and with his bondsmen as Treasurer of this Eldership." By amendments to the Constitution proposed by C. I. Brown, the Treasurer may be "a member of a church of God in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, or a bank, or corporation within its bounds." He was made a member of the Eldership ex officio. His bond was fixed at "$8,000.00, by a Trust Company, or Bonding Company." Important "rules and conditions of the Beneficiary Educational Fund" were submitted and approved, according to which appropriations were to be made to students for the ministry. The matters relating to the Woman's General Missionary Society now became an important question for the Eldership. Resolutions submitted by C. H. Forney were unanimously adopted, endorsing the action of the General Eldership in 1902. On temperance the Eldership declared it to be "the imperative duty of the Christian citizens of the State and nation to use their votes, as well as all other lawful means within their power, to remove the terrible evil of the liquor traffic, inflicted by law upon society." The "tendency to formality in some of the churches" was deplored, and churches were "urged earnestly to labor to win souls for Christ, and to promote the piety of the members, that the world may see their good works." The "question of re-establishing a limit of five years to the pastorate" was submitted to the churches," to be voted on at the congregational meetings in 1903. In addition to the death of the Treasurer, two ministers paid the last debt of nature, M. J. Hunter, colored, and D. L. Anderson, both licensed in 1896. Hunter labored as a local minister, and "was earnest and interested in the work of his people." Anderson, too, "served largely in a local capacity," serving only one appointment. "God has called them from labor to reward."

75th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—Though the title of the Eldership was changed in the Constitution after the General Eldership in 1896, it was not until 1903 that the Board of Incorporation was "authorized and instructed to amend the Charter and change the seal." The Reunion of the churches, deferred in 1902, was held in the Summer of 1903, and proved a profitable meeting. The ballot of the churches on the question of re-establishing a limit of five years to the pastorates was taken in September, 1903. It resulted in 1,034 votes for the "limit," and 1,167 votes for "no limit." The session in 1903 was held at Martinsburg, Blair county. The Opening Sermon was delivered on the evening of October 7th, by C. H. Grove, from II. Chron. xxv. 9:—"Compensations for Divine Service." Organization was effected by the election of F. Y. Weidenhammer, President; J. R. Stonesifer, Transcribing Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. S. G. Yahn was a welcome visitor to the Eldership. The various funds of the Eldership were in satisfactory condition. Missionary Fund, $2,046.95; Superannuated, $734.92; Widows', $765.69; Contingent, $219.65; Church Extension, $465.01; C. E. Church Extension, $283.51; G. E. Mission, $520.24; Foreign Mission, $1,036.52. On account of objectionable features of the Maryland Camp-meeting, largely kept up by ministers of this Eldership, it was "discountenanced by the Maryland and Virginia Eldership" and it requested the East Pennsylvania Eldership "to place a restraint upon its ministers so that they discontinue their assistance in keeping up the said camp-meeting." This was done, all ministers being forbidden to go within the boundaries of said Eldership against its action, or that of its Standing Committee. To more fully guard the Funds of the Eldership the power to loan out money was placed in the hands of the Treasurer and the Standing Committee. During the year two ministers "were called from labor to reward"—J. C. Seabrooks and S. E. Herman. The former was ordained in 1848; the latter, in 1883. Seabrooks was an aggressive minister; an excellent worker; a faithful pastor; an able preacher of the gospel. Herman "was a faithful and consistent member of the Eldership." He had served only two charges, while Seabrooks had served nearly all the circuits and several stations of the Eldership. A "Statistical Clerk" was provided for, and the office was first filled by the election of J. A. Detter. It was also arranged to eliminate the reports of ministers, and the time thus saved was to be occupied with addresses by ministers appointed in advance on the work of each Board of the Eldership and the Publishing interests. A new order was established for all elections, so as to minimize certain unpropitious practices in the Eldership. For every member to be elected to any position two were to be nominated, and these only were to be considered eligible. The Eldership considered "the prohibition of the liquor traffic to be the question of paramount importance to-day." It also recommended the organization of temperance societies among the young people.

76th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership of 1904 was in some respects an exceptional one. It convened in "the beautiful new house of worship at Shippensburg, Cumberland county." Several items of business of unusual interest were transacted. The vote on the time-limit to the pastorate, resubmitted to the churches by the Eldership in 1903, was defeated by a large majority. The evangelistic meetings inaugurated in 1902, and for two years conducted at 4 p. m., by W. N. Yates, were this year conducted by T. H. McAfee. F. Y. Weidenhammer preached the Opening Sermon on the evening of October 5th. McAfee was chosen President; J. R. Stonesifer, Transcribing Clerk; J. A. Detter, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. On the initiative of C. H. Forney a new method of securing the effective amenability of ministers was formulated. It substituted "the Ministerium of the Eldership" in place of ministers' individual reports. This was a "closed session of the Eldership, held on Friday afternoon," under the supervision of the Standing Committee, when the moral and official conduct of ministers was to be inquired into. Each minister could be asked a series of questions, and the Standing Committee testified to his standing. The "hearing before the Executive Board of the General Eldership" on certain "allegations against" officials of that body was taken up and the Report of the Executive Board adopted. The Report of J. A. Detter, Statistical Clerk, contained these items: Appointments, 116; charges, 55; membership, 6,531; baptized, 534; accessions, 915; removed by letters and deaths, 189; dropped and disfellowshipped, 303; Y. P. S. E's., 58; members, 2,418; missionary societies, 45; members, 2,325; parsonages, 26. While the Report of a committee, consisting of G. W. Getz, H. Whitaker, C. F. Reitzel, W. H. Snyder, J. A. Detter, C. C. Bartels and James Curry, which was adopted, provided a different method from the congregational system of annually electing a pastor, it had not received the support of the churches. The Eldership was deeply affected by the deaths of two of the oldest ministers of the body during the year. These were Abraham Snyder, ordained in 1846, and Carlton Price, ordained in 1841. Both were self-made men, of great force of character, and influential as teachers and preachers of the word. They left behind them imperishable monuments in the esteem of thousands who had been brought to a saving knowledge of the truth through their ministry. They were pre-eminently preachers of the word. Though not officially recognized, the death of W. L. Jones, ordained a minister in the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1860, died June 11, 1904. He had resigned his membership in the Eldership and united with the Baptist Church some years previous, but without change of faith. He always had a warm heart for the Church, and on two recent occasions attended sessions of the Eldership. His natural eloquence, his gentleness of disposition, his staunch and unwavering friendship and his ready helpfulness were everywhere recognized. There was appreciable advancement in the spirituality of the churches, with ample room for improvement. The closing hours of the session witnessed a touching scene, when resolutions were considered granting a transfer to the Ohio Eldership to C. I. Brown, an efficient, able and honored member of the body since 1887. The resolutions voiced "the regret and sorrow the Eldership experienced in his removal" to assume the duties of President of Findlay College.

77th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The question of Divorce was a heritage of the Eldership of 1905, which convened at Lancaster, Lancaster county, October 4th. It had been introduced in 1904 by G. Sigler, and was referred to the session of 1905, when, on Monday morning he offered a resolution expressing "the sense of this Eldership that none of its ministers is justified in performing the marriage ceremony for any divorced person, except for the innocent party in the case of divorce where the cause is fornication or adultery." After a somewhat exhaustive discussion of the resolution by a number of the ministers the Eldership laid the resolution on the table. The Eldership suffered the loss by transfer of W. N. Yates, who went to Ida Grove, Iowa, and T. H. McAfee, who was called to Findlay, Ohio, both "highly esteemed for their noble bearing and usefulness," and the Eldership expressed its "high appreciation of them as men of high and noble character, inspired with holy and unselfish purposes, and earnest in upholding the dignity and honor of ministers of the gospel." But the body gained three good and efficient ministers by transfer, viz.: C. Manchester, of Ohio, and J. D. Clark and T. B. Tyler, of Maryland.

The Opening Sermon was delivered by T. H. McAfee, from II. Tim. iv. 7, Theme—"Keeping the Faith." The Eldership consisted of eighty ministers and fifty-seven lay delegates. Fifty-eight of the ministers were pastors. A. P. Stover was chosen President; W. J. Schaner was the Stated Clerk; J. R. Stonesifer was elected Transcribing Clerk; J. A. Detter, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. Following their Reports, Boards and Committees were elected as follows: Standing Committee—C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop and Geo. Sigler; Board of Missions—C. H. Forney, C. H. Grove, W. J. Schaner, G. W. Getz, D. S. Shoop, I. A. MacDannald, George Sigler, F. W. McGuire, J. R. Stonesifer; Judiciary Committee—C. H. Forney, A. P. Stover, F. W. McGuire, G. W. Getz, Geo. Sigler; Board of Church Extension—F. W. McGuire, C. F. Reitzel, O. E. Houston, J. A. Detter, C. H. Forney; Board of Education—C. H. Forney, A. P. Stover, J. R. Stonesifer, C. H. Grove, George Sigler. Beginning at 4 o'clock p. m. each day evangelistic services were held. The Funds were all in good condition, showing balances to the credit of each Fund as follows: Mission, $258.37; Superannuated, $459.93; Widows' $332.30; Contingent, $127.62; Church Extension, $115.73; C. E. Church Extension, $8.82; Beneficiary Educational, $64.91; Sinking, $440.27; General Eldership Mission, $556.50; Foreign Mission, $1,139.07. The Treasurer had investments to the amount of $6,381.25. The Report of the Statistical Clerk showed that during the year the total amount of all funds contributed by the churches aggregated $64,314.49; that there were 124 appointments, 106 houses of worship, 7,323 church members, 538 baptized, 859 received into fellowship, 521 dropped from the rolls, removed and died; 11,861 Sunday-school scholars, 65 Y. P. S. C. E., with a total membership of 3,655; 37 missionary societies, with a membership of 1,918. The spiritual condition of the churches was "believed to be fairly good," yet prayer was urged in all the churches that "they may be revived." By a vote of 110 yeas and 19 nays the Eldership decided that "no member of this body shall directly or indirectly use his influence by electioneering to elect officers, members of boards or committees of this Eldership." Any one violating this action "shall forfeit his right to vote, hold office or serve on any board or committee of the Eldership for one year." The Eldership strongly endorsed the Anti-Saloon League and the W. C. T. U., and affirmed "that the only attitude ministers of the gospel, Christians and good citizens can sustain toward the whiskey traffic is that of uncompromising opposition, and that in the exercise of the right of voting, as well as in every other way, they should have the overthrow of this evil in view." Two ministers were named as "trustees of the Anti-Saloon League." A favorable report was received of the annual Reunion of the churches of God, and a new Reunion Committee was appointed.

The Eldership placed itself positively on record on the question of education and the support of the institutions of learning under the control of the General Eldership and the West Pennsylvania Eldership, to wit: Findlay College, Barkeyville Academy and Ft. Scott Collegiate Institute. The Eldership had "completed the endowment of the chair of English Language and Literature in Findlay College," and had "already $3,000.00 toward the endowment of the Latin professorship." It greatly rejoiced over the proposition of C. H. Forney "to make himself personally responsible for the endowment of the President's Chair in Findlay College." A series of resolutions prevailed by unanimous vote relative to the "difficulties and troubles arising in our general missionary work." They approved the measures adopted by the General Eldership in 1905 to secure "harmony and general co-operation under the W. G. M. S. of 1903." They also favored the appointment of a Commission by the Executive Board of the General Eldership, whose duty it would be to devise and put into effect a provisional plan of organic unity" of all the Woman's Missionary societies.

78th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The "Ministerium" which was to displace the old style of ministers' reports proved so unsatisfactory that the Committee on Resolutions in 1905 reported in favor of its discontinuance. And while the Eldership did not agree to this, the "method failed to give general satisfaction," and thus the way was prepared for the adoption of a new order, introduced by C. H. Forney on the first day of the session of 1906. This provided for "a closed session of the Eldership to be held on Friday forenoon, which shall be called the Ministerium of the Eldership, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the Constitution which empower the Eldership to inquire into the moral and official conduct of its members." This examination of the character and official conduct of ministers was "to be conducted by the Standing Committee, the President of the Eldership presiding. The examination related to doctrines, ordinances, filling appointments, pastoral visitation and observance of Rules and By-Laws. There being "no complaints or charges against a minister, his character shall pass without formal action." Complaints could be made against a minister at any time, to be called up by the Standing Committee at the Ministerium.

The Eldership convened at Saxton, Bedford county, October 11, 1906. On the previous evening A. P. Stover preached the Opening Sermon from Rom. i. 16. Theme—"The Gospel of Christ." After W. J. Schaner, Stated Clerk, had constituted the Eldership, elections resulted as follows: J. M. Waggoner, President; J. R. Stonesifer, Transcribing Clerk; J. A. Detter, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. The Judiciary Committee, an important and responsible committee, consisting of C. H. Forney, George Sigler, D. S. Shoop, F. W. McGuire and G. W. Getz, was continued during the year by special action. The action of the Standing Committee on the appointment of a Commission on Unification of Missionary Societies was unanimously approved, and ordered to be made a part of the Journal. Additional action on the same subject was unanimously taken by the Eldership, emphatically insisting that "it is our high duty as a Christian brotherhood to seek by all possible means to remove all hindrances to harmony and union throughout all our borders, and to bring all our missionary societies into thorough and harmonious co-operation under one general management." The various fields of labor paid $22,519.00 in salaries to their pastors; $786.59 was raised on Children's College Day, and the grand total for the year was $73,320.39 for all purposes. Thirty-three ministers were in the classes of the Course of Studies. Several important amendments to the Constitution were made, one of which rescinded the drastic Rule against electioneering because it "has been a dead letter;" one giving the Standing Committee power "by resolution or otherwise to reprove, counsel or advise ministers concerning whom there are reports, or complaints of improper or injurious conduct," and one providing that in the election of officers of the Eldership and all elective committees and boards nominations shall be made, the number of nominations to be at least double the number to be elected." While financially and otherwise the Reunion of the churches was successful, the recommendation of the Committee was approved, to discontinue the same. The total investments of funds by the Treasurer were $8,750.00. The proposition of Andrew Carnegie to pay $12,500.00 toward a $50,000.00 endowment fund of Findlay College, provided $37,500.00 be contributed by others, was enthusiastically greeted, and the Eldership pledged its "best efforts and liberal financial support in meeting Mr. Carnegie's proposition." The fields of labor numbered fifty-eight, including one which the Maryland and Virginia Eldership was "permitted to supply." The division of these fields into two classes had almost wholly disappeared, all being designated simply as "appointments." The Walnut Grove camp-meeting and the property located at Walnut Grove, Huntingdon county, were taken over by the Eldership by the appointment of "three trustees to take charge of said Walnut Grove camp-ground, and to have full control of the same." "A reasonable measure of success attended the labors of ministers and churches during the year," there having "been an increase over other years of 452 members to the churches of the Eldership." The churches lost 108 by death, 110 by letter, and 248 were dropped from the Rolls. The Eldership lost two ministers by death. One, George M. Houston, aged nearly twenty-five years, ordained in 1904, "loved and respected by all." The other, W. S. Smith, aged sixty-two, and ordained in 1874, an earnest, devoted minister, faithful to his trust. The Eldership reaffirmed its "most advanced position upon the question of the whiskey traffic;" rejoiced over "the quickening of the public conscience upon this and all other great questions of reform," and congratulated "the people for their unwillingness to be held within party lines by designing men, and a disposition to promote reform measures irrespective of former political affiliations." The next Legislature was petitioned "to pass a law known as the Local Option Law, believing it to be in harmony with the very genius of our republican form of government."

79th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—An important change in the Journal went into effect with the Eldership of 1907. The elimination of reports of ministers had reduced its length some years before, it was now to contain "all of the Reports of the Boards and Committees acting during the year, and all legal documents, in abridged form." This year's Journal thus increased to 72 pages, and became a document of much greater value. The session of the Eldership was held at Middletown, Dauphin county, where on Wednesday evening, October 2, 1907, G. W. Getz preached the Opening Sermon, from Col. 1. 18. Theme—"The Pre-eminence of Christ." The enrollment having been completed by W. J. Schaner, Stated Clerk, elections for other officers followed, and resulted in the choice of J. C. Forncrook for President; J. R. Stonesifer, Transcribing Clerk; J. A. Dettler, Statistical Clerk, and H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. The Eldership again expressed strong sentiments on the missionary difficulties, submitted in a series of resolutions by C. H. Grove, endorsing the work of the Commission on Unification, the actions of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership and the Board of Managers of the W. G. M. S. The Eldership was intensely loyal to the General Eldership and all its interests. While the Statistical Clerk reported 540 additions to the membership of the churches, he also noted the fact that "the total membership is 351 less than last year." Fields of labor on the Stationing Committee's list numbered 59. Frequent deficiencies in collections for the different funds moved the Eldership to adopt an amendment to its By-Laws, holding "the delegate" of any charge "equally responsible with the pastor for shortages in Eldership funds." The Eldership expressed its sincere gratitude to Abraham Hostetter, late of Shippensburg, in making a bequest "of the balance or residuary of his estate," after certain other bequests, "to the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the churches of God." Authority was granted to C. H. Forney, attorney-in-fact, with discretionary power, "with reference to the sale of the church property at Palmyra, Lebanon county." The Board of Education continued its activity in increasing its Beneficiary Educational Fund. It made small appropriations to six students at Findlay College preparing for the ministry. It controls two scholarships, which were given to three of the students. Among the thirteen licentiates whose licenses were renewed, or full Certificates of Ordination granted, was Preo Nath Biswas, of India. Also three returned students of Findlay College and one of Dickinson College. The East Pennsylvania Woman's Missionary Society having petitioned the Eldership to grant "all the rights and privileges of the gospel ministry" to one of the missionaries in India, the Eldership again placed itself on record as "not in favor of the ordination of women to the gospel ministry." Church extension work was assuming large proportions, and the Eldership strengthened the hands of the Board by special efforts to increase its receipts. Following its report an address was delivered by an appointee for the purpose, O. E. Houston. The Report of the Board of Education was followed by an address by C. Manchester; that of the Board of Missions by an address by G. W. Getz. "Advocate Day" was fully endorsed, and ministers were instructed on said day "to present the need of a Church paper, and make an earnest effort to place The Advocate into every home of the Church." The Eldership recognized the decreased spirituality of the churches, and admonished "the ministry and churches to seek a higher plane of religious worship, and to set up a more exalted standard of religious life. It also expressed its apprehension that "the spirit of evil, which often manifests itself in the form of hatred, animosities, jealousies and strife, was hindering our progress as a people," and hence "urged one and all to cultivate a sweet spirit of love and harmony." A day was designated "to be set apart as a day of prayer in all the churches of the Eldership for a blessed divine manifestation of power." The "spirit of compromise on some of the distinctive doctrines of the Church" was disapproved, and it was "required at the hand of every minister of the body to preach clearly and uncompromisingly all the doctrines of the Church, as found in the New Testament Scriptures, so that there may be an unquestioned uniformity in our teachings as a body." The Eldership expressed its "satisfaction over the continued victories that have come to the temperance cause, and reaffirmed its former utterances of uncompromising hostility to the liquor traffic in all its forms." Two names of ministers were taken off the Eldership Roll by the hand of death during the year. J. F. Meikel, aged nearly 66 years, and ordained in 1870, was a faithful minister, and "sought to live a godly life and to earnestly declare the word of God." Samuel Smith began as an exhorter in 1867. "He was a strong preacher in the English and German languages; a zealous, self-sacrificing workman in the Lord's vineyard, and a staunch advocate of the faith and principles of the Church of God."

80th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The suit at law in the Court of Schuylkill county against the German Eldership, instituted in 1896, under authority of the General Eldership and the East Pennsylvania Eldership was still pending when the Eldership of 1908 convened. C. H. Forney, attorney-in-fact for both Elderships, reported the case ready for argument before Court. The object of the suit was the appointment of the Board of Incorporation of the East Pennsylvania Eldership as trustee of the Kimmel estate bequeathed to the German Eldership, whose Charter had been revoked and whose dissolution had been decreed by the General Eldership. A better system of accounts by church councils was urged upon pastors and churches, so that there may be "proper accountability and mutual checks to insure an honest administration of the finances of each church, and that the misuse or loss of moneys collected may be prevented." The Report of J. A. Detter, Statistical Clerk, showed that "the total amount collected for all purposes during the year was $77,035.39." There was an increase in pastors' salaries of $2,192.00, making the total salaries $26,141.79. Four new houses of worship were erected, and two parsonages. Important action was taken on the matter of deeds of church properties, parsonages, etc., held by the Eldership. It provided that all such property be deeded to the local churches, and that each deed shall contain provisions that "the property shall never be sold, mortgaged, or converted into any other use without the prior approval of the Board of Incorporation of the Eldership; that it shall never be alienated from the East Pennsylvania Eldership, and that whenever the church holding the deed shall cease to co-operate with the Eldership, or shall become extinct, said property shall revert to the Eldership." The action taken on the matter pertaining to the W. G. M. S. approved the positions taken by the Board of Missions and the Executive Board of the General Eldership, and "pledged the delegation to the General Eldership in 1909 to stand with all other Elderships in upholding the constitutional authority of the General Eldership and in vindicating its Boards and agents in the firm stand taken by them in the adjustment of the difficulties which have vexed the churches and brotherhood during these years." The Eldership having at all times manifested a deep interest in Findlay College, placed itself again on record as true to all the interests of the College, and highly commended the Faculty and the Board of Trustees. The Day of Prayer for colleges and Children's College Day were specially commended to the pastors and churches, and a more general observance of these days was insisted upon.

Six ministers were called to their final reward during the year. J. W. Jones (colored), who was ordained in 1880, had spent twenty-five years in the active work of the ministry. "He was an acceptable preacher among his people, and the good he did among them during his life-time God alone can reveal." A. H. Long had attained the age of nearly 85 years. He had been a member of the Church since September 7, 1851, and was ordained to the gospel ministry in November, 1853. "He was a Christian of unblemished character; a plain, honest worker; ever true to his convictions, sound in the faith and hope of the gospel. No man was ever more loyal to the doctrines and teachings of the Church than was Dr. Long." S. E. Kline was ordained in 1896. He was "a brother of true and honest purpose. In his measure he was faithful to his trust as a minister, and was an ardent lover of the Church of God, whose triumphs were a source of great joy to him." Elias Sowers died at the age of 76 years. He preached mainly in the German language, and for a number of years was a member of the German Eldership, and served several of its circuits. Being in the employ of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, he became known as "the railroad preacher." "He was respected and esteemed by those with whom he associated. There was that about him which at once distinguished him from men of the world, and also from those who have only 'a name to live while they are dead.' He was faithful." C. Kahler died at the age of 67 years. He was converted when sixteen years of age, but was not ordained to the ministry of the Eldership until in his forty-second year. He "was a man of excellent character, admired and loved by a large circle of acquaintances and friends, to whom he had endeared himself by his labors of love and purity of life." David Shope died at the age of 72 years. He was licensed to preach the gospel in 1866, and labored in a local capacity. He was for thirty-five years a teacher in the public schools of Dauphin and Schuylkill counties, and was also an earnest and successful Sunday-school worker, and an ardent and devoted advocate of the temperance cause.

The condition of the churches was gratifying. The number baptized during the year "was double that of the preceding year, and there was a net gain in the membership of 500." But the Eldership felt that "the churches need to cultivate a spirit to regard more sacredly the sources of spiritual strength and prosperity." It called "attention to the worldly and commercial spirit which threatens to distract and destroy the interest we should manifest in the teachings of God's Holy Word." The President of the Eldership was J. A. Detter; Stated Clerk, W. J. Schaner; Transcribing Clerk, W. S. Sturgen; Statistical Clerk, W. H. Snyder; Financial Clerk and Treasurer, H. M. Angle. J. C. Forncrook delivered the Opening Sermon, from I. Cor. i. 23; ii. 2. Theme—"Christ Crucified."

81st East Pennsylvania Eldership.—A strong effort was made at the Eldership in 1909 to effect "an amicable settlement out of court" of the German Eldership case. As the session was held at Auburn, Schuylkill county, near the territory still held by the German Eldership, it was hoped the two bodies could get together. The attorney-in-fact in his report asked "that such action be taken by the Eldership that any overtures to this end might receive proper recognition and consideration." The Eldership accordingly appointed a committee, consisting of C. H. Forney, C. H. Grove and C. F. Reitzel, "to confer with representatives of the German Eldership." A basis of settlement and co-operation was agreed upon by all parties, and was adopted by the Eldership; but when the German Eldership convened it failed to act upon it so as to give authority to a committee to ratify the agreement, and thus the matter ended. As one of the provisions of the "basis" was "that the legal proceedings in the courts of Schuylkill county shall be suspended until otherwise ordered," nothing further was done.

J. A. Detter preached the Opening Sermon on the evening of October 7, 1909, from Acts xx. 26, 27. Theme—"An Ideal Ministry." The officers elected were as follows: H. F. Hoover, President; W. S. Sturgen, Transcribing Clerk; W. H. Snyder, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. To insure both greater accuracy and secrecy in elections it was provided that clerks to tellers be appointed; that no one but the tellers and clerks be present when ballots are counted; that after ballots had been counted they were to be placed in sealed envelopes, to be filed with the Stated Clerk until after adjournment, "when he shall destroy them unopened." It was also provided, that the practice of having the Clerk cast the ballot of the Eldership for any elective office, or for any board be discontinued, as being "contrary to good usage, and of doubtful parliamentary authority." The financial report shows total collections for all purposes, $74,-833.58. Number of houses of worship, 103; parsonages, 32; total church membership, 7,430. This was a net increase of only 73, although the number admitted to fellowship was 1,163. The Sunday-school scholars numbered 13,037. At this session of the Eldership the laymen present organized a "Laymen's Association, having for its purpose a closer bond of Christian fellowship and greater usefulness in furthering the cause of our Lord." It received the hearty approval of the Eldership. One minister during the year received "the infinite gain of being translated to heaven to be with Jesus." Israel Hay, born November 20, 1838; died September 7, 1909, aged nearly 71 years. He became a member first of the German Eldership, and preached on its territory. In 1868 he united with the East Pennsylvania Eldership, but continued to preach on the territory of the German Eldership which the East Pennsylvania Eldership had reoccupied. "He was an excellent German preacher, a man of fine character, and of decided convictions. He was true and loyal to the Church, and faithfully preached its doctrines." While the Eldership lost Dr. C. Manchester by transfer to the Kansas Eldership, it received Dr. S. G. Yahn by transfer from the West Pennsylvania Eldership. The presence of O. A. Newlin, Field Secretary of Findlay College, was much appreciated, and his mission "to raise the funds still needed to meet the Carnegie proposition" was strongly commended. The Eldership expressed its disapproval of the practice of "churches or missions dependent on the Board of Missions making alterations and repairs to properties, and reduce their contributions toward the pastors' support, without the previous consent of the Board, as provided for in the Constitution." The Eldership "deplored the lack of real aggressive opposition against the unreasonable and injurious legalized license system of the rum traffic." It "emphatically urged ministers and churches to take a more definite stand against the rum traffic, and wage a relentless warfare against this determined evil." It placed itself on record in favor of "a national prohibitory law against this evil;" but meanwhile it resolved to "endeavor to do what we can in State prohibition and in local option."

82nd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership of 1910, which convened at Altoona, Blair county, October 6th, was composed of eighty ministers and sixty-four delegates. Of the eighty ministers sixty-two were pastors. The Annual Sermon was preached by H. F. Hoover, from Rev. i. 8. Theme—"The Alpha and Omega." Charles F. Reitzel was chosen President; H. R. Lobb, Transcribing Clerk; W. H. Snyder, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. One minister returned his Certificate of Ordination, and his name was erased from the Eldership Roll, and one was "solemnly deposed from the ministry, and expelled from the membership of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." One was "granted a letter of dismissal, with permission to unite with the Presbyterian Church." W. N. Yates returned with transfer from the Iowa Eldership. In terms of high appreciation the Eldership made record of the creation of a trust fund, by bequest of John Miller, of Dauphin county, to the amount of about $25,000.00 "for the benefit of the churches at Linglestown, Mt. Laurel, Shope's, Progress, Penbrook and Pleasant View." Also a bequest by Jacob Simonetti, Harrisburg, Pa., of $1,000.00 to the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The matter of the Walnut Grove Camp-meeting was adjusted by the adoption of a plan to form a Camp-meeting Association, accountable to the Eldership, but without official connection with the local church at Walnut Grove. Provision was made for the sale of stock at $10.00 a share, interest bearing, the minimum amount to be sold being fixed at $1,000.00. Under these provisions the Association was organized, and has conducted the camp-meeting and controlled the property. The Eldership insisted, that as it had the right of nominating but one person for each vacancy on the Board of Trustees of Findlay College, its nominee or nominees be elected by said Board. It also opposed the transfer of "non-interest bearing endowment notes," given some years prior, to Mr. Carnegie's proposition, to the Carnegie Endowment Fund. The Report of the Statistical Clerk contained the following among its many interesting facts: Pastors' salaries, $27,159.48, being an increase of $1,800.82; Mission Fund, $1,914.21; Foreign Missions, $1,300.60; Findlay College, $1,971.77; Findlay College Day, $1,252.29; total for all purposes, $88,149.17. Number of appointments, 122; members, 7,655; fellowshipped, 679; Sunday-school scholars, 14,145; Missionary societies, 49. The practice by a few churches of holding Children's College Day and appropriating money raised to other purposes was "severely condemned." Two ministers of the Eldership were transferred by death to a higher ministry. W. J. Grissinger, aged 66 years, died February 27, 1910. He was ordained at the age of 33 years. He was a "methodical and painstaking sermonizer." "His life was conscientious, upright and virtuous." "He was of a kind, agreeable disposition." "The Eldership was profoundly grieved because of his departure." Alfred Young (colored) died August 26, 1910. He was a member of the Eldership a comparatively short time. He was self-sacrificing and diligent in his calling, and possessed good natural talent, and maintained a good reputation for piety and morality. His entire ministry was spent in Carlisle, Cumberland county, where he built a neat brick bethel for the little church of which he was pastor. The Stationing Committee placed fourteen fields of labor on the Board of Missions, to be partly supported by the Board. With these included the stations and circuits numbered sixty-seven. Strong in its denunciation of the whiskey traffic, the Eldership also "deplored the growing vice of cigarette smoking," and "placed itself on record as being opposed to the manufacture and sale of cigarettes in general, and to the giving or selling to miners in particular." Fields of labor having no parsonages were urged "to work hard toward securing the same." Indirectly the system of doctrine "known as Arminianism" was endorsed by the passage of commendatory resolutions of the work written by William Harris Guyer on James Arminius. The Eldership manifested such an interest in good citizenship that it appointed C. H. Forney, S. G. Yahn, J. A. Detter, G. Sigler and I. A. MacDannald delegates to the Christian Citizenship Convention, to be held in Philadelphia, Pa., November 16-20, 1910.

88rd East Pennsylvania Eldership.—As there had been disturbing contentions and friction to quite a degree throughout a great part of the General Eldership, and for several years in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, the Executive Board of the General Eldership in June, 1911, requested that at all the Annual Elderships "special prayer for peace" should be offered. This was carried into effect by the East Pennsylvania Eldership at its second sitting at the session which convened at Penbrook, Dauphin county, October 4, 1911. The officers of this session were as follows: D. S. Shoop, President; G. R. Hoverter, Transcribing Clerk; W. H. Snyder, Statistical Clerk; H. M. Angle, Financial Clerk and Treasurer. The Stated Clerk, W. J. Schaner, who is elected for an indefinite term, resigned, after having filled that office for sixteen years, and H. R. Lobb was elected as his successor. The Opening Sermon was delivered on Wednesday evening by C. F. Reitzel, from John i. 67. Theme—"John a Witness for Christ." A very important change was made in the Constitution, when at the first sitting the Committee on Mission Work, C. H. Forney, G. Sigler and W. J. Schaner, reported, "that the members elected as the Stationing Committee shall be the Board of Missions, and that it shall consist of nine members." The Committee on "Laws and Rules for Judicial and Non-judicial Processes," C. H. Forney, F. W. McGuire and H. N. Bowman, not only recommended a new Manual to be used in such cases; but submitted a provision for the selection of a Commission to be selected in manner and form as in impanelling of juries, which was to act in all trials of ministers charged with wrong moral or official conduct. As some churches had been electing "honorary elders," it became necessary for the Eldership to define their status. This the body did, declaring that "our polity embodies the principle of rotation in office, and annual election of active elders." It, therefore, decided "that an honorary or life elder is not eligible as a delegate to this Eldership." It also took definite action "on the matter of doctrinal preaching, reversal of the order of the observance and frequency of the observance of the ordinances." It disapproved of any innovations in connection with the observance of the ordinances, such as the reversal of the order, or the private observance of the ordinances." The quarterly observance of the ordinances was recommended to all the churches. "More preaching upon the doctrines which have a vital relation to the maintenance of our identity as a separate religious body" was insisted upon. The "opening of playhouses and picture shows" on the Sabbath "for the purpose of raising money" for charitable purposes was condemned as "an uncalled for desecration" of that sacred day, and "an insulting reflection upon the liberality and readiness of the people to respond" to calls for aid to the needy and suffering. There was a radical departure from former customs in arranging the finances of the Eldership. An important committee, consisting of A. P. Stover, C. I. Behney, C. S. Meck and F. W. McGuire, after a careful study during the year, reported in favor of creating a "Board of Finance." It was to be "a joint Board of ministers and lay delegates, and shall consist of the Treasurer of the Eldership, three ministers and three lay delegates." This Board is to "fix all assessments, and exert every effort to collect the same." The first Board elected, following the amending of the Constitution, consisted of H. M. Angle, Treasurer; A. P. Stover, H. F. Hoover and G. R. Hoover.

ter, ministers, and G. W. Fox, C. S. Meck and H. N. Bowman, lay members. The various funds made a creditable showing. The salaries of ministers had increased, and now aggregated $28,090.24. Receipts during the year were as follows: Superannuated Fund, $659.76; Contingent, $186.66; Church Extension, $478.59; C. E. Church Extension, $145.87; East Pennsylvania Mission, $1,808.48; General Eldership Mission, $507.83; Foreign, $1,341.17; Findlay College, $408.60; Children's College Day, $845.93; Widows', $668.91. For all purposes reported the churches had raised the sum of $80,772.44. The Church membership was given at 7,211, a decrease of 444 on the previous year, although there were admitted by letter and on profession of faith, 849. The Sunday-school scholars numbered 14,034. There were sixty-six fields of labor. The Eldership continued to provide according to its resources for the widows of deceased ministers and for superannuated ministers. Of the former there were twenty-two on the list, and of the latter, five. The somewhat singular fact that no lay delegates for years had been on elective boards, or elected to any office but that of Treasurer, was called to the attention of the Eldership by the Laymen's Association, which endorsed an effort to secure to the lay delegates "the privileges afforded them by the Constitution." But no action was taken. The Eldership rejoiced over the completion of the Carnegie Endowment Fund of $50,000.00 for Findlay College. It also insisted that the young ministers of the body in the Course of Studies be diligent in pursuing these studies, as the Course "is admittedly of a superior character, and is highly beneficial to our young ministers and to candidates for the ministry."

84th East Pennsylvania Eldership.—One result of the system of raising funds for the Eldership was the tendency on the part of the churches to reduce their membership by "dropping" names from the Roll of persons not in active co-operation. In this way the membership in 1911 was reduced 350, and in 1912, 289. The total losses in 1912 by removals, deaths and dropped were 548. And while there were "evidences of progress," inspiring gratitude and courage in the Eldership; nevertheless the body was "forced to the conclusion that the results of the year's work and the present state of religion are not equal to the expectations which were justified by the men and money employed and the opportunities presented." There were assumed to be "certain weaknesses which ought to be strengthened." The material prosperity enjoyed begat a spirit of worldliness. There was still too much indifference in the matter of "teaching and practicing our distinctive doctrines." A body of people may lose its identity if it fail to keep prominent the articles of faith for which it stands. The Eldership convened at Shippensburg, Cumberland county, where on the evening of October 2, 1912, D. S. Shoop preached the Opening Sermon, from Phil. iii. 1. Theme—"Repetition of Old Truths." The officers elected were: President, W. N. Yates; Transcribing Clerk, G. R. Hoverter; Statistical Clerk, W. H. Snyder; Financial Clerk and Treasurer, H. M. Angle. Owing to taking a transfer to the West Pennsylvania Eldership, H. R. Lobb, Stated Clerk, resigned, and J. A. Detter was elected to that office. The Standing Committee consisted of C. H. Forney, D. S. Shoop, C. H. Grove. The Board of Missions which is also the Stationing Committee, C. H. Forney, W. N. Yates, G. Sigler, D. S. Shoop, O. E. Houston, F. W. McGuire, H. F. Hoover, I. A. MacDannald, C. H. Grove. Board of Church Extension, F. W. McGuire, A. P. Stover, J. A. Detter, C. H. Forney, C. I. Behney. Board of Education, C. H. Forney, G. Sigler, S. G. Yahn, W. N. Yates, A. P. Stover. The funds of the Eldership were in gratifying condition, there being an increase in each of them. Superannuated Fund, $697.58; Contingent, $207.05; Church Extension, $508.58; C. E. Church Extension, $167.05; East Pennsylvania Mission, $1,908.57; General Eldership Mission, $565.18; General Eldership Contingent, $204.90; Foreign Mission, $1,720.16; Children's College Day, $1,639.06; Widows', $707.58. The salaries of pastors had increased nearly $3,000.00, being a total of $30,954.97. For all purposes reported the churches paid $87,510.90. The number of members, 7,239; fellowshipped, 747; died, dismissed and dropped, 548. Number of Sunday-school scholars, 14,924. There were 74 Y. P. S. C. E. societies. The fields of labor numbered 67. During the year two ministers to whom death came as a friend found "the grave itself a passage into the beautiful and glorious." These were Benjamin Dochterman and D. H. Mumma. The latter was ordained in 1871, and for some years labored on different circuits, and was instrumental in many conversions, and also built several houses of worship. He "had a warm, sympathetic heart, and his friendships were true and lasting." He "served both his country and his Church with zeal and fidelity." Dochtermann's labors were mainly local. He was a man of irreproachable character, humility and sincerity being his brightest ornaments. For these and other traits of character "his memory will long be cherished by those who were so happy as to know him." The deaths of laymen were seldom recorded by the Eldership; but this year the names of two laymen had this distinction accorded them. These were Peter L. Rickabaugh and H. J. Forney. The former in earlier life was an exhorter, and also preached some at points within reach of his home. He had been a delegate to the General Eldership. The latter was a successful business man, but always "greatly interested in the various general and local affairs of the Church, and he repeatedly served as delegate to the Annual and General Elderships. The Board of Finance this year, in addition to the Treasurer, were Revs. A. P. Stover, G. R. Hoverter, H. F. Hoover; elders, C. S. Meck, G. W. Fox, J. P. Karper. "Teachers' Training Courses" in the Sunday-schools were commended, and pastors were admonished to "fall in line and encourage this most helpful work in our Sunday-schools." A notable feature of the Report of the Stationing Committee of 1912 was the appointment as missionaries to Bogra, India, of Howard W. Cover, A. E. Myers, Miss Viola G. Hershey and Miss Leah Becker. The broader view of temperance was exemplified in the Report of the Committee on Temperance, which pronounced "the saloon the greatest foe to civilization," declaring that there "must be perpetual warfare between the church and the saloon." But "the followers of Christ must resist all evil, whether it be in self, in society, or in the State." Cleanliness and sobriety and temperance in all things were insisted upon as duties of ministers and churches everywhere. The Eldership manifested a commendable interest in securing funds for the erection of a new "monument on the cemetery lot of John Winebrenner" to replace the original one, and the last Sunday in October, 1912, was designated as the day for the lifting of an offering for said purpose in "all the churches, Sunday-schools and Christian Endeavor societies within the borders of the Eldership for the Winebrenner Monument Fund."

II. THE OHIO ELDERSHIP.

1st Ohio Eldership.—Having obtained permission of the Pennsylvania Eldership in November, 1835, for "holding a yearly Eldership in the State of Ohio," the elders in that State "met and held their business meeting at Bro. John Beidler's, in Holmes county, Ohio, commencing on the 17th day of September, A. D. 1836." Winebrenner was present, and "the meeting was opened for business with worship" by him. The meeting was organized by the unanimous election of Winebrenner for Speaker, and John Greeger was chosen Clerk. All brethren present were made "advisory members." The charter members of this Eldership were John Greeger, John Funck, Samuel Sherrick and Peter Hartman, teaching elders; and John Beidler, Joseph Hummer, David Funck, William Adams, John Reiber, Samuel Metzler and Henry Rupp, ruling elders. Reiber and Adams were ordained teaching elders. Besides Winebrenner, Jacob Keller and Thomas Hickernell were also present. These teaching elders, if not also the ruling elders, were all emigrants from Pennsylvania. Adams was a native of Perry county, Pa., and "was reared in the Presbyterian faith." Conditions in Ohio were reported "prosperous," and the ministers' reports at this Eldership "were highly interesting and profitable." Keller, Hickernell and Greeger were "appointed to travel on the circuit [the Ohio circuit] till next Spring," 1837. Then the Wayne county circuit was divided, with "the river Killbuck as the division line," called respectively "the eastern and western circuits of Wayne county, Ohio." "The Committee to Station the Traveling Preachers for the next year" "appointed Keller and Adams to the eastern, and Hickernell and Greeger to the western circuit." This completed the work of the first Ohio Eldership.

2nd Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership held its second session "at Bro. Funck's meeting-house, in Chester township, Wayne county, Ohio, October 16, 1837. Emanuel Logue had come from Pennsylvania to Ohio during the year, and was enrolled without transfer, thus increasing the teaching elders at this meeting to seven. Keller and Hickernell were also present, with two delegates from Pennsylvania, McFadden and Smedmer. Though Smedmer was a delegate from Pennsylvania, he was one of the two appointed to constitute the Eldership, and was chosen Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. The teaching elders made "their usual reports, which "were all gratifying and satisfactory," and "their characters blameless." Five ministers "offered themselves to travel the ensuing year," and "the Committee appointed to arrange the circuits and station the preachers" gave them all work, putting Samuel N. Miller, newly licensed, and Reiber on the Richland county circuit; William Adams on the Sugar Creek circuit; Emanuel Logue on the Stark county circuit, and sending Hickernell to western Pennsylvania. A Standing Committee of five members was created and one of its first duties was to "appoint the camp-meetings for next year." Smedmer was so impressed with the character of the meeting that two days after he wrote Winebrenner: "We had a full meeting, and every item that came before us was taken up, discussed and considered with much calmness. Everything went off with as perfect harmony and regularity as clock work. I wish you and your brethren may copy our example and do your business in the spirit of unity, harmony and Christianity, as you have always done heretofore."

3rd Ohio Eldership.—On October 13, 1838, at Crooked Run meeting-house, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, the third Ohio Eldership began its session. Jacob Keller was elected Speaker, and Wm. Smedmer, Clerk. There were seventeen teaching and ruling elders present, including Ulrich Staley and Michael Stevens, delegates from Pennsylvania. Three teaching elders were absent. The characters of all the ministers were "found unimpeached." Three were ordained, one being William Hood, "a licentiate from the Protestant Methodist Church." The St. Mary's Mission was created, and Hickernell appointed missionary. The Pittsburg mission was left unsupplied. John Beidler was assigned to the German appointments. John Greeger had ceased by some means to be included this year "among the ministers of the Eldership," and a resolution was adopted "disapproving of the liberty taken by the Editor of The Gospel Publisher for including" his name as a member. The Eldership put itself on record against receiving persons as "members of the Eldership of the Church of God unless first immersed," and also declaring its belief "that immersion is the only baptism, and believers the only subjects." It made the first methodical provision for a missionary fund "by subscriptions and collections," and appointed Keller "for that purpose." The money was to go into the hands of the Standing Committee, which was empowered to select a Treasurer. The Committee was to pay the funds to "the missionaries every three months." This Committee was reduced to three. It was made the Camp-meeting Committee.

4th Ohio Eldership.—Michael Stevens, who in 1838 was delegate from Pennsylvania to the Ohio Eldership, remained in the State, and so on October 21, 1839, "the Eldership of the Church of God in Ohio met at Bro. Michael Stevens, Richland county." Joseph Dobson and John Lenkert were the delegates from Pennsylvania. Samuel Sherrick was elected Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. James Richards, one of the six who constituted the first Eldership in Pennsylvania, was an applicant for license. The case was referred to a committee, which, "after a minute investigation of the whole matter, recommended that a license be granted him." Daniel Wertz and James Neil, long useful ministers of the word, were ordained. The Eldership strongly "discountenanced the practice of preachers going into an article of agreement to hire themselves to preach for wages." Five appointments were arranged for by a committee appointed for that purpose, with one "missionary at large." These included John Hickernell and Joseph Dobson to the Pittsburg Mission. The question of "ordination by the laying on of hands" came up, but was "laid aside till the next Annual Eldership." The Standing Committee was increased to five, and a separate committee of five traveling preachers was appointed to arrange for camp-meetings in 1839. Adam Welker was made custodian of the Eldership papers "till the next Annual Eldership."

5th Ohio Eldership.—When the Ohio Eldership of the Church of God met at Moreland, Wayne county, Ohio, October 19, 1840, there were present seventeen teaching elders, and thirteen ruling elders and delegates. Also one delegate from Pennsylvania, with four teaching elders absent. Jacob Keller, delegate from East Pennsylvania, was elected Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. The work was reported as "progressing and reviving" through the instrumentality of the preachers, whose reports "were heard with satisfaction." "The subject of voting at political elections was taken up and discussed," with the result that a motion prevailed "that each and every brother ought to have the prerogative to exercise his own judgment in regard to the elective franchise, if it be in subserviency to religion." "The Committee to fix fields and appoint preachers" arranged for four circuits in Ohio and four in Pennsylvania.

6th Ohio Eldership.—The Eldership in 1841 met October 18, "in the Sugar Creek meeting-house, Holmes county, Ohio." Samuel Sherrick was chosen Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. Three "messengers" were enrolled, with the twenty-one ministers and ten ruling elders. From the reports of ministers "it appears they are still extending their labors and preaching with considerable success." The Committee on Boundaries divided the territory into nine circuits, to which fourteen teaching elders were appointed. Adams county, Indiana, contiguous to Mercer and Van Wert counties, Ohio, was part of one circuit. A delegate was appointed to "the Pennsylvania Eldership." Twelve counties in Ohio are included in the territory occupied by the ministers of the Eldership, viz: Richland, Marion, Crawford, Mercer, Allen, Van Wert, Wayne, Holmes, Stark, Tuscarawas, Coshocton and Portage, and Butler, Beaver, Venango and Westmoreland, Pa. A Rule was adopted, "That no charges shall be received before this Eldership against any one of its members before the person charged shall have been duly notified, and in other respects dealt with according to the Bible."

7th Ohio Eldership.—On Monday, October 17, 1842, the seventh session of the Ohio Eldership of the Church of God convened "in the Chester meeting-house, Wayne county." Edward West was elected Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. "A Committee to examine communications" was created. John S. Kerr reported from Virginia, now West Virginia, and his labors were approved. Several new counties in Ohio were mentioned in the reports, as Knox, Summit and Columbiana. An Indiana mission was established, and one in Columbiana county, Ohio, on the Pennsylvania line. There were eleven circuits formed, with sixteen preachers.

8th Ohio Eldership.—The Eldership of the Church of God in Ohio, which "met on the 16th day of October, 1843, at Crooked Run meeting-house, Tuscarawas county, Ohio," was constituted with thirty-two members. It elected E. West Speaker, and Samuel Scott, Clerk. A committee was created "to receive and examine letters, etc., and report the same to the Eldership." Also one "to examine the Journal of the last Eldership, and report the result to this Eldership." By resolution, Thomas Hickernell was appointed to preach a sermon on Church Government the second day evening. A committee was "appointed to consider the propriety of forming another Eldership," which reported favorably, naming as the "boundary line on the East—the Allegheny mountains," and the West line to commence at the Ohio river, and run North along the West line of Columbiana county, Ohio, to Lake Erie." This report was adopted, but was made conditional upon the "approbation of the Pennsylvania Eldership." As the support of ministers was inadequate, the Eldership considered a plan "to raise a support for the traveling preachers." It was decided to "recommend that the same be raised by a subscription to be paid weekly." Two collections a year were ordered "for missionary purposes." Nine fields of labor were created, with fifteen pastors. Provision was made for "an extra session of the Eldership, to be held in the Union Bethel, Moreland, Wayne county, Ohio, on the 20th of December, 1843. Also one in Pittsburg, on the 24th of December, 1843, to regulate matters relating to preachers and circuits." A Board of Missions was appointed "to receive and pay over the semi-weekly collections, donations, etc." The Eldership was characterized with "more love, harmony and general union of sentiment than ever before."

The extra session met, as per previous action. A new organization was effected by the election of Archibald Megrew, Speaker, and Homer Edwards, Clerk. Sixteen elders and four messengers were present. Necessary changes were made in circuits and preachers. Indiana State Mission was created. A resolution was adopted appointing "a committee of nine to act in reference to the publication of a new hymn book."

9th Ohio Eldership.—A number of new names of ministers who had emigrated to Ohio were enrolled when the Ohio Eldership of the Church of God met October 14, 1844, in the Bethel in Perry township, Wayne county, Ohio. The number of members was twenty-eight. They elected Edward West Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, First Clerk, and Samuel Scott, Second Clerk. Winebrenner and John Hickernell were "received as full members." A Treasurer was appointed for the Board of Missions, and "the same annual collections were ordered for the support of Bro. E. West." The Eldership "discussed the propriety of this body licensing preachers," and finally resolved to "proceed in this matter as heretofore; and that we advise the churches within the bounds of this Eldership to refer applicants for license to this body." The first official steps were taken to create a General Eldership by the adoption of a resolution agreeing "to co-operate with the East and West Pennsylvania Elderships" to that end. Six delegates were elected, and the naming of "the time and place of holding said General Eldership" was "left to the East Pennsylvania Eldership." The territory of the Eldership was divided into five circuits, upon which were appointed eight preachers, with three assistants. Samuel Scott was appointed missionary to Iowa, and J. Martin, Wm. Hood and D. Neidig, "to the State of Indiana."

10th Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership, when it assembled at Sugar Creek meeting-house, in Holmes county, on the 15th of October, 1845, its enrollment was twenty-seven teaching and ruling elders. They are all designated "elders." John Hickernell, who had become a member of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, was in attendance. A. Megrew was chosen Speaker; John Reiber, First Clerk, and James McClintock, Second Clerk. Without Constitution or Rules of Order, items were introduced and committees appointed by motion or resolution. One of the latter was directed "to examine the Journal of the last Eldership, and report the items of unfinished business." There were seven fields of labor as the Eldership was constituted; but when the Stationing Committee reported they were reduced to four, with six preachers. There were also thirteen "general missionaries," some of whom did successful work in enlarging the territory and opening new points. A "Committee on Overtures" was created; also one on Resolutions. The latter reported a resolution "in regard to the Bible cause, as being emphatically the cause of God," and commended it "to the special care and patronage of the Church of God." Also one "heartily and zealously recommending to all our brethren of the Church of God to avoid the desecration of the Sabbath by traveling, feasting, sleeping, working, or indulging in worldly conversation." A resolution on Slavery was offered, discussed and adopted, declaring that "the members of the Eldership of the Church of God in Ohio believe that the Bible teaches that slavery is a violation of the law of God." A Camp-meeting Committee was appointed. One minister was expelled for "heresy and insubordination." A serious condition touching the general polity of the Church in the United States developed when the Eldership "took into consideration the Constitution of the General Eldership held at Pittsburg," Pa., May 25, 1845, and "Resolved, unanimously, That it be laid on the table." There was deep-seated jealousy of the rights and powers of the churches, as against encroachments of any superior legislative body.

11th Ohio Eldership.—The Standing Committee having changed the place of meeting of the Eldership for 1846, it convened at "Kline's school-house, Franklin township, Richland county, Ohio," on the 19th day of October. Instead of the four circuits as arranged the previous year, there were six when the Eldership was constituted, one being the Indiana Mission. The Eldership was composed of eighteen teaching elders, twelve ruling elders, and three delegates. A. Megrew, Speaker; Thomas Hickernell, First Clerk, and Henry Murray, Transcribing Clerk. Thomas Hickernell was the great missionary of the Eldership. He had spent part of the year in western Pennsylvania; made a tour through the State of Indiana, working up the interest for the organization of an Eldership in that State, and "gone through the southern part of Ohio towards Cincinnati."

In electing the Standing Committee and the Stationing Committee the names of two ministers and two laymen were, on motion, resolved to be the Committees. By action of the Eldership, Hickernell preached a sermon on "Church Government." It was the practice of the Eldership thus to name a minister to preach on some special subject. One minister left the body and united with the Christian Church, and one was expelled. On the question of Secret Societies "the members of this Eldership are recommended not to identify themselves with them." This was popular sentiment then in Ohio. For the same year the Ohio Conference of the Evangelical Association adopted "its strongest expression concerning oath-bound secret societies in an out-spoken resolution with reference to one of its members, as follows: 'Resolved, That _____ shall withdraw from the order of Free Masons, and procure a certificate of dismissal from them, which shall be published.'"

A petition was received "to have an Eldership formed in the State of Indiana." Wholly ignoring the General Eldership, this Eldership resolved to "co-operate with the brethren in the West in forming an Eldership in the State of Indiana;" appointed two "delegates to said Eldership;" fixed "the second Saturday in November next, in the neighborhood of John Martins, Milford township, La Grange county, Ind.," as the time and place of meeting, and established the eastern boundary:—"that one row of the western counties of the State of Ohio, extending north and south, be thrown into the Indiana Eldership." Some internal dissensions at this time "seemed to threaten a rent in the Church of God in Ohio; but the cloud apparently dispersed" during the Eldership. On account of the transfer of Van Wert, Mercer, Darke and other border counties to the Indiana Eldership, the number of fields of labor was reduced to five.

12th Ohio Eldership.—The opposition to the General Eldership had apparently crystallized when the Ohio Eldership met in annual session "in the Smithville meeting-house, Wayne county, Ohio, on the 18th of October, 1847." On the very day of the meeting Thomas Hickernell, a member of the General Eldership in 1845, and one of the committee which drafted its Constitution, wrote: "We could get no delegates appointed to go to the General Eldership, although it was hard pleaded for by some. The idea is still held that the Constitution of the General Eldership looks too much like a discipline—that a link is now formed, and after awhile we will have a chain." They saw that co-operation means restriction of the liberty of the units; that freedom is a thing incompatible with corporate life. But they did not yet see that every advance in richness of existence, whether moral, social or ecclesiastical, is paid for by a loss of liberty. And so they decided not to put their necks under what they regarded as a yoke. There were five circuits reported, with eighteen teaching elders, five ruling elders and nine delegates. H. Rupp was in Missouri, and S. Scott, in Iowa. A. Megrew was elected Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. Hickernell had labored in Indiana since Spring, and had opened thirty appointments, with more calls; that "prospects were very flattering." His county was put into the Indiana Eldership, and he went with it for the time.

The "subject of church elders was taken into consideration; a short discussion took place, which ended in a good feeling, but no definite decision." Preachers were urged "to make tours to those places in the West where they are requesting preaching, provided no one can be gotten to go there and spend all his time in laboring in the gospel." "The Constitution of the General Eldership was reconsidered," but "after an investigation of the subject it was laid over till the next yearly meeting."

13th Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership met in the Chester meeting-house, Chester township, Wayne county, Ohio, on the 16th of October, 1848. Five circuits were reported, with fourteen pastors, and seven delegates and eleven ruling elders. Six ministers were absent. A. Megrew was elected Speaker; J. W. West, Journalising Clerk, and David Baker, Transcribing Clerk. The subject of Secret Societies was at once taken up, and a resolution adopted, that "we can not hold members identifying themselves with secret societies as members of this body." A decision was reached not to "receive charges against a member of this body from a person who has been legally expelled from any organized church."

The Eldership again took "into consideration the Constitution of the General Eldership," which had been amended in one Article in May, 1848, and "after mature deliberation, considering that body a delegated body for the transaction of general business, and it can not consistently act further than they are instructed by their constituents," the Eldership decided that it "can not accede to the present Constitution, as framed by the General Eldership; but that, nevertheless, we are in favor of a General Eldership, which shall be composed of delegates from the several Annual Elderships, and that said General Eldership shall transact such business as is of a general character and for the Annual Elderships, such as publishing books, papers, etc., but not to legislate laws for the government of either the Church or the Annual Elderships."

A committee was named "to form rules for the government of a Missionary Society." This was done, and it provided for the organization of "The Ohio Eldership Missionary and Charity Fund Society." Its object was "to employ, send out and support both domestic and foreign missionaries, and to support superannuated preachers, widows and orphans." All the details of the organization were prescribed in the eighth Article of this Constitution. Seven ministers were assigned to the six circuits, with eleven "missionagers." The members of the Eldership were instructed to "arrange their matters so as to stay one week at the next annual meeting, so as to spend more time with the brethren and friends in preaching and other religious exercises." By request of the church at Chester the ordinances were attended to on Wednesday evening.

14th Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership held its session in 1849 "in the Madisonville Bethel, Wayne county, Ohio, beginning October 15th. Abraham Hollems delivered a discourse appropriate to the occasion at 9 o'clock, from II. Cor. ii. 16." There were enrolled seventeen teaching elders, thirteen ruling elders and four delegates. Three ministers were absent. A. Megrew was elected Speaker; J. M. West, Journalizing Clerk, and Henry Murray, Transcribing Clerk. The need of Rules was evidenced by the appointment of a committee "to form Rules for the government of this Eldership." It reported eleven parliamentary or "Standing Rules." The Standing Committee was censured for not informing ——— of the reasons why his request was not granted, and therefore owe him an apology." A new Standing Committee was appointed "to consist of three teaching and two ruling elders." Each minister was required "to preach a missionary sermon at least once a year at each regular place of preaching." Ministers were "to use their utmost influence toward the establishment of Sabbath-schools." On account of more or less neglect in holding ordinance services, the Eldership directed that they be observed more frequently. Seven circuits, with nine pastors, were reported by the Stationing Committee. There were fourteen unemployed or "local" preachers, among them John S. McKee, of the U. B. Church, who received license. The ministers were "requested to write out their biographical sketches for publication." The missionary funds were guarded by directing that "no moneys be drawn out of the treasury of the Missionary Society only on the order of the Eldership; or, in the time of its recess, on the order of the Standing Committee."

15th Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership held an interesting session at Sugar Creek Bethel, Holmes county, beginning October 14, 1850. On constituting the Eldership there were five circuits and one station, on which were fifteen teaching elders, with ten ruling elders and delegates. Five teaching elders were absent. William Adams was elected Speaker; Henry Murray, Journalizing Clerk, and J. M. West, Transcribing Clerk. "Rules for this meeting" were adopted. A rule was also adopted, prohibiting any member leaving without permission. Committees were elected "by nomination." The presence of four Free-will Baptist ministers indicated the Christian fellowship between the two bodies. James Johnson, Regular Baptist, was received, a license granted him, and his name placed among the "missionaries." A "Brother Ray, of the Free-will Baptist Society, applied for a union between the Church of God and the Society with which he labors." The Eldership appointed H. Murray and B. Howard to "visit them and supply them with preaching until next Spring." In March, 1851, the Standing Committee appointed J. Dennis, member of the Eldership, "to take charge of the Washington and Middletown churches of the Free-will Baptist Association and supply them with preaching." B. Howard, Free-will Baptist, was received into the Eldership, a license voted him, and appointed to "travel as a missionary among the churches and elsewhere." He was chosen to preach the opening sermon before the Eldership in 1851. The Eldership failed to elect delegates to the General Eldership, but the Standing Committee on March 3 and on May 5, 1851, appointed five. In the case of two ministers on the Superannuated list appropriations were made to them "out of the Missionary Fund." There was still a good deal of German preaching in Ohio. On the question of fellowshiping unbaptized persons A. Megrew offered the following: "Inasmuch as this body considers it unscriptural to receive unbaptized persons into church fellowship; therefore,

"Resolved, That the ministers of the Eldership of the Church of God in Ohio teach the churches not to receive unbaptized persons into the church."

"A spirited debate" followed, after which the resolution was adopted by a vote of 15 yeas, and 9 nays. Later a motion to reconsider this action was laid on the table. This action was a little later strongly antagonized by Winebrenner in several editorials on "Terms of Church Membership." A. Megrew and James Neil were appointed "missionaries to the western country," and the former taught in Iowa the sentiments of his resolution. Positive resolutions were adopted against "the habit of traveling and visiting on the Sabbath day," and against the use of tobacco, "except as a medicine."

16th Ohio Eldership.—A peculiarity of the sixteenth annual session of the Ohio Eldership, which met "in the Bethel of the church of God in Bethlehem township, Stark county, October 20, 1851, was the preaching of the Opening Sermon after organization by the Speaker-elect, A. Hollems. J. M. West was elected Journalizing Clerk, and J. Myers, Transcribing Clerk. Of the twenty-seven ministers of the Eldership sixteen were present, with fourteen ruling elders and nine delegates. The delegates to the General Eldership were called upon to make reports, whereupon the Eldership "highly approved of the transactions of the delegates to the General Eldership, and that the plan of co-operation may be continued." Without debate, the Eldership rescinded the resolution passed in 1850 "on the subject of unbaptized church members." The churches in the counties in southern Ohio, Athens and Meigs, according to action of the General Eldership, were "received under the care of this body." They had belonged to the West Pennsylvania Eldership. Because the "preaching and proceedings of Elder B. Howard" could not all be "endorsed" by the Eldership, "we discharge him from this body, agreeably to his request." The Eldership strongly urged the publishing of a new hymn-book, and the project of removing the Printing Establishment to Wooster, Ohio, stating that they "have $570.00 subscribed for this purpose, and we expect to obtain several hundred dollars more." Action was also taken in favor of establishing "a seminary of learning in Wooster, or any other suitable place." Until such an institution is established "we would recommend the brethren to patronize Oberlin College." This was based on the ground that "not only the sciences, but the fear of God and the principles of true Christianity are taught . . . upon genuine anti-sectarian principles." The field of operation by the Eldership was divided into six circuits and one station, without making provision for the churches in Athens and Meigs counties. The Eldership voted to "become an incorporated body." E. Logue was present "as a delegate from the West Pennsylvania Eldership." In turn "this body appoint two delegates to the West Pennsylvania Eldership, to be held in the year A. D. 1852."

17th Ohio Eldership.—During the year following the Eldership of 1851 the Standing Committee made a number of changes in the circuits, and also supplied the churches in southern Ohio. When the Eldership met "in the brick Bethel of the church in Perry township, Ashland county, October 21, 1852," there were eight circuits, supplied by fifteen preachers. H. Murray was elected Speaker; J. M. West, Journalizing Clerk, and J. Myers, Transcribing Clerk. At 11 o'clock of the first session the Opening Sermon was preached, in which special stress was laid "on the unity which should exist in the Church of God in doctrine and practice." There were no permanent Rules; etc. "Standing Rules for this session were reported by the Committee to Form Rules," with an occasional special rule to meet an emergency. The irregular way in which certain matters were done at times is seen in the case of J. C. Seabrooks, a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, who was received "as a member of this body during this session," was placed on committees, offered resolutions, voted and made his report to the Eldership. The organization of Sabbath-schools was strongly urged, and the American Sunday-school Union recommended to their patronage. The "Eastern and Western Elderships" were solicited to co-operate with the Ohio Eldership in "the use of all honorable means for the establishment of a new printing press at Wooster, Ohio." Winebrenner editorially suggested in The Advocate the week following that this question "should be submitted to the decision of the General Eldership, and in their decision, under God, all should quietly acquiesce." The simple process whereby the Eldership was incorporated is embodied in an action providing for the "appointment of trustees, under Act of the Legislature, for the control of associated religious societies, and to define their privileges and duties, passed the 12th day of March, A. D. 1844." To prevent the loss or alienation of church property the churches of the Eldership were instructed "to insert a provisional clause in each deed, transferring said meeting-house or houses to the trustees of said Eldership." The "circuits of the Ohio Eldership" were also "advised to purchase a lot of land on each circuit and erect a suitable house for the use of the circuit preacher." Eleven appointments were mapped out, one being "Western Ohio," and in addition a minister was "advised to visit the churches in Athens county and preach for them, provided they will support him." The Committee on the State of Religion had stated that "we find the declension of religion amongst us owing to the inadequacy of ministerial support."

18th Ohio Eldership.—The custom of preaching the Opening Sermon of the Eldership after the organization was followed in 1853, when the Ohio Eldership met with the church in Blooming Grove, Richland county, on Monday, October 17th. There were twenty-two teaching elders present and thirteen absent; eleven ruling elders, and eight delegates. A. Holmes was elected Speaker; P. Hartman and J. Myers, Clerks. Five trustees of the Eldership were appointed under the Act of Incorporation, viz.: Samuel Metzler, David Baker, Peter Hartman, J. Myers and John Funk. Wooster church was given the privilege to supply itself with a preacher. The ministers reported a fair number of conversions and accessions to the churches, with several new churches organized, one of them near Attica, Seneca county. Henry Rupp was transferred to the Illinois Eldership, which had recently been formed; and Samuel Spohnhower to the Indiana Eldership. By resolution the Eldership advised "brethren in the ministry, both those on circuits and stations, to pay pastoral visits as often as possible to the brethren and sisters in their families, for the purpose of conversing with them on the subject of religion; praying with and for them, and give them a word of encouragement." Joseph White, of Genesee county, Mich., asked for, and received, license to preach. The Stationing Committee created a mission in Michigan, and appointed G. W. Wilson missionary. The Athens county mission was also recognized, and a missionary appointed. Seven delegates to the General Eldership were appointed. The Eldership "highly approved of the great Temperance Reform, under the name of Prohibitory Law, and urge the propriety of the church in her universal capacity to use all lawful and honorable exertions in pushing onward the great Temperance Cause." It required each licensed minister to preach one missionary sermon during each year, and to do all they can in collecting missionary money. The inadequate support of the ministers was deeply lamented.

19th Ohio Eldership.—The nineteenth annual meeting of the Ohio Eldership was held at Smithville, Wayne county, beginning October 16, 1854. From the enrollment it appears that the Wooster church had secured the services of John Hickernell, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. There were ten appointments, with Athens county and the Michigan Mission not on the list. The Stationing Committee at the close of the session reduced these to eight. The officers of the Eldership were Henry Murray, Speaker; Jacob Myers, Journalizing Clerk, and J. M. West, Transcribing Clerk. Abraham Hollems preached the Opening Sermon after organization. Troubles of various kinds developed at this Eldership, as during former Elderships, there being charges preferred in many instances without previous notice. This resulted in the adoption of a Rule that "no charges shall be brought against a member of this body, except he be previously consulted." Again the question, "Is it scriptural and according to the apostolic practice to receive unbaptized believers into the local churches of God?" was offered and discussed by G. W. Wilson, John Hickernell and A. Hollems in the affirmative; and J. S. McKee, Henry Murray and T. H. Deshiri in the negative. It was then laid on the table. A resolution respecting secret societies was also laid on the table, and it was declared that "the resolution prohibiting the members of this body from identifying themselves with secret societies be considered advisory." The ordinances were observed, after a sermon preached by Jacob Myers. Moses Coates had the best report, as he "traveled over 3,500 miles, preached 295 times, and baptized 125 believers in Christ." The Missionary Society reported the total amount received by collections and from Life Members to be $296.29. The Eldership declared that it "has the authority to insist on the churches to support their preachers completely; therefore, if they fail to do so, to regard them as delinquent, and take measures to correct the evil." It also directed its Stationing Committee "to meet immediately after supper, in the school-house," and "that no person be admitted in the room with it."

20th Ohio Eldership.—Harn still a member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, but pastor at Wooster, had the Eldership in Ohio to provide for which convened at Wooster, October 15, 1855, at 9 a. m. Monday. The Opening Sermon was preached that "evening at candle-lighting," by G. W. Wilson. There were ten fields of labor, two being missions, and Wooster station. Nineteen ministers were in attendance; fifteen were absent, and fourteen ruling elders and delegates were enrolled. Wm. Adams was chosen Speaker; J. Myers, First Clerk, and J. M. West, Second Clerk. The Eldership provided for the preaching of special sermons in 1856, on Systematic Beneficence, by G. U. Harn, and on Education, by G. W. Wilson. The state of religion "as far as the bounds of the Ohio Eldership extend" was reported "heart-cheering." The change of Eldership title came before the body in the form of a resolution from the Committee on Resolutions; but it was voted down, the vote being 8 to 10. A "Memorial" was addressed to the Eldership, signed by six sisters, members of the church at Wooster, petitioning it "to take an action relative to the using of tobacco, the use of which creates so much filth in our Bethels and around our firesides." And the Eldership by resolution declared that it "approbates the sentiments of the above memorial." The initial action was taken to form an Eldership in western Ohio, by recommending the matter to the General Eldership. There were eight circuits, one station and four missions mapped out by the Stationing Committee. To each mission a small amount was appropriated out of the Missionary treasury, which contained $211.67. There were nineteen ministers who had no appointments from the Eldership. Each of these was assigned to a mission, two of which were in Michigan, and others in Jefferson, Ashland, Wayne, Hancock, Seneca, Wyandot, Richland and Van Wert counties.

21st Ohio Eldership.—The Ohio Eldership of 1856 convened near Reedsburg, at the Brick Bethel, on Monday morning, October 20th, when twenty-five ministers and fourteen ruling elders and delegates answered to their names. Then ministers were absent. These twenty-five ministers were located on fourteen fields. James Neil was chosen Speaker; L. B. Hartman, Journalizing Clerk, and J. Myers, Transcribing Clerk. The "opening discourse" was ordered to be preached in the evening of the first day. The effect of Harn's teaching on Eldership titles was indicated in a resolution from the Committee on Resolutions, of which he was a member, which recommended, "that the letters 'es' be added to the word 'Church' in the sentence of the Journal designating the title of the Eldership, so as to read, 'Eldership of the churches of God, in Ohio.'" The resolution was adopted by a vote of 25 to 8. The same Committee also reported a resolution directing ministers to use the singular form, "doctrine," instead of the plural, as in the phrases "doctrines of Christ," "doctrines of the Bible," which was adopted. But a resolution changing "the reading of our preachers' licenses," so that instead of assuming the nature of Episcopal Authority, it would assume rather the form and appearance of a writing of recommendation," was postponed one year. And a resolution in favor of the laying on of hands in ordination was voted down. The support of ministers was so small as to call out serious complaints, and induced the Committee on the State of Religion to say: "This must not continue so any longer; the minister must be supported." The recommendation to the General Eldership to organize a "Western Ohio Eldership" was repeated. The Eldership placed itself unequivocally on record on the question of the "extension of slavery over the Territory of Kansas." In its opinion such an attempt was "a warfare upon Christianity." Disapproving of the "Ohio Liquor Law," it requested "the next Congress of the United States to enact a law prohibiting the importation of foreign intoxicating liquors into this country, contrary to any of the prohibitory laws of the several States." The "ministers and members" were advised "carefully to refrain from all evil speaking and writing, on pain of being dealt with according to the discipline of the Bible."

22nd Ohio Eldership.—Without authority from the General Eldership, the Journal records the meeting of "the Eldership of the churches of God at Madisonburg, Wayne county, on Monday, October 5, 1857." There were fifteen pastors representing the eight circuits, two stations and five missions. Twenty-two teaching elders were absent. J. S. McKee was chosen Speaker; L. B. Hartman, Journalizing Clerk, and M. Beck, Transcribing Clerk. By resolution the Opening Sermon "be now preached, which was done, in the course of two hours and a half, with much assurance and power," by the Speaker just elected. The Eldership insisted on annual examinations of all the ministers "in at least the following studies: Orthography, Grammar, Logic, Philosophy, Rhetoric, Chemistry, Astronomy, Anatomy and Hygiene and Moral or Ethical Sciences." The "doings of the General Eldership were endorsed." "The brethren of the Eastern Ohio Eldership" were "requested to meet with our Western brethren in the organization of the new Eldership." To authorize the publication of sermons delivered at Elderships in The Advocate, so usual in the East Pennsylvania Eldership, was introduced in Ohio, and McKee was requested to send in his opening sermon for that purpose, as was Wilson his sermon on Education, and Harn his on The Commission. Stimulated by the memorial of the sisters in 1856, the Eldership resolved "that all our ministers quit the filthy usage of chewing tobacco."

23rd East Ohio Eldership.—The Eldership in the eastern part of the State is now known as the East Ohio Eldership; but it continues as the successor of the Ohio Eldership, and so the body which assembled at Sugar Creek, Holmes county, Ohio, October 4, 1858, was the twenty-third meeting of the East Ohio Eldership.

It also retains the plural form of the title. It was reduced by the division to nineteen ministers, of whom five were absent; six circuits, one station and one mission. The election for officers resulted in the choice of J. Myers, Speaker; L. B. Hartman, First Clerk, and G. W. Wilson, Second Clerk. The Board of Missions was an outside organization, and so "its members were elected to seats in this body during its sessions." The Stationing Committee was composed of "one from each station and circuit." A new form of license was adopted, which certified "that _____ is a minister of the gospel in good standing in the East Ohio Eldership of the churches of God, and that we believe him qualified to discharge the duties and functions of his office." While the Eldership declared that it "does disagree with Elder J. Winebrenner in his views on slavery," it invited him "to become a member of this body, and heartily urge him, if possible, to move into our midst." It also expressed its "regard for him as a scholar, a gentleman and a Christian." Contrary to Winebrenner's views, the Eldership declared that "we cannot conscientiously and religiously unite in Christian and Church fellowship with any man or woman who persists in the sinful practice of buying and selling any human being in the bondage of slavery." And so also the Eldership could not "assist by contributions, or otherwise, any missionary operation which teaches that slaveholders are scriptural members of a church of Jesus Christ." But it at the same time strongly disapproved of an attack on Winebrenner on his views on slavery, calling said attack "injudicious, ungenerous and ungenteel." It also placed itself on record as unequivocally in favor of "prohibition as applied to the traffic of intoxicating liquors for common beverage." It appointed "the first day of January next as a day of fasting and prayer." All the Elderships were urged to use the plural form, "Churches of God." The territory of the Eldership was divided into one station, four circuits and one mission.

24th East Ohio Eldership.—The church near Reedsburg, Brick Bethel, Ashland county, Ohio, entertained the East Ohio Eldership which convened Wednesday, October 19, 1859. No session was held in the forenoon because "the brethren were slow in getting in." Eleven teaching elders responded at the Roll call, and ten ruling elders. Nine teaching elders were absent. G. W. Wilson was chosen Speaker; M. Beck, First Clerk, and J. S. McKee, Second Clerk. The Eldership had no permanent Rules of Order, and so adopted Rules reported by a committee. This being the session prior to the meeting of the General Eldership, the delegates to that body were "instructed to oppose any and every attempt to bring that body into a compromise, co-operation or religious fellowship with slaveholders." This was in harmony with the views of the Eldership "that slavery under all possible, probable and conceivable circumstances is necessarily sinful, and a sin against God and humanity." The Eldership was unanimous in "recommending to the General Eldership the propriety of assuming the title General Eldership of churches of God in North America." The Eldership was not ready to direct that ministers move to their new fields in the Fall. It was emphatic in its endorsement of Prohibition. Christmas was designated as "a day of fasting and prayer." A "Constitution of the East Ohio Eldership Contingent Fund" was adopted, and each minister in charge of a station or circuit was required to "collect ten cents for" this fund. Shippensburg Institute and Oberlin College were recommended to the brotherhood. The territory was divided into four circuits, one station and one mission, to which eight ministers were assigned.

25th East Ohio Eldership.—The East Ohio Eldership, which assembled at New Berlin, Stark county, Ohio, October 1, 1860, had no opening sermon preached, but William Adams "opened the session by religious exercises." There were fifteen teaching elders present from five circuits and one mission, and eleven ruling elders and delegates. Nine teaching elders were absent. G. U. Harn was elected Speaker; L. B. Hartman, First Clerk, and J. Richards, Second Clerk. A new Rule was added, prohibiting members leaving without favorable action by the body. The Eldership made an effort "to extricate the Wooster church from their pecuniary difficulties in relation to their house of worship," and named a committee for that purpose. The Committee on Slavery, M. Beck, J. Beidler and S. Metzler, reported briefly, but radically, declaring the Eldership's "uncompromising opposition to the existence and further extension of slavery," and resolving "that we will use all possible lawful means, both at the ballot box and in the pulpit, for its ultimate abolition." It was an inauspicious time for such a resolution, and "after some warm discussion the yeas and nays were called, and it was lost—13 yeas and 14 nays. Then the resolutions of 1859 were adopted and "inserted in the Journal." In general terms the "use of spirituous liquors was condemned, and the Eldership pledged against its manufacture, even declaring against "selling our grain to the distillers, for them to convert into a curse." The death of Winebrenner was feelingly recorded as that of a man "whose ministerial career as a reformer, evangelist and Christian has ever shone as a star in the constellation of his age with unsurpassed brilliancy." Harn was requested to deliver a discourse on the life of Winebrenner the same evening, and did so, from Acts. viii. 2. Funeral sermons were also directed to be preached in all the churches of the Eldership. The erection of a suitable monument by the different Elderships was favored. Less than $100 missionary money was raised during the year. The old Board was excused, a new Board appointed and a committee created to "draft a new Constitution for the Board of Missions." The conversion of "about one hundred and thirty" was reported. To supply the "need felt in many places, in towns where we have no houses of worship and at camp-meetings" a project was matured to secure "a large and commodious canvas tent." The necessity of education was emphasized as a means of protection and prosperity. Five circuits, one station and one mission were arranged for.

26th Ohio Eldership.—When the Eldership adjourned in 1860, it did so to meet at Vermillion, on the Richland circuit, on October 28, 1861. It was a session at which "there was more love and union manifested by the brotherhood" than its Clerk ever recollected. There were however, some "fiery ordeals of investigation" of which no public record was made. The Journal was directed to be "published in pamphlet with the Journals of all the other Elderships," a plan the East Ohio "Eldership adopted, as suggested by our Editor," but which failed to be put into effect. M. Beck was Speaker; L. B. Hartman, First Clerk, and J. Myers, Second Clerk. The Clerk revealed his own enthusiastic patriotism in the statement that "the Committee on the National Crisis," whose names are not furnished, "appeared in patriotic and sanguine colors. Their report will be read with interest and enthusiasm by thousands of liberty-loving citizens." To save the house of worship at Dalton collections were required to be lifted immediately at every church. The new Constitution of the Missionary Society was adopted, and was deemed of such importance that "it should be actually studied by every member of the churches of this Eldership." Oliver, Myers, Beck, McKee and Hartman were assigned to the five fields of labor.

27th East Ohio Eldership.—The Eldership which met at Mechanicsburg (Winfield), Tuscarawas county, Ohio, Monday, October 2, 1862, realized the failure of the plan to publish all the Journals in one pamphlet or book, and so declared that "The Advocate being established for the purpose of publishing all the Eldership Journals and other Church documents" "all the families of the Church should feel it their duty to patronize it." The Eldership organized by electing L. B. Hartman, Speaker, and J. Myers, Clerk. A church organization was reported at Crestline, Crawford county. Louis Kraft, general missionary of the German Eldership, was made a member of the body during its session. His labors were confined to the German people, among whom he had preached one hundred and seventy-six sermons. The church at Smithville was advised "to build a meeting-house on a large plan, with an upper story for a school." While "it appears that some souls have been gathered into the churches, and some new places have been opened up, the cause has dwindled away in part at other places." The "Committee on the National Crisis," Beck, McKee and Beldler, characterized the war "as one of self-defense, in favor of the preservation of constitutional liberty, for free speech, free press, free homes and all the freedom peculiar to our free institutions," and so the "war inaugurated for the preservation of these has our unqualified approbation." They endorsed and highly approved the President's Emancipation Proclamation. "Young men expecting to enter the ministry" were urged "to attend to the educating of their minds and storing them with all necessary knowledge so as to make themselves proficient and acceptable among the churches and people."

28th East Ohio Eldership.—L. B. Hartman on Sunday evening, October 25, 1863, preached the Opening Sermon of the session of the East Ohio Eldership which began its twenty-eighth session at Smithville, Wayne county, Ohio, on Monday morning, the 26th. J. Myers was elected to preside, and J. H. Hartman to record the Minutes. There were ten teaching elders present, and nine absent, with fifteen ruling elders and two delegates. The Stationing Committee, "appointed by acclamation," consisted of "one from each circuit and station," making six, of which four were laymen. The Illinois Eldership is given credit for having "undertaken to establish a mission in the great city of Chicago," and as Chicago is "a great commercial center, and in short one of earth's high places," hence the Eldership resolved "to encourage the enterprise with our means, our influence and our prayers." Intemperance being characterized as "this abominable compound of crimes and vices," the Eldership deplored "the want of a downright, positive prohibition law." The "Committee on National Crisis" declared that the "avowed purpose" of "the armed traitors" in rebelling against the government is "to overturn the fabric of free government, and rear another whose great statute is that capital shall own labor." To "crush the infamous conspiracy is the will of God," and the "work when done will break yokes and fetters from the neck of slaves, and become the terrible argument of the righteous Lord against all oligarchies, aristocracies and slave powers." Slavery being "the cause and power of the rebellion," the Eldership regarded "the Proclamation of freedom as the ax laid at the root of the tree." The Committee believed in the use of the negro in the army, and also deemed it "the duty of the gospel minister to use all his efforts, private and public, in order to create a sound public opinion concerning the great issues now agitating the American people." M. Beck, J. S. McKee and M. Stevens were the Committee, and their Report was sustained. L. B. Hartman, M. Laird and M. Stevens, "Committee on Rules of Order, or System of Co-operation," reported a Constitution "for the better government of our deliberations and success of our co-operative plans," which was "considered item by item, and adopted as a whole." The title of the body is "The East Ohio Eldership of the Churches of God." The membership is to consist of "all ministers holding a regular license from this body, together with all the ruling elders representing the churches within its bounds." Or "any church may, in lieu of one or more elders, send a delegate, who shall be entitled to the same privileges as ruling elders." "All members of the Board of Missions, and also the Board of Incorporation, shall be considered ex-officio members of this body." The organization, duties of officers, sessions, order of debate, and voting are made parts of the Constitution, being Articles IV., V., VI., VII., VIII., IX., X. A Stationing Committee of one from each circuit and station is provided for. The Standing Committee is to "consist of three or five, as may be ordered." "It shall have all the rights and authority of the Eldership" when the latter is not in session. Licenses are to be renewed yearly. Transfers either by or to the Eldership are to be "in force and valid not more than fourteen months" from their date of issue. A Board of Trustees of the Eldership is provided for, consisting of five members, which shall hold their offices five years, or until their successors are elected. Said Board is to have charge of all the funds, notes, bonds, etc., belonging to the Eldership. The duties of ministers are carefully defined in eighteen sections of the last Article, some of which are at least considered as insinuations that virtues enumerated were not a common possession. And "all members and churches which fail to comply with these Rules of Order or Co-operation shall be liable to rebuke, suspension or expulsion, as the case may require, by the Eldership." The Eldership requested the East Pennsylvania Eldership and Dr. George Ross to supply Wooster with a pastor. The Eldership expressed its readiness "heartily to acquiesce with the General Eldership in all its plans to gather funds for the erection of such a monument as will manifest all due respect and honor of that great reformer of the nineteenth century, Elder John Winebrenner."

29th East Ohio Eldership.—If the stringent provisions of the Constitution were to be a prophylactic against certain evils which were gradually developing in the East Ohio Eldership, the result was disappointing. The Eldership which convened with the church at Reedsburg, Ashland county, Ohio, became painfully aware of this. This is seen in the licenses placed in the hands of the Standing Committee, the difficulties in several of the churches, the lack of support of pastors, which threatened to "silence ministers and compel them to resort to secular pursuits for subsistence," and the spirit of insubordination manifested in sundry places. The Eldership met on Monday morning, October 17, 1864. A. H. Long, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, but pastor at Wooster, preached the Opening Sermon on Sabbath evening previous. Besides Long, C. H. Forney, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, was also in attendance throughout the session. The former was placed on the Committee on Temperance, Overtures, Resolutions, Education, National Crisis and Stationing; the latter on those on State of Religion, Education, National Crisis, and the late G. U. Harn. J. S. McKee was elected Speaker, and P. Hartman, Clerk. Positive action was taken against "countenancing the iniquity of intemperance by the use of intoxicating drinks, by selling grain or fruit to distillers or their agents, by trafficking in ardent spirits, or by signing the rum-seller's petition for a license." Any who do any of these things were to be disciplined, "and if they will not reform, that they be excommunicated." The numerical strength of the churches "has not been much augmented" during the year; the "spirituality is rather low," and "the necessity of revivals of religion among God's people everywhere is very apparent." The "want of cordial co-operation between different members and churches for trifling reasons in sustaining the gospel ministry and advancing the cause," "cannot but meet with unqualified disapproval." Such were statements embodied in the Report of the Committee on the State of Religion. Four circuits and two stations were mapped out and supplied by the Stationing Committee. While the amount of available funds in the treasury of the Board of Missions was only $193.88, the amount of invested subscriptions of life and honorary members of the Society was $1,600.00.

30th East Ohio Eldership.—Already at the session of the East Ohio Eldership which convened at Sugar Creek, Holmes county, Ohio, October 30, 1865, there were public indications of a tendency to reunite the two Ohio Elderships. There were unrest, friction and dissatisfaction in East Ohio, and a consequent want of zeal and of success. There was one station reported and five circuits, with Mansfield Mission. A. H. Long was chosen Speaker, and L. B. Hartman, Clerk. A committee was present from the West Ohio Eldership to canvass the question of the consolidation of the two Elderships; but after the matter was carefully considered it was "indefinitely postponed," and "a Visiting Committee, consisting of L. B. Hartman, M. Beck, J. S. McKee, A. H. Long, J. Myers and W. H. Oliver, was appointed to meet with the West Ohio Eldership with a view to cultivate acquaintance, familiarity, sociability and Christian fellowship." The Eldership declared it as "the deliberate and earnest conviction of the body, that the preacher in charge of a church, together with the ruling elders and deacons constitute the eldership of the local church, holding, however, that the presence of the deacons is not essential, but only discretionary." The duties of this eldership were stated to be "to rule the church, conduct religious services, receive and discipline members, expel the immoral and incorrigible." Rejoicing that the "war of gigantic proportions has closed in our land," it acknowledged "a debt of everlasting gratitude to God for saving and protecting us from our enemies both North and South, domestic and foreign;" rejoiced over the downfall of American slavery," and pledged its "zealous and Christian efforts for the intellectual, moral and political amelioration" of the ex-slaves. For a "professor of Christianity to traffic in intoxicating liquors, or to sell grain or in any other way to aid the cause of intemperance," the Eldership pronounced "highly imprudent." It more strongly favored "the purchasing or establishing of an institution of learning under the control of the Church." The "preaching of doctrines strongly tinged with Calvinism, as the final perseverance of the saints, etc.," it declared "we disapprove and discountenance in the strongest possible terms." It specifically named the sermon preached at the East Pennsylvania Eldership on the perseverance of the saints "several weeks since, as containing doctrine antagonistic to the teaching of the Bible, and contrary to the principles of the Church of God, believing that all such doctrines are heterodox." The "cause of religion has somewhat advanced," was the Report of the Committee on the State of Religion, "although not so materially and extensively as we desired to see," and "the spirituality of the Church is rather low." Six new Honorary Life Members, at $100.00 each, were secured at this meeting of the Eldership. Each preacher was instructed to preach "a sermon at each point on his charge on the subject of education, and the importance of having a college in our midst." By resolution, the Eldership notified the churches that "we adopt the custom of changing ministers immediately at the adjournment of the Eldership, to take effect immediately after the next Annual Eldership."

31st East Ohio Eldership.—Fourteen ministers and eight ruling elders and delegates constituted the Eldership which convened at West Union, Wayne county, Ohio, October 29, 1866. Six ministers were absent. The election resulted in the choice of J. Beidler for Speaker, and B. L. Davies, Clerk. The Eldership at once adopted a substitute in place of the resolution of 1865, declaring that "the preacher in charge of a church, together with the ruling elders, constitute the eldership of the local church." But it also adopted a resolution, advising local church councils "to avoid as much as possible meetings for the settlement of petty disputes between brethren." The delegates to the General Eldership made a report in which they "congratulated the brotherhood upon its important and timely doings;" that said body "at its late meeting awoke to a higher tone of improvement, and took a loftier stand in the field of progress than ever before," inviting "the attention of the churches in East Ohio particularly to the college movement." Provision was made "to issue a local preacher's license," which authorized the holder "to preach the gospel and attend to all other duties of his office, except to administer the ordinances, organize churches and solemnize marriages." J. L. Jenner, a United Brethren minister, received license, and an appropriation of $200.00 was made to him to establish a mission in Canada West. The course of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, was denounced in strong terms, as "derelict to the great cause of freedom and human rights." The Course of Studies of the East Pennsylvania Eldership was recommended to all the ministers, and directing examinations therein." The organization of Bible classes was made the duty of each minister in charge of a circuit or station. All preachers were also advised "in the discharge of their ministerial duties in the pulpit to repeat the Lord's Prayer more frequently as a part of their worship, especially on the Sabbath day." The translation of the American Bible Union was "recommended to our people as a true transcript of the original Hebrew and Greek." J. B. Soule, East Pennsylvania Eldership, was appointed to Wooster station, and plans were matured to liquidate the debt on the bethel.

32nd East Ohio Eldership.—The Opening Sermon of the Eldership which convened in the bethel at Greensburg, Summit county, Ohio, November 4, 1867, was delivered by J. B. Soule, of Wooster, but member of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, from Acts ix. 8. The first sitting of the Eldership was on Monday morning, when a ballot resulted in the election of D. Blakely, West Pennsylvania Eldership, for Speaker; B. L. Davies, First Clerk, and J. B. Soule, Second Clerk. As the General Eldership had made "a request that each Annual Eldership appropriate funds for contingent expenses," each pastor was required "to collect as much money from each appointment as will in the aggregate amount to ten cents per member" for that purpose. Later it was agreed to "form a Contingent Society to raise funds for the purpose of defraying these expenses." The state of religion was not very good, yet "the Lord has owned his word in the conversion of sinners. And while we regret that some local churches have become disorganized, but we rejoice that others have been organized elsewhere." The expediency of opening new mission fields was discussed, but no definite action taken. On the state of the country the Eldership recognized that we are still in a condition of "political strife and sectional discord, arising from the continued dereliction of the Chief Executive;" that "in this crisis of our country arising from the decision of the great question of reconstruction our hope is still in God and a loyal and faithful Congress and an incorruptible and liberty-loving people." On education, the Committee referred the Eldership to "sentiments expressed heretofore." The Eldership was quite deficient in active ministers. L. B. Hartman had been appointed College Agent, and then located in East Pennsylvania. Wooster station was unsupplied, as was West Lebanon, Upper Sugar Creek and Stump's Bethel charge, and D. Blakely had not united with the Eldership. The other preachers assigned to fields were S. Lilley, L. H. Selby (also not a member), W. H. Oliver, M. Beck and J. S. McKee.

33rd East Ohio Eldership.—Upon inquiry, Editor Thomas in September, 1868, stated, that as The Advocate has "now so much more space than heretofore. . . it will be best to publish the Eldership Journals in full." So this was done by all the Elderships. The East Ohio Eldership met at Reedsburg, Ashland county, Ohio, October 3, 1868, with thirteen teaching elders and eighteen ruling elders and delegates. The officers were M. Beck, Speaker; J. Durstine, Clerk, and J. L. Jenner, Assistant Clerk. The interest of the body in the translation of the American Bible Union was again manifested in the declaration that it "will sustain and encourage it in its commendable effort to translate correctly and faithfully into all the languages this inestimable gift of heaven to mankind." It resolved "to battle against the evil of intemperance in every Christian and lawful manner." J. Myers, Mansfield, in his report suggested the establishment of a mission in Mansfield, county seat of Richland county. The Eldership responded by resolving that "the time has fully come to open a mission in Mansfield;" pledging $500.00 for that purpose; that "the mission shall be opened by the first of April, 1869," and directing the Board of Missions "to take measures to make the project a practical success." The Eldership emphatically repudiated "the nick-name 'Winebrennerians' as unchristian and uncourteous, and in direct opposition to the spirit of Christian union," and that "the name 'Church of God' is the only God-given and scripturally-authorized Church title." A committee was appointed "to confer with the church at Wooster on the propriety of selling the meeting-house and property, paying off the debt thereon, and building a new house with the remaining proceeds." S. Fastig, of the Baptist Association, reporting as an advisory member, inspired the Eldership by "frankly endorsing the doctrine of the Church of God in full, and admitting the Baptist Church to be in the rear, and calling upon the brotherhood to give their friendly aid in bringing the Regular Baptist Church up to and on an equal footing with the Church of God," and the Eldership resolved "that all efforts on the part of the Baptist Church and brethren in that direction have our timely and brotherly aid." Feeling that "the doctrine of the Church of God is misunderstood by the multitude generally, and greatly misrepresented," the Committee on Arrangements was directed "at our several Eldership meetings to fill the pulpit with representative men, or Church of God ministers who will preach the truth as it is in Jesus." The Eldership selected Smithville as the place for the Pentecostal meeting in 1869. J. M. Domer, of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, was appointed to Wooster. Ministers were assigned to two circuits, leaving two unsupplied, and making no appointments to any mission fields.

34th East Ohio Eldership.—The Journal of the thirty-fourth East Ohio Eldership, which convened at Vermillion Chapel, Ashland county, October 15, 1869, shows that J. M. Domer did not go to Wooster, but that O. H. Betts was appointed by the Standing Committee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The Eldership consisted of three pastors, five teaching elders, ten ruling elders, two delegates and one messenger when constituted. It elected J. S. McKee, Speaker; B. L. Davies, Clerk; J. Durstine, Assistant Clerk. The question of "the consolidation of the East and West Ohio Elderships was at once taken up and discussed with great interest and sincerity until adjourning time," when it was laid over until 2.00 p. m. the next day, when, on motion of G. W. Wilson, "it was resolved to put the question straight." "After some further debate the question was carried in the affirmative by a rising vote of twelve to nine," and the matter referred to the Standing Committee. "Memorial services on the life and death of Elder E. H. Thomas" were held and "a discourse delivered by J. S. McKee to a large and weeping congregation." Text—I. Thess. iv. 14. The Committee on the State of Religion reported "no extensive outpourings of the Holy Spirit, yet the work has been going steadily on." The Mansfield mission had not been started; but the Board of Missions was instructed "to pay a visit to Mansfield and make arrangements for the establishing of said mission." J. W. Senseney was also assigned to the Mansfield and Shelby Mission. The Board of Missions also made an appropriation of $200.00 to the Mansfield and Shelby Mission. Wooster church having "turned their eyes to the East Pennsylvania Eldership as the hill from whence they expected their salvation, and have been disappointed," "they now return to our embrace, and promise to co-operate with the East Ohio Eldership in all constitutional measures," instructions were given to the trustees of the property, in connection with the Standing Committee, to arrange for the payment of the debt. The request for a pastor was referred to the Stationing Committee, which appointed M. Beck, with an appropriation of $200.00 from the Board of Missions. B. F. Beck was appointed to Smithville and Madison; but having a charge in East Pennsylvania Eldership, he did not accept it.

35th East Ohio Eldership.—The brief history of a young minister of the Church, whose labors were but of short duration, begins with the meeting of the East Ohio Eldership at Smithville, Wayne county, Ohio, October 7, 1870. The Minutes have this entry: "Rev. Alex. Wiley, of the M. E. Church, was received as an advisory member." When the Committee on License reported two brethren "as worthy of licenses from this body," one was A. Wiley. He was appointed to Sugar Creek circuit. But in October, 1871, he came into the East Pennsylvania Eldership, where he labored faithfully to the end of his earthly days. The Opening Sermon was deferred from the evening of the 6th to that of the 7th, "owing to the absence of many of the members of the Eldership." During the first day the regular business was transacted, beginning with constituting the Eldership, electing G. W. Wilson, Speaker, and J. B. Hartman, Clerk, and hearing the Report of the Standing Committee. G. W. Wilson was appointed to preach the Opening Sermon on the evening of said day, which he did from II. Tim. ii. 2—"The Minister—his authority, qualifications, rights and duties." In order to secure a better support for the pastors it was directed "that in the beginning of the Eldership year the elders and deacons shall ascertain from their pastor the amount required to sustain him properly, and said officers shall levy a quota on each member according to his or her ability, or as the Lord has prospered, to be paid weekly, monthly or quarterly to the treasurer of the minister's salary." The Eldership voted "to support no man, whatever his political proclivities may be, for a position of trust in our civil government without he pledges, in good faith, to labor and vote for any and all measures looking toward the suppression of the abominable liquor traffic." On ordination it granted each licentiate the choice to be ordained with the imposition of hands. To increase the missionary funds each male church member was "required to pay the sum of $1.00, and each female member the sum of 50 cents annually" for missions. The Eldership denounced "the modern heresy and new-fangled skepticism now so prevalent in many places, to wit: Materialism, or that the soul and spirit are mortal by nature; The unconscious state of the dead, and The Annihilation of the wicked. It favored holding a Sabbath-school Convention, and named Smithville as the place.

36th East Ohio Eldership.—The appointee, J. S. McKee, to preach the Opening Sermon, being absent, T. H. Deshieri, a visiting minister of the West Ohio Eldership, "preached an able and affectionate sermon," followed by G. W. Wilson with "an exhortation full of zeal and the Holy Ghost." The session was held at Greensburg, Summit county, Ohio, beginning October 12, 1871. When on the morning of the 13th the Eldership was constituted, J. S. McKee was present, and was chosen Speaker, and O. H. Betts and J. H. Hartman, Clerks. McKee was then directed to "preach the annual sermon at 10 o'clock," the second day. At a missionary meeting on Saturday afternoon, and also in the evening, when $1,011.74 were secured in Life subscriptions and cash. In addition to the action of 1870 not to vote for any candidate for office who is not an avowed friend to anti-liquor legislation, the Eldership resolved not to "patronize any man in the business relations of life who is engaged in the sale of intoxicating drinks." It also endorsed "the idea thrown out by some of our brethren of holding a General Sunday-school Convention next season." After its action on "heresies and new-fangled skepticism," in 1870, the Eldership could not do otherwise than cite M. Beck to trial for holding and teaching such views. The Stationing Committee arranged for two stations, five circuits and two missions.

37th East Ohio Eldership.—The Eldership in 1871 adjourned to meet at Lattasburg, Wayne county, Ohio, the third Wednesday in October, 1872; but the place was changed, and the session was held in the Vermillion Chapel, Ashland county, Ohio, beginning October 16, 1872, when L. H. Selby preached the Opening Sermon from I. Chronicles xxvii. 16. J. S. McKee was re-elected Speaker, as was O. H. Betts, Clerk, with J. A. Plowman, Transcribing Clerk. The Beck case came up immediately, and was referred to a committee. The matter was adjusted by a compromise, whereby he was retained in full fellowship, but granting him his request "to retain the views in which he differed from the body as private property." He was reappointed to the Canton mission, as he was "commended" in a letter from the mission, and "his services for the coming year" asked for. The Eldership voted to aid the cause of temperance "by moral suasion and the ballot box." It "hailed with devout congratulations the great enterprise of holding a yearly Sabbath-school Convention throughout the different Elderships." It declared itself financially "not able to meet, for the present, the demands of the General Eldership relating to the general missionary interests," owing to its own "heavy missionary demands." While it approved the action of the General Eldership relative to the Hillsdale College Professorship, it more strongly recommended "an effort to establish a school of our own." A committee of five was appointed to superintend the Eldership camp-meeting, which it resolved to hold. A strong effort was to be made to place Mansfield mission on a good financial basis, and to this end a "general missionary and financial agent to operate in the interest of the Mansfield Mission" was put in the field, and the ministers were instructed to co-operate with him in "the hope of the greatest possible success." The Eldership had nine fields of labor, three of which were missions.

38th East Ohio Eldership.—Evidently the covenant into which the Eldership entered with M. Beck in 1872 was kept sacred by him, for not only did he preach the Opening Sermon on Tuesday evening, October 7, 1873, when the Eldership convened at Lattasburg, Wayne county, Ohio, but he was chosen to be the Clerk of the body, with G. W. Wilson, Speaker, and was reappointed to Canton and Moreland. A weakness in the missionary system was the non-payment of interest on life memberships, by means of which it had been hoped steadily to replenish the treasury year after year. Accordingly it was ordered that "the outstanding dues on life membership be put into the hands of an attorney for collection." The Mansfield debt was $4,000, and the Board of Missions was "authorized to borrow the money necessary to carry on the Mansfield mission, and give the property as security." The elders and deacons of the churches were declared "answerable to the local churches for their moral and official conduct," and charges could be preferred against them, "subject to investigation and trial by the church." By vote of "a majority of her membership voting" they could be "dismissed from their office," and even "expelled from the church." The "cause is still advancing" was the report of the Committee on the State of Religion. There was declared to be "a disposition to insubordination among some of the churches in the East Ohio Eldership," which was "highly disapproved," and "churches and ministers are advised to refrain from such a course of conduct."

39th East Ohio Eldership.—The forebodings of the Eldership of 1873 became more threatening as the months passed. And when the Eldership convened at Cedar Valley, Wayne county, Ohio, October 6, 1874, the clouds were lowering. With McKee in the Chair, and Plowman as Clerk, the first important item of business was the Report of the Standing Committee, which contained items revealing insubordination. But the "Eldership recognized the present Standing Committee as our regularly constituted and official Committee, and endorse their doings as official." The spark, however, which caused the explosion was "a letter from his brother, B. F. Beck, which M. Beck read before this body, speaking in a very unchristianlike manner, and stigmatizing the corroborators of the Standing Committee of the East Ohio Eldership." On March 4, 1874, the Standing Committee was in session to investigate "charges it held against Beck for persistently violating the Rules of Co-operation, and also for preaching doctrines not accepted by the Church of God." As he failed to appear and answer to the charges, the Committee, "feeling convinced under these circumstances, not only of Elder M. Beck's guilt, but that he ignored alike their authority and that of the Eldership," declared him to be "unworthy of membership in the Church of God," and that "he be, and is, expelled from among us, and that his license to preach among us is null and void." This called forth the offensive letter. But the Committee was sustained, yet not without the alienation of parts of several churches, and especially of the churches at Canton and near Reedsburg. The Canton mission remained unsupplied by the Eldership. Mansfield mission was thrown in with the Ashland circuit appointments. The resolutions of censure on B. F. Beck were sent to the East Pennsylvania Eldership of which he was a member, and the matter was satisfactorily adjusted, as offensive sentiments were retracted and misapprehensions corrected.

40th East Ohio Eldership.—With hardly any premonitory signs visible to those outside the East Ohio Eldership the final session of said body was held at Vermillion, Ashland county, Ohio, beginning October 5, 1875. The work of disintegration seemed to have begun, and consolidation with the West Ohio Eldership was regarded as the part of prudence and wisdom. The Eldership quietly met as usual and John A. Plowman preached the Opening Sermon from Ps. cxviii. 25. There were in attendance fifteen teaching elders, of whom eight are classed as pastors; thirty-two ruling elders; five delegates, and one trustee. G. W. Wilson was chosen Speaker, and J. A. Plowman, Clerk. The entire Standing Committee of the West Ohio Eldership was present, and the members, consisting of J. W. Aukerman, James Neil, I. Steiner, T. Koogle and S. Kline, were received as full members. Wilson, Mitchel and McKee "were appointed a committee to present to this body the consolidation of the East and West Ohio Elderships in a tangible form for action." All the usual committees were appointed by the Speaker; but no Stationing Committee was elected. The Committee on Temperance declared "intemperance in all its forms a great sin;" that "we in every way discountenance the manufacture and use of all intoxicating liquors," and advised "abstinence from the use of tobacco as far as practicable." A school at Ida, Hardin county, "being offered upon reasonable terms," it was thought advisable to secure it. The Committee on Consolidation reported: "Resolved, That the East Ohio Eldership, with its interests, be transferred to the West Ohio Eldership." It was thought advisable to defer action "till counsel be obtained as to the safety of the matter in hand." This having been done, the resolution was adopted by a viva voce vote.

The Standing Committee of the West Ohio Eldership then became the Stationing Committee, and made the appointments, consisting of eight circuits. Wooster was left to supply itself. Canton was put in with the Stark circuit, while no mention is made of Mansfield. The East Ohio Eldership "adopted this Report, and completed its transfer to the West Ohio Eldership."

III. THE WEST PENNSYLVANIA ELDERSHIP.

1st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Pursuant to an action of the Ohio Eldership in October, 1843, "to form another Eldership," and defining its boundaries, seven ministers and two ruling elders within said boundaries "met in the city of Pittsburg, on Monday, March 4, 1844," to carry said action into effect. These were John Hickernell, Joseph A. Dobson, Daniel Wertz, Henry Rosenberger, Edward Wood, Jacob Myers and John S. Kerr. The ruling elders were John Koerner and Louis Kraft. Three ministers residing in the territory were not present, viz: Jacob M. Klein, appointee of the East Pennsylvania Eldership to the Indiana circuit; Abraham Ramsey and S. S. Richmond. The officers elected were John Hickernell, Speaker, and Jacob Meyers, Clerk.

John Hickernell was born in Lisburn, Cumberland county, Pa., in December, 1814. His earliest religious impressions were received under a sermon preached to children by Winebrenner when he was eleven years old. When eighteen years of age he was converted. Not long thereafter he began "occasionally to exercise in exhortation, until he was impressed with the call to go into the gospel field." He was a man of extraordinary physical, mental and moral strength. In 1838 he attended the session of the East Pennsylvania Eldership held at Middletown, November 11th, made application for license to preach the gospel, and a license was granted him. When the Stationing Committee reported he was appointed to the Pittsburg Mission, along with Edward West. West declined to go, and Jacob Keller was substituted in his place. As the pioneer missionary and able minister and wise counselor, he became a leader in West Pennsylvania, a position he held for fifty years. He was one of the delegates of the Eldership to the General Eldership in 1845, 1851, 1854, 1857, 1860, 1863, 1866 and 1893. He was appointed Corresponding Messenger to the Free-Will Baptist General Conference. Quite a number of times he was chosen Speaker of his Eldership. He had "so developed his natural talents that he had but few equals in pulpit power and pastoral prestige." He died October 30, 1897.

"The Journals of the last Elderships of Pennsylvania and Ohio were read." David Glassburn and Louis Kraft were granted licenses. There were no committees, and but little business was done outside of hearing the reports of preachers and examining into their moral and official characters. The work and standing of three ministers were in some doubt, but adjustments were effected, with censure in the one case. The Eldership handled all the business, including the stationing of the ministers, as follows: Harmony circuit, Jacob Myers; Rockland circuit, Edward West; Venango circuit, Henry Rosenberger; Pittsburg Mission, John Hickernell; Westmoreland circuit, Joseph A. Dobson; Columbiana Mission, Ohio, John S. Kerr. The matter of buying the stereotype plates of the Revival Hymn Book, etc., was brought before the Eldership by a letter from E. West, of Ohio, and after due consideration it was decided "that an advisory letter be addressed to the Hymn Book Committee in Ohio."

2nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The second West Pennsylvania Eldership was held the same year as the first—October 28, 1844. Some of the ministers during the Summer had still been laboring under appointment by the Ohio Eldership of 1843. There were eight teaching elders present, and three absent; eight ruling elders, and three delegates. J. Hickernell was chosen Speaker, and Jacob Myers, Clerk. The delegates were received as advisory members. The Standing Committee was authorized to appoint the camp-meetings for 1845. Winebrenner was present, on his return from the Ohio Eldership, and was made a "member of the body." He was granted "leave to bring before this body certain resolutions passed by the Ohio Eldership, touching a General Eldership." After the matter was duly considered the Eldership resolved to "agree to co-operate with the Ohio and East Pennsylvania Eldership in calling and holding a General Eldership to transact business of a general character." The election of two ministerial and two lay delegates followed. Action was also taken to co-operate with Ohio and East Pennsylvania in "obtaining funds to liberate the Printing Establishment from its present embarrassed condition," and the "traveling preachers" were authorized to solicit subscriptions for said purpose. Preachers were required to withdraw "after giving in their reports." "By nomination a committee of five, three preachers and two ruling elders, was appointed to assign the preachers to their circuits and stations." The territory was divided into six circuits, with seven ministers. Nine ministers are classed as "missionaries." Provision was made for a Standing Committee of three.

3rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The West Pennsylvania Eldership met in its third annual session at Harmony, Butler county, Pa., October 22, 1845. An additional circuit is entered on the Roll in constituting the Eldership, the Perryopolis Mission, Fayette county. There were sixteen ministers enrolled, two being absent; one delegate and five ruling elders. The officers were John Hickernell, Speaker; J. Myers, Clerk. G. U. Harn was received as "a full member," but not transferred from the East Pennsylvania Eldership. He served on several committees. Committees on Overtures, Resolutions and Journals were created. The Committee on Resolutions, S. S. Richmond and Daniel Wertz, reported the following, which prevailed without dissent: "Resolved, That this Eldership highly approves of the proceedings of the General Eldership of the Church of God in North America, held at Pittsburg, in May, 1845." There was considerable German preaching over the Eldership territory. H. Barkey "talked more or less every Lord's day, in the German language." The church at Robbstown was composed of "European Germans." A resolution adopted at the session of 1844, "denying absent members the renewal of their licenses, unless they send a communication," was rescinded. The death was announced of, "Bishop Edward Wood," a member of the Eldership, and suitable action taken. On Secret Societies the Eldership adopted a resolution "advising the ministers and members of the Church not to identify themselves as members," mentioning "Free Masons, Odd Fellows, etc., etc." The Stationing Committee rearranged the fields so as to make six appointments, yet added Wood county (Va.) Mission. Church organizations were reported at Youngstown and McKeesport, on the Westmoreland circuit. While some of the ministers reported that "the churches are very liberal, so far as they have it in their power;" yet the Eldership adopted an action to "request and urge upon the elders the necessity of laying the subject of the support of the ministers before the churches in which they are."

4th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—When the fourth "Annual Eldership of the Church of God in West Pennsylvania met in the Union Bethel, Grass Hill, Susquehanna township, Cambria county, Pa., on the 28th of October, 1846," it was found that fields of labor had been largely rearranged, and partly consolidated, and Athens County (Ohio) Mission; Adams County Mission (Ohio), and Virginia Mission had been added. Athens county, Ohio, along with Columbiana, Jefferson, Belmont and other eastern counties had been given to the West Pennsylvania Eldership; but Adams county is the fourth county east of the Indiana State line. The Eldership elected John Hickernell Speaker, and Henry Barkey, Clerk. Considerable work was done during the year in Adams, Athens and Meigs counties, Ohio. Also in Greene and Washington counties, Pa. In Adams county, O., "a church for the Lord" was organized; also one in Meigs county, Ohio. German preaching was in demand in Venango county, Pa. The evil of ministers disappointing their congregations was strongly disapproved. The report of the Stationing Committee showed a remarkable rearrangement of fields of labor. Some circuits were composed of several large counties, like Westmoreland, Fayette and Cambria; or Venango and Butler counties (Pa.), and Columbiana (Ohio). And though Adams county, Ohio, and Athens and Meigs counties, Ohio, were each made a circuit, there were only five fields of labor, with seven preachers. The Standing Committee was directed to arrange the camp-meetings for 1847. Written reports were to be made hereafter by the preachers.

5th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The place of meeting of the fifth West Pennsylvania Eldership is given as "the meeting-house in Irwin township, Venango county, Pa., the time "the 22nd of October, 1847." This is the place where one of the first churches in the territory of the Eldership was organized, and is where Barkeyville, named after Elder Henry Barkey, is located. John Hickernell was chosen Speaker; and Henry Barkey, Clerk. Several messengers present were made advisory members, among them Benjamin Ober, who made application for license, which was granted, and, with John Hickernell, he was appointed to the Westmoreland and Cambria counties circuit. Few conversions and accessions were reported. Two ministers and two laymen were "appointed delegates for the General Eldership." On the matter of the support of ministers the churches were "advised to take up subscriptions for their support, and that the preachers present the same to the next Annual Eldership." The preachers were directed "hereafter to give an account of the number of churches and preaching places on their circuits. The churches were asked to "represent themselves either by delegation or letter, and give account of their numerical strength, and the number of sermons preached to them through the year by their preachers." The appointments were made by the Eldership, there being six fields, Pittsburgh and West Newton among them. Fayette county, Pa., and the Virginia Mission are omitted; as also Columbiana county, Ohio. Adams County (Ohio) Mission was to be aided by collections in all the churches.

6th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The sixth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership was held "in the meeting-house in Brush Valley township, Indiana county, Pa., on the 10th day of October, 1848." Eight fields of labor were reported, and the enrollment shows the Eldership on the first day to have consisted of seventeen teaching elders, and four messengers, all from Cambria and Westmoreland circuit. J. Hickernell was elected Speaker, and J. A. Dobson, Clerk. The Standing Committee during the year had "authorized Elder M. W. Cook, Adams county, Ohio [on the Ohio river], to receive certain churches and preachers in the South into fellowship, giving the preachers written permits to preach the gospel." While Kentucky is "across the river," Cook reported that "he got across the Ohio into Virginia; that he saw much good done, and that prospects were favorable to the doctrine of the Church and Bible." He was appointed to Mason county, Va. [now West Virginia], and Adams county, Ohio, Mason county being four counties east of Adams. The delegates to the General Eldership were "called upon to give in their reports, and reasons for not attending to the appointment." They "were exonerated from blame;" but the "Eldership feels sorry for the failure of all the delegates to attend the General Eldership." Joseph Glenn reported having "extended his work into Clarion county." Wertz had "extended his borders on the Greene county circuit through the northern part of Virginia." A strong resolution was passed, urging the preachers to look to the organization of Sabbath-schools. Several items of statistics were required to be annually reported by all pastors. In the Stationing Committee's Report Pittsburgh is made a station, with Jacob Myers pastor. Marshall county (Va.) circuit is added to the list. Mason county, Va., is part of Cook's field. Athens county, Ohio, is a circuit; but Columbiana county, Ohio, is not mentioned.

A new Article having been added to the Constitution of the General Eldership, giving it power "to review the Journals of all the Annual Elderships," the Eldership took up the matter, and adopted a resolution to "inquire of those whom it may most concern to give us satisfactory information."

7th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The progress of the work in Virginia is indicated by the fact that the Eldership "met in the new meeting-house at Woodlands, Marshall county, Va., on the 24th day of October, 1849." The Eldership elected Jacob M. Klein Speaker, and Daniel Wertz, Clerk. The Committee on Unfinished Business reported but one item, viz: "The resolution relative to a mysterious resolution passed by the last General Eldership." It stated that "the mystery had not as yet been unfolded." However, the new Article had been published in The Advocate of July 1, 1848, in full. The camp-meeting spirit having perceptibly decreased, the Eldership advised "all the churches to strive and pray to revive the former camp-meeting spirit in all their members." Regular transfers were now granted to ministers removing to other Elderships. Eight fields of labor were mapped out by the Stationing Committee, with nine pastors. Columbiana county, Ohio, is made a part of Harmony circuit. Pittsburgh is omitted. The Standing Committee is made the Camp-meeting Committee, and the hope is expressed that there "would be at least one camp-meeting on every circuit." Collections were ordered on all "the stations and circuits, and that the preachers bring the money to the Eldership at its next session, and that the same be applied to traveling preachers as they may have need."

8th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—In 1850 the West Pennsylvania Eldership met in the extreme western county of the State, near the part of its territory in Ohio. The place of meeting was at Fayetteville, Lawrence county, November 20th. It occupied parts of Mahoning and Columbiana counties across the boundary line in Ohio, having a church at Youngstown, Mahoning county, and several in Columbiana county. Some distance south was the Marshall county circuit, West Va. On its list of circuits was Athens county, Ohio. The Eldership, as was quite usual, had trouble with several of its members, and in a few instances licenses were withheld. The tendency toward union between Free-Will Baptist churches located in the north-western counties of Pennsylvania and the south-western counties of New York was emphasized by the presence of two delegates from "the Crawford Quarterly Meeting of the Free-Will Baptist denomination," which "expressed the most friendly feeling towards the Church of God, and desired a more intimate acquaintance and union between the two bodies." In return "J. Hickernell and E. Logue were appointed delegates to the Yearly Meeting of the Free-Will Baptist denomination, to be held in Greene township, Erie county, Pa., June 20, 1851." The Eldership by resolution denounced the Fugitive Slave Law "as imposing duties on us subversive to the laws of God and our feelings," and resolved to "use all possible legal means for the immediate repeal of" said law. Without designating its object, the preachers of the Eldership were directed to "receive donations and lift collections, and bring the liberalities of the people to the next Eldership, for the purpose of establishing an Eldership Fund." W. Vance had removed to Iowa, but retained his membership in the Eldership. Two ministerial delegates, and one lay delegate were appointed to the next General Eldership. The fields of labor were rearranged so as to make but four circuits instead of eight, constituting McKeesport and Pittsburg a mission, and making no mention of the Athens county, Ohio, territory, nor Mahoning and Columbiana counties. But J. M. Klein is appointed to "New York State Mission." J. W. Klein was the Speaker, and J. Hovis, Clerk, of this Eldership. E. Marple, later missionary to Texas, received license at this Eldership.

9th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Upon constituting the Eldership which met at Bethany, Westmoreland county, Pa., October 15, 1851, there is quite a variance between the fields of labor as entered on the Journal and as given in the report of the Stationing Committee in 1850. J. Hickernell was chosen Speaker, and J. Hovis, Clerk. Without a Constitution or fixed Rules, there was considerable disorder in managing the interests of the work. Parliamentary Rules were adopted, but these were limited to the transaction of business while the Eldership was in session. Neither of the delegates to the Free-Will Baptist Yearly Meeting had been in attendance. Two delegates to the General Eldership reported their presence at its sessions. They "were much pleased with the spirit of the body, and most of the doings; yet there were some things to which there might be exceptions." And by resolution the Eldership took exception to "the report of the Committee on Publication." This related to "a selection of congregational hymns," which the General Eldership proposed to publish "for the use of and as the property of the Church." The West Pennsylvania Eldership declared that "we disapprove of publishing the said book, or any other book or publication, as Church property, with further encumbrances thereon than that of defraying the expenses of publication." This referred to an "old debt" due Winebrenner, with reference to which the Eldership "petition the East Pennsylvania Eldership to give us some definite satisfaction." It also declared that "the Board of Missions of the East Pennsylvania Eldership acted disorderly and uncourtously to this body" in "inducing Brothers Wertz and Klein to leave their fields of labor and go into their employ [as missionaries to Illinois], without the consent and contrary to the wishes of this Eldership." The Eldership divided the territory into five circuits, omitting the Marshall county, West Va., circuit altogether; but it was inserted by the Stationing Committee. Agreeably to the action of the General Eldership Athens and Meigs counties, Ohio, were "transferred to the Ohio Eldership." It approved "the purchase of a Printing Establishment. . . . to be located west of the mountains." It recommended "to the patronage of the brethren the Free-Will Baptist institution of learning situated at Chester, Geauga county, Ohio," and also "the institution of D. A. L. Laverty and S. Knisley, situated at Shippensburg, Pa." It was resolved to "make a determined effort to raise the cause in Pittsburg," and petitioned "the East Pennsylvania Eldership for Bro. McFadden to take charge of the Pittsburg Mission." The Eldership proposed to "purchase an Eldership Library for the benefit of the younger ministers."

10th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The tenth session of the West Pennsylv-

vania Eldership was held in the bethel in Irwin township, Venango county, Pa., beginning October 28, 1852, with E. Logue, Speaker, and H. Barkey, Clerk. One of the first items of business was the Pittsburg Mission, in reference to which nothing had been done as no missionary had been secured; and the request was repeated, that one be furnished by East Pennsylvania, as "prospects are still flattering." The "25-cent plan to liquidate Bro. Winebrenner's claims" was approved and recommended to the churches. Three trustees were appointed "to receive and hold funds and bonds in trust for the Eldership," in the matter of purchasing a "new Printing Establishment." The "efforts making to introduce the Maine Law into our respective States" was "highly approved," and "each of the preachers of the Eldership" was recommended "to give a lecture or sermon in favor of" said liquor law. But seven out of the sixteen ministers on the Roll were present at this session, a fact which the Eldership "deeply regretted," and expressed the hope that "a deeper interest will be taken in our yearly meeting in the future." "Numbers of appointments declined for the want of preaching," and the Eldership "recommended and hoped that the ministers and elders will make a more vigorous effort to extend their labors and raise the cause." Wheeling Mission, being principally the district of which Wheeling is the center, was placed on the list of circuits. Also "Canal Mission," making eight fields in all, with nine pastors and four assistants.

11th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—But half the ministers enrolled answered to their names when, on October 29, 1853, the West Pennsylvania Eldership was constituted to hold its eleventh annual session. It convened at Slippery Rock, Beaver county, Pa., one of the first churches organized by Hickernell. On Sunday morning the new bethel was dedicated, E. Logue preaching the sermon, while Saturday evening, the day before, William Davis preached. On Monday morning "the Eldership met to transact business, when the opening sermon was preached by B. Ober." S. S. Richmond was made Speaker; Henry Barkey, Journalizing Clerk, and A. C. Raysor, "an advisory member," Transcribing Clerk. The Eldership received and licensed Henry Berkey, of the Evangelical Association, and Philip W. Haskins, of the Free-Will Baptists of England. Two teaching elders and two ruling elders were elected delegates to the General Eldership in 1854. The efforts to raise funds for the new Printing Establishment were continued. A "missionary fund" was established, and each minister was instructed "to lift a collection at each preaching place, and likewise request each member to pay twenty-five cents to be applied" to this fund. The deacons of all the churches were "requested to make a more vigorous effort to raise an adequate support for their preachers in charge." The Standing Committee was made the Camp-meeting Committee. Six circuits and two missions were outlined, and to these were assigned eight pastors, with six assistants. No provision was made for Pittsburg, but a "Mahoning Mission," also called "Canoe Mission," was created, and a minister appointed.

12th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The constant shifting of boundaries of fields of labor is again emphasized at the twelfth West Pennsylvania Eldership, convened at Bethany, Westmoreland county, Pa., October 30, 1854. There were seven fields, two of them missions, placed on the Journal when the Eldership was constituted. The Stationing Committee near the close reported eleven, four of them being called missions. Ohio Eldership had "failed to supply the churches of God in Athens and Meigs counties, Ohio, with preaching ever since the General Eldership has placed them under the supervision of the same," the Eldership decided "to supply them with preaching to the best of our ability." The Athens county circuit, Ohio, was placed with the appointments, and Edward Jordan appointed to serve it. S. S. Richmond was elected Speaker; E. Logue, Journalizing Clerk, and A. C. Raysor, Transcribing Clerk. A Committee to "draft Rules for this Eldership reported ten Parliamentary Rules. The delegates to the General Eldership were required to report. The "opening discourse" was preached on the evening of the first day's sittings. Davis, a Free-Will Baptist, was present and sat as an advisory member. On some of the fields about one-third of the preaching was in German. About two hundred accessions were reported. The Eldership elected a regular Treasurer again, but no report is published. Referring to "a resolution on the Journal of this Eldership, prohibiting members of this Eldership identifying themselves with Secret Societies, a resolution was adopted so to "modify it as not to include temperance and politics."

13th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—There were only seven teaching elders and one ruling elder in attendance when the thirteenth annual session of the Eldership convened at Slippery Rock, Beaver county, Pa., October 29, 1855. Twelve teaching elders were absent. No delegates reported. John Hickernell was chosen Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk; Henry Barkey, Transcribing Clerk, and Abraham Sherick, Treasurer. Ministers were held to a strict accountability, and censures were passed on several for delinquencies in their official duties. There was still considerable German preaching in several counties, as in Venango county, where Latchaw and Barkey had regular German services. While there was a lack of preachers to travel the fields, there were twelve who were local. Seven circuits and three missions were on the list when the Eldership met; but the Committee on Circuits reported "they had set off seven circuits and five missions." Among the latter was Johnstown. The Stationing Committee, however, lacked four men to supply them. The constant emigration westward retarded the work, and complaint is also made that the "Church suffers by divisions caused by persons rather refractory, all arising from self-righteousness in themselves." But "in the Eldership union and harmony prevail."

14th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The territory of the West Pennsylvania Eldership extended over a very large area, and so on account of the distance between two extreme points thereof and the inconvenience of travel, it was impossible to secure a large attendance of ministers and delegates at these remote points. So when for the second time the Eldership convened in Virginia less than half the members were present. It met with the church at Antioch, Wheeling circuit, October 25, 1856, with six out of twenty-one teaching elders present, five ruling elders and two delegates. The organization was effected by the choice of John Hickernell, Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk; John Hovis, Transcribing Clerk, and Peter Loucks, Treasurer. The delegates to the General Eldership were "instructed to urge on the publication of the new Hymn Book." It was rather common for traveling ministers to complain of accidents, or misfortunes, occasioning losses which, with their meager salaries, they could not bear, when these complaints were taken up and "a project set on foot for relief." But the churches did not take kindly to these extra calls for money, and so this Eldership resolved that such charitable help be discontinued. A committee was appointed, to report a year hence, "to draft a Constitution and Rules of Order for the formation of a Missionary Society." The pastors present reported one hundred and fifty conversions. The funds of the Eldership were exceedingly limited. Athens and Meigs counties, Ohio, were greatly neglected, and between the West Pennsylvania and the Ohio Elderships the work there finally went to nothing. The territory for the coming year was divided into seven circuits, with one General Missionary. The missions of this Eldership year were attached to circuits adjoining them. Regular German preaching was provided for at West Newton, and in Irwin township, Venango county.

15th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—From the southern borders of the territory in 1856, the West Pennsylvania Eldership convened, on October 28, 1857, with the church in Irwin township, Venango county, Pa., almost the extreme northern point. But nine of its twenty-two ministers were in attendance, and four ruling elders and delegates. Joseph Glenn was elected Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk; J. M. Domer, Transcribing Clerk, and Peter Loucks, Treasurer. The delegates to the General Eldership were required to report. The Committee to draft a Constitution and Rules for the formation of a Missionary Society reported a Constitution of nineteen Articles. The membership was voluntary, upon the payment of $1.00 annually. The ministers present reported two hundred conversions. They preached from sixty-eight to two hundred and eighty-five sermons during the year. Ober and Marple, missionaries to Texas, were still held amenable to the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and their names being called, the letters which they had sent in were referred to the Committee on Slavery. Said Committee reported, that "in said letters it finds not only a departure from original land-marks, and the setting up of new things, but the charging of our Savior, the Redeemer of mankind and adorable Founder of the Church of God, with sanctioning indirectly the great sin or evil of Slavery." It quotes actions of the Eldership on October 22, 1845, and the action of the General Eldership in May, 1845, to which "these brethren now laboring in Texas agreed. . . . by coming into the Eldership," and then in terms of severe disapproval repudiate their present teachings and actions on the subject, and condemned them for "setting up for themselves [organizing the Texas Eldership] without asking the consent of the body to which they belonged." This it called "seceding," and so for all these wrong acts alleged against them, the Committee declared, and the Eldership ratified it, that "we do hereby, by virtue of the great moral law which we consider them to have violated, declare that we must withhold from them the hand of Christian Fellowship." Thus they "cast them off as wandering sons from the original land-mark." They could not tolerate "villanies in the name of Allah," even if the perpetrators "call upon the prophet to bless their crimes." Nor did they deem the severe language employed as partaking of the nature of railing accusations which the Archangel Michael durst not bring against his worst enemy. A singular coincidence is found in the fact that immediately following the Journal containing this arraignment in The Church Advocate is the "Journal of the First Annual Meeting of the Eldership in Texas," in which in resolutions the position of the Texas brethren is set forth.

16th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Perhaps as an expression of the "sympathy" the Eldership manifested by resolution in 1857 for Slippery Rock church in its financial straits, the West Pennsylvania Eldership on October 27, 1858, met with said church, located in Beaver county. Nine teaching elders were in attendance, and three ruling elders; fourteen teaching elders being absent. The officers elected were J. Hovis, Speaker; J. M. Domer, Journalizing Clerk; H. Barkey, Transcribing Clerk, and Peter Loucks, Treasurer. One of the first items of business to be considered was "the claim against the bethel at Slippery Rock." The Eldership made a broad and luminous deliverance on the subject of "female preaching," declaring that it "believes female preaching scriptural and beneficial to the furtherance of the work of God." Hence it resolved "that we vote (upon application) a recommendation to all sisters laboring in the gospel, whose qualifications and religious character will justify us in so doing." This year there are seven circuits and two missions, on two of which German preaching is provided for.

17th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—At the convening of the seventeenth Annual Eldership at West Newton, Westmoreland county, Pa., October 25, 1859, twelve ministers and four ruling elders and delegates were present; thirteen ministers were absent. An election for officers resulted in the choice of Seth S. Richmond for Speaker; John A. Plowman, Journalizing Clerk; Jacob M. Domer, Transcribing Clerk, and Peter Loucks, Treasurer. The first steps toward the formation of "circuit councils" were taken by the adoption of a recommendation that "each circuit be advised to hold two Circuit Elderships each year, consisting of all the preachers, ruling elders and deacons," and itemizing their business. Holding "that they that preach the gospel are to live off the gospel," the Eldership advised "the Circuit Elderships, before making application to this body for a preacher, to ascertain as nearly as they can his probable wants, and inform us. . . . whether those wants can be met." A committee was appointed "to prepare a Constitution for the government of the Eldership," and one "to take the preparatory steps to secure an Act of Incorporation." The Committee on Religious Exercises reported these six subjects on which special sermons were to be preached before the Eldership in 1860: Qualifications of the Ministry—Loucks; Depravity—Raysor; Atonement—Hickernell; Evidences of Adoption—Domer; Christian Warfare—Plowman; Eternal Salvation—Richmond; Endless Punishment—Glenn. Hickernell reported that the "several churches of which I had charge were low in spirit; and no particular prospects for a reformation," he and Loucks decided to invite "Sister Martha Jane Beecher, at that time a member of the Methodist Protestant Church, an invitation to assist us in holding a special meeting at Bethany." Immense crowds attended "to hear the voice that plays so musically upon the ears of the people in general." No conversions were reported at Bethany, while at West Newton "some few were converted." The Committee on License "voluntarily considered" Mrs. Beecher's case; spoke in terms of commendation of "her labors and her evident merits," and advised a "certificate expressive of the above" be given her, "recognizing her as a co-worker in the gospel, and authorizing her to continue her labors among us." The fields of labor were increased to fourteen, including Washington County Mission, Athens County (Ohio) Mission, and North Mission. On nearly all the circuits the preacher in charge had one or two assistants. Mrs. Beecher was appointed to assist the pastor on the Westmoreland circuit.

18th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The eighteenth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership met at West Newton, Westmoreland county, Pa., at 9 o'clock a. m., on Tuesday, October 23, 1880, but listened to the Opening Sermon by P. Loucks in the evening of said day. A. C. Raysor was chosen Speaker; P. Loucks, Journalizing Clerk; J. Hovis, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. A "Protocol" and the transcribing of the Minutes of the sessions of the Eldership had been ordered, and A. C. Raysor, Committee, reported the work completed. As a further step, a committee, consisting of J. Hickernell, P. Loucks and A. C. Raysor, was appointed "to prepare and commit to writing our system of co-operation." As to "ordination and setting apart to the office of the ministry," the Eldership directed that "persons obtaining license from this body shall be addressed and a short prayer offered in their behalf by some one to be appointed by the Speaker." The Eldership placed itself on record as being "as much as ever convinced that female preaching is scriptural." All preachers "when speaking on the ministry" were directed "to engraft and defend this sentiment." The territory was divided into nine circuits and three missions, Pittsburg Mission "to be supplied by Bros. Hickernell, Domer, Plowman and Sister Beecher," the latter "to get all the support." S. S. Richmond, according to previous arrangements, on the last evening of the session "preached a funeral sermon on the life and death of Elder Winebrenner, from Rev. xiv. 13."

19th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—"A revival of religion," called "a glorious revival," "in progress in the church" made it expedient for the West Pennsylvania Eldership when it met at Pittsburg, Pa., October 22, 1861, to dispense with the opening sermon. Instead, "A. X. Shoemaker, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, preached an interesting discourse." Thomas, of the same Eldership, was also present. Both were placed on committees, and had the right to speak and vote. The officers were, Hickernell, Speaker; J. M. Domer, Journalizing Clerk; A. C. Raysor, Transcribing Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. The Constitution, or "System of Co-operation," was reported and adopted. The name adopted was "West Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God." The membership was to consist of "all the preachers holding a license from this body, together with an equal number of ruling elders or delegates." The Rules of Order were incorporated in the Constitution. The Standing Committee, consisting of three, was given "the right and authority to act in behalf of the Eldership during the year," but were not empowered to expel a minister, but to suspend, after trial and conviction. Five members constituted the Stationing Committee. Preachers were forbidden entering on the field of another minister without the consent of said minister. Churches were to report to the Eldership. Statistical reports were to be made by the pastors. "The Eldership is considered a Missionary Society, and each local church an auxiliary society." "Preachers and churches which fail to comply with the Rules of Order and Co-operation are liable to rebuke, suspension or expulsion." Jordan, Free-Will Baptist, who had united with the Eldership, at the solicitation of a certain "Free-Will Baptist Church in want of ministerial labor," was "advised to return to their connection." One preacher was expelled for "heterodoxy and recklessness of character." "Each preacher receiving a license" was "required to pay $1.00 at least into the Treasury of the Eldership on the reception thereof." The Eldership appointed a committee, consisting of Hickernell, Domer and Cook, "to solicit subscriptions and purchase the house known as the Old Asbury Chapel, in the city of Pittsburg." Pittsburg was made a part of the New Brighton circuit, besides which there were seven circuits and two missions.

20th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—"Prospects bidding fair for a revival of religion," the meeting having been in progress a week, when the Eldership convened at Pittsburg, Pa., October 28, 1862, "it was thought expedient to direct the efforts of the pulpit towards that object," and dispense with the opening sermon. "Domer preached an appropriate discourse." Eleven ministers were present; fourteen, absent. The choice for Speaker was J. M. Domer, with P. Loucks, Journalizing Clerk; J. A. Plowman, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. The committee to purchase Asbury Chapel had been increased to five, and it reported the purchase of the Chapel for $2,500, with interest; $150 was paid down; $550 "at the time of receiving the deed." Of this amount $510 was furnished by individual members of the committee, and only $190 "raised by subscription." The Report was adopted, and all the preachers on fields of labor were instructed "to co-operate with the committee in raising all the money possible to meet the payments as they become due." An agent was also "appointed to canvass the bounds of the East Pennsylvania Eldership to solicit" help "in this enterprise." Martha J. Beecher was made the Agent. Licenses were withheld and placed in the hands of the Standing Committee from "some of the preachers" because they "did not conform to the Rules of Co-operation." The Committee on the State of the Country, J. Glenn, A. O. Stouffer and J. Hovis, reported, stating it to be "the duty of every loyal organization to so express its loyalty and love of its country that the Government may assuredly know who its true and faithful subjects are;" sanctioning "every measure and proclamation which a military necessity may demand;" "highly approving the Emancipation Proclamation," and promising to pray "God to give wisdom and direction to the President, to his Cabinet and to the heads of Departments of Government, success to our Army and Navy, that they may be successful in bringing this fratricidal war to an honorable termination." There were eleven fields of labor, with twelve pastors, and one General Missionary.

21st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—New Brighton, Beaver county, Pa., in 1863, entertained both the General Eldership and the West Pennsylvania Eldership. The former met there in June, the latter on October 27, 1863. The Standing Committee had used its power over fields of labor by so changing boundaries and men as to make seven circuits, one station and two missions. On a ballot being taken P. Loucks was elected Speaker; A. O. Stouffer, Journalizing Clerk; J. M. Domer, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. The delegates to the General Eldership reported their attendance and participation in the business, "and feel satisfied with the manner in which it was disposed of." Hickernell as pastor at Pittsburg reported that "no effort has been made to liquidate the debt." To enforce provisions of the Constitution, a Rule was adopted to "drop the names of preachers from the Minutes who fail to report for two successive years." While the Committee on the State of the country recommended "a hearty reiteration of our former resolutions," it also congratulated "the Union cause on the re-election of the Hon. A. G. Curtin as Governor of the State," and "could not forbear to express our exultation over the complete defeat and as we hope effectual overthrow of the traitorous policy of the notorious Vallandigham." Mrs. Beecher was appointed to deliver lectures to raise money to pay the Pittsburg debt. Fayette City was made a mission, as well as Pittsburg.

22nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—For reasons incident to the Civil War, the work in the West Pennsylvania Eldership had declined during the year, so that while the Eldership was constituted at Center Bethel, Westmoreland county, Pa., October 18, 1864, with one station, seven circuits and three missions, it adjourned with six circuits and one missions. And Pittsburg, the one mission, was connected with Fayette City, Butler and Armstrong circuit. The church at Fayetteville, Lawrence county, had become extinct, and the Bethel was directed to be sold. In organizing the Eldership J. Hovis was chosen Speaker; J. A. Plowman, Journalizing Clerk; P. Loucks, Transcribing Clerk and J. M. Domer, Treasurer. Mrs. Beecher's "lectures for the benefit of the Pittsburg meeting-house" did not result in bringing in so much money. She "delivered four lectures during the year, and collected $94.80." The sum of $113.00 was subscribed for this purpose on the floor. There being "no change in any way in our views in relation to our country," the Committee on the State of the Country simply referred "all whom it concerns to our former resolutions." The Eldership mourned the death of "a worthy and promising member," Elder A. O. Stouffer. Loucks was designated to "preach a missionary sermon during our next annual Eldership."

23rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—There were enrolled as present ten teaching elders, three ruling elders, two delegates and one messenger, when the West Pennsylvania Eldership was constituted at Pittsburg, Pa., October 25, 1865. Ten teaching elders were absent. J. M. Domer preached the Opening Sermon on Wednesday evening, from Gen. xiv. 56. He was elected Speaker, with P. Loucks, Journalizing Clerk; J. W. Stoner, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. The Treasurer presented a receipt in full payment of the Eldership's share of the claims of Winebrenner. Action was taken for the immediate payment of the balance of a debt on the Limestone Bethel, Armstrong county. The Fayetteville house of worship was reported to "have been sold by a person or persons not legally authorized," and an agent was appointed to see after it. Martha J. Beecher was enrolled as General Missionary, and as such she "preached one hundred and five sermons during the year, and received for her support $305.00." Pittsburg was included in a mission with Fayette City, Butler and Armstrong counties, with J. Hickernell and J. Reese as the missionaries. Hickernell also serving Altoona mission, in the East Pennsylvania territory. The debt on the Pittsburg church property was reported as being $2,373.69, and after ordering payment of interest, the "House Committee was given discretionary power to act in the matter as their judgment may dictate." To provide "a perpetual interest-bearing fund" for missionary purposes a proposition was offered, but not finally acted upon, to secure "perpetual interest-bearing notes, made to the treasurer of the Eldership, and the interest to be paid yearly, and the principal to be paid by the person or persons giving the note or notes during their natural lives, or by their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns. This principal to be kept in the treasury as a perpetual fund, the interest to be applied to missionary purposes as directed by the Eldership." Immediately $700.00 were pledged by eight persons. Domer and Loucks were appointed a committee "to take the necessary preliminary steps and have the Eldership incorporated." Pittsburg was made a mission by itself, as was Armstrong county. Mrs. Beecher was continued General Missionary. Besides these, there were nine fields of labor.

24th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—During the year 1865-6 Mrs. Beecher became Mrs. Mary Jane Beecher Wertz, and her active relation to the Eldership ceased, as she removed to Iowa. E. H. Thomas attended the session which convened with the church at Limestone, Armstrong county, October 18, 1866, and was made a full member. J. A. Plowman delivered the Opening Sermon from Ps. 1. 2. J. Glenn was elected Speaker; D. Blakely, Journalizing Clerk; H. Barkey, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. The debt on the Pittsburg property was reported to be $2,309.00, with interest due $110.78. The interest was ordered paid, and authority given the Standing Committee to solicit subscriptions and contributions to pay the debt. The house of worship at Carrolltown, Cambria county, having been sold, the net balance was appropriated toward the building of a bethel at Paddytown, Somerset county. The passage by the Legislature of an Act incorporating the Eldership was reported. To secure "greater union of effort to advance the interests of the Church throughout the bounds of this Eldership," "the Chairman of the Standing Committee" was to "be considered our General Missionary, ex-officio." His duties were: "To exercise a general supervision over all the circuits and churches within the bounds of the Eldership; to assist as far as possible in holding Communion and protracted meetings on all the circuits." In holding these meetings he was "to have the privilege of lifting collections for his support." The churches were advised to secure Church Records and keep them faithfully. The matter of securing notes for the Permanent Mission Fund was strongly urged on ministers and churches, in addition to the regular collections each quarter for immediate use. In response to an expressed "desire upon the part of some to have the Eldership declare its views relative to the conditions upon which the reception of pardon and the gift of the Holy Spirit are suspended," the Eldership voted on this proposition: "That there is no remission of sins or promise of the gift of the Holy Spirit without baptism." The vote stood yeas, none; nays, seventeen. J. Hickernell was made the General Missionary; P. Loucks was placed in charge of Pittsburg and J. Hovis of the Armstrong Mission. Besides these missions there were seven circuits served by eight preachers.

25th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Act of Incorporation, incorporated in the Journal of the Eldership held at Wesley, Venango county, Pa., beginning October 17, 1867, made the Eldership "a body politic and corporate in law" in the names of Jacob M. Domer, John Hickernell, Peter Loucks, Joseph W. Stoner and John Hovis and their successors in office as Speaker, Treasurer, Clerks and the Standing Committee. The official name is the "Board of Trustees of the West Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God." One-third of the members is a quorum. The yearly value of the income of whatever kind "shall not at any time exceed twenty thousand dollars." The use of this income is restricted "to the financial and religious purposes of the said Eldership, or for any similar objects of the General Eldership." The presiding officer of the Eldership was A. C. Raysor, with P. Loucks, Journalizing Clerk; H. Barkey, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. There was no reduction of the Pittsburg debt. The deed was ordered to be made to the Board of Corporation, and judgments given to the brethren who advanced the money. Loucks was elected by the Eldership Chairman of the Standing Committee under the Rule which made him ex-officio General Missionary. In addition to the duties prescribed in the action of 1866, he was to collect funds to pay off the debt on the Pittsburg property, he having generously offered to cancel $500.00 of his own judgment against it. Pittsburg Mission, and Indiana and Somerset circuits were unsupplied.

26th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—As there was from the beginning decided prejudice against the reading of sermons, J. Hovis preached an extemporaneous Opening Sermon at the Eldership, which held its session at New Brighton, Beaver county, Pa., beginning October 15, 1868. He used for his text Matt. xxiv. 14. But at the third sitting a resolution was adopted, that "the Opening Sermon for next year be written out and read before this body." When on the last afternoon "J. A. Plowman was elected to read the Opening Sermon at the commencement of our next Eldership, he declined, "being opposed to reading sermons under pretense of preaching," and P. Loucks was elected in his place. P. Loucks was Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk; J. A. Plowman, Transcribing Clerk, and D. S. Fox, Treasurer. The Standing Committee had created a mission in South-western Missouri, in January, 1868, whither Blakely had emigrated, and appointed him a missionary, which the Eldership approved. Loucks reported that he had received by subscriptions and donations, including his own $500.00, a total of $1,249.88 toward the Pittsburg debt, leaving $1,156.59 still due, besides a balance due Loucks of $79.00. Plowman was appointed to Pittsburg and McKeesport mission. J. S. McKee, East Ohio Eldership, was stationed at New Brighton. The proposition to change the ministers in the Fall instead of the Spring of the year, which was recommended by the Committee on Resolutions, was "postponed for one year."

27th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Near his own home, when the Eldership met at Center Bethel, October 21, 1869, it elected John Hickernell Speaker. He was highly esteemed by the churches and brotherhood, and was one of their most eminent representatives. There were present twenty-five preachers, eleven ruling elders and three delegates. It was also the home church of P. Loucks, who "read" the Opening Sermon, with which "many of us were so well pleased as an experiment," that the Eldership "advised the reading of the Opening Sermon next year." Fourteen preachers are noted as absentees. A. C. Raysor was chosen Journalizing Clerk; J. A. Plowman, Transcribing Clerk, and D. S. Fox, Treasurer. Under direction of the Eldership, the Committee on Arrangements appointed Hickernell to preach "a funeral sermon on the death of Elder E. H. Thomas on Sabbath morning." By resolution the Eldership expressed its sense of bereavement at his death, by which "the Church of God has lost one of its most efficient instrumentalities for advancing the cause of virtue and religion in the world." Commendable interest was manifested in missions, and "our brethren are beginning to realize the propriety of giving more liberally of their means to sustain home and foreign missions." The Missouri mission "deserves our fostering care, and the missionary deserves to be liberally supported." Increased interest and greater efforts in the missionary enterprises "are urged." The unusual action on the Itinerary is peculiar to this Eldership. A resolution proposing to "so amend our system of co-operation as to declare that the Itinerary is fundamental to its existence," was "negatived by a unanimous vote." An "impressive ceremony and presentation of licenses" was a feature of the closing sitting.

28th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—A very interesting session of the Eldership was held at Antioch, Marshall county, W. Va., beginning October 20, 1870. Fifteen ministers were present and twelve absent, four delegates and four ruling elders. P. Loucks was chosen Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk, and J. Grimm, Transcribing Clerk. The Treasurer was D. S. Fox. The Eldership received G. W. Thompson, of the Free Baptist Church, as an advisory member. The question of holding a Pentecostal meeting, after some discussion, was referred to a committee, which stated that such "meetings and Sabbath-school Conventions have been a satisfactory experiment, as tried by some of the Elderships," and "resolved, that they might be conducive to our good." Further discussion followed, when the report was recommitting, and made a special order for the next sitting, when it was decided to "hold a Pentecostal meeting in connection with a Sabbath-school Convention." With far less caution and deliberation, the Eldership resolved in "favor of holding a general Sabbath-school Convention as has been suggested by the East Pennsylvania Eldership." The Eldership asked permission of the Board of Missions of the General Eldership to pay its missionary assessment directly toward the support of Blakely missionary in Missouri. The office of Stated Clerk was created, "with $5.00 annually as compensation for his labors." One minister was "appointed to preach a missionary sermon, and one to preach a Sabbath-school sermon during the next session of the Eldership."

Loucks was chosen to preach the former, and Domer the latter. The appointments consisted of six stations and eight circuits.

29th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Opening Sermon of the twenty-ninth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership was delivered by J. Hickernell, on Thursday evening, October 19, 1871, from Acts xiii. 2. Hickernell was duly elected Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Stated Clerk; J. W. Davis, Transcribing Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. While the preachers were "required to pass an examination annually," it had been unenforced; hence, a committee was created "to report a course of studies for the benefit of young ministers." The Eldership thought "every Christian should constantly carry with him a copy of the New Testament." The death of two ministers were reported—J. Travis and J. Rees—who were "active and zealous laborers," "energetic and faithful ministers," "bearing good moral and religious characters." Exhorters' licenses were issued to five brethren. The Eldership refused to add to "the ceremony of ordination" as practiced "the imposition of hands," as recommended by W. J. Davis, G. J. Bartlebaugh and D. Kearsling, Committee on Resolutions. From one of the funds the Eldership "donated $50.00 to Elder J. A. Plowman as a token of friendship," with his transfer to the East Ohio Eldership. The churches were "instructed to have all their deeds for church property made to the Treasurer, by name, of the Board of Incorporation of the West Pennsylvania Eldership." Said Board was "authorized to sell the property belonging to the Church, in Pittsburg, if in their judgment they think it expedient." The proceeds were to be applied "to the erection of a new house in some other locality." "Six promising young men manifested a desire to engage in the work of the ministry," which fact was mentioned by the Committee on the State of Religion as "an evidence of progress." There were also "extensive revivals and large numbers of accessions."

30th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Interchange of friendly relations between the Free Baptists and the Church of God as represented in the West Pennsylvania Eldership continued. E. Jordan, of the former Church, attended the session of said Eldership which convened at Ursina, Somerset county, Pa., October 17, 1872. The Eldership expressed its pleasure to have him present, and voted to appoint P. Loucks as a delegate to the next meeting of the Free Baptist Association. The officers of this Eldership were J. Hovis, Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Stated Clerk; J. Cook, Transcribing Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. The Eldership was insistant that the annual examinations of preachers shall not go by default, but that they be held. It adopted a short course of studies, extending three years. At this session Clearfield mission was formally transferred to the East Pennsylvania Eldership. The remaining appointments consisted of five stations and eleven circuits. Among the former was Pittsburg, to which S. Woods was appointed. The Report of the Committee on the State of Religion was very encouraging, as it showed "accessions to the Church, about five hundred; five new houses of worship built; preachers better supported, and more zeal for the promotion of the cause of God." The finances of the Eldership also indicated improvement. The only shadow which hung over the Eldership was the fact that "Elder J. M. Domer is now seriously afflicted," and it was resolved that "each member of this Eldership offer up prayer in his behalf for his recovery."

31st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Months before the calends of October, 1873, dawned, the spirit of one of the noblest ministers of the West Pennsylvania Eldership had taken its departure. J. M. Domer died November 15, 1872, highly respected and loved by his whole Eldership, and esteemed by the brotherhood generally as a man of exceptional talents, for "by his many noble qualities he gained the respect and admiration of all." He was "enabled by divine grace to wield a powerful influence over the minds of his fellow men." In such terms the Eldership recorded its sentiments concerning their deceased fellow-member. The body met at Pittsburg, Pa., October 16, 1873, J. W. Davis preaching the Opening Sermon from I. Thess. i. 5. An election for officers resulted in the choice of P. Loucks, Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Stated Clerk; J. A. Cook, Transcribing Clerk, and J. Hickernell, Treasurer. Having received greetings of friendship from the Free Baptist Conference, by its delegate, E. Jordan, the Eldership appointed J. Hickernell, P. Loucks and W. B. Long fraternal delegates to said body. To such an extent had sentiment changed on the question of Secret Societies that a proposed action against them was laid on the table. But a strong resolution against the use of tobacco as being "a habit essentially filthy and inconsistent with the character of a Christian gentleman," along with one insisting on total abstinence from all intoxicants, was readily agreed to. The Eldership deemed it expedient to discontinue licensing exhorters, but declared that "in its judgment this should be left to the local churches." A colored man was licensed who had a call to Shenandoah Valley, Va., where he proposed to start a mission, and be "responsible himself for his support;" but no appointment was made. R. L. Byrnes, who became a leader in the West Pennsylvania Eldership and a prominent official of the General Eldership, received license at this session, a man of fine character and serviceable talents. It was made the duty of local preachers to preach twenty-five sermons a year. As the ministers were at considerable expense in moving from one field to another, the various circuits were "requested hereafter to make provision for the same, in addition to the salary."

32nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Quite a full Eldership assembled October 15, 1874, in the new mission building at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, Pa., to listen to the Opening Sermon by J. Grimm, from Deut. x. 12-14. Jordan, Free Baptist Church, was again present, returning the visit of Loucks to their Conference. Jordan had formerly been a member of the Eldership, but "withdrew by mutual consent, and has held his membership among the Free Will Baptists." Expressing a desire to return to the Church of God and the West Pennsylvania Eldership, he was received, and a license voted him. The Eldership, after a full discussion, by an almost unanimous vote, decided "that the change of preachers shall take place immediately after the adjournment of the Eldership." A bond in such amount as the Board of Corporation may require was after this to be given by the Treasurer. Loucks and others made a strong effort to interest the Eldership in Mt. Pleasant Classical and Scientific Institute with a view of securing it as a Church school. The body endorsed the new monthly to be published by the Board of Publication of the General Eldership, "The Sunday-School Record." The labors of the ministry had been "signally blessed in the conversion of hundreds of souls, and peace, union and harmony prevailed." The report of the Committee on License was adopted, which recommended "that public collections be taken up at each regular appointment once during the year, to be appropriated to aid young men to prepare themselves for the ministry." The South Pittsburg and Allegheny mission was created, with S. Woods as missionary. The Shenandoah mission, Virginia, was also recognized, and J. Brown (colored) appointed. Another mission was ordered to be opened in the Kanawha Valley, W. Va., and one in Jefferson county, Pa. The Stationing Committee did not supply Pittsburg, but left Woods on the South Side Pittsburg Sunday-school Mission. The Eldership was presided over by J. Grimm, Speaker, with J. A. Cook, Transcribing Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer.

33rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership was called to meet at Harmony by P. Loucks, Chairman of the Standing Committee, on October 21, 1875. The session began the next morning, when J. W. Davis was chosen Speaker; A. C. Raysor, Stated Clerk; W. B. Long, Transcribing Clerk; B. F. Bolton, Financial and Statistical Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. Loucks preached the Opening Sermon on the evening of the 21st, and the Eldership ordered it published in The Advocate. The Eldership was much pleased with the enterprise of Dr. Ross in starting a book store in Harrisburg. The Eldership decided to publish 100,000 pamphlets giving the statistics and doctrine of the Church of God. Fairs and festivals were discountenanced because considered "a species of gambling." While several ministers passed to their reward during the year, there was an addition of seven, leaving the number of ministers of the Eldership at forty. The temperance question consumed the fourth day. The Eldership "refused to endorse the prohibition movement," but was willing to "use all lawful means consistent with its religious principles for the suppression of the liquor traffic." A revision of the Constitution was decided to be advisable, and a committee was appointed to do the work. Important action was taken "to secure greater efficiency of the ministry, the course to be pursued, and the amount of salary to be raised by stations and circuits. There were four stations, thirteen circuits and one mission.

34th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Several important matters started in 1875 came over to be finished at the session of 1876. One of these was "revising the system of co-operation, or drafting a Constitution," which was reported, and occupied the sitting on Friday afternoon and Saturday morning. Another was the question of salaries of pastors. The object was to increase salaries, for which no specific provision had been made. The following item was carefully considered, and then adopted: "That immediately after the preachers take charge of their appointments, let the deacons of each church draw up the following Article of Agreement: We, the deacons of the church of God at _____, agree, without defalcation, to raise the sum of $— for Elder _____, as a reward for his pastoral labors among us during the year _____, the same to be paid to him by the deacons quarterly in advance." The Eldership was presided over by B. F. Bolton, with A. C. Raysor, Journalizing Clerk; M. S. Pitts, Transcribing Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. There were "large ingatherings of souls all over the Eldership," and "harmony and peace prevailed among the churches." Finding that the Eldership convened so late as "to make it very inconvenient for moving on account of cold weather," the time of meeting was changed to the first Thursday in October. Funds were limited, as the amount of collections reported by the Treasurer was only $145.09. The stations this year were four; circuits, fourteen, with one mission—Kanawha, West Va., to which W. J. Davis was appointed, with an appropriation of $100.00. The Opening Sermon was preached on Thursday evening, October 19th by M. S. Pitts, and the business session began on Friday morning, October 20th, and the Eldership adjourned on Tuesday afternoon.

35th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Meeting at Benwood, West Va., October 4, 1877, the distance prevented a large audience. Nineteen teaching elders were absent, and nineteen were present, with twenty delegates and four messengers. The Opening Sermon was preached by J. Glenn, from Luke xvi. 1, 2. P. Loucks was chosen Speaker; B. F. Bolton, Journalizing Clerk; M. S. Pitts, Transcribing Clerk; J. W. Davis, Financial Clerk, and P. Loucks, Treasurer. Having a course of studies, but no permanent Board of Education, the Eldership elected an Examining Committee to examine "young preachers." The wisdom of taking up certain matters in private sittings was so clear that without opposition such meetings were arranged for in order "to consider private business." The Eldership felt the need of a system to gather more missionary money, and so in addition to requiring pastors "to collect $1.00 per member missionary money," it revived "a system to raise a permanent mission fund adopted in 1859, and re-adopted in 1865," as "the best means by which to gather a mission fund." The church at Stull's Run had become extinct, the property was ordered sold and the liabilities paid and any balance paid into the treasury. A Sunday-school convention was ordered to be held. It also strongly urged on the General Eldership "the propriety of taking such steps as in their judgment will be the most efficient to raise the means whereby we may be enabled to erect or purchase a house for a school under our immediate control." The delegates to the General Eldership were instructed to work for the issuing of a Church Hymnal. The Stationing Committee divided the territory into four stations, thirteen circuits and three missions.

36th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Of the forty-two teaching elders enrolled, twenty-eight responded at roll call when the Eldership convened at Center Bethel, Westmoreland county, October 3, 1878. There were also present twenty-one ruling elders and eight messengers. The Opening Sermon was delivered by G. J. Bartlebaugh, from Matt. xvi. 18. The churches of God have always been proverbially liberal in opening their houses of worship to irresponsible ministers. Those of the West Pennsylvania Eldership were no exception. Hence, the Eldership "discountenanced such a course" as "disreputable characters" have thus entered the pulpits and "evil consequences" have followed. The churches were "urged to be careful in this matter, and to permit no person to preach in their church houses unless they are members in good standing in some orthodox Church." The resolutions on temperance broadened out, affirming that "intemperance is not alone confined to the use of intoxicating liquors, but the use of tobacco and such other evils whereby we defile the body and render ourselves odious to society." Young ministers and applicants for licenses were requested to refrain from the use of these things. A camp-meeting was directed to be held, to be called "the Eldership camp-meeting." The cause of Sunday-schools and missions was made a special order for Tuesday afternoon, and a special program was arranged by a committee composed of B. F. Bolton, J. W. Bloyd and J. J. Fox. A Committee on Missions was created as one of the regular committees. The stations were reduced to two, the circuits increased to twenty, with two missions. Two special sermons were ordered for the session of 1879, one on Temperance and one on Missions. G. J. Bartlebaugh and R. L. Byrnes were appointed to preach them.

37th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—For reasons not disclosed, the privilege of advisory membership was no longer to be extended to ministers not members of the Church of God. They were simply to be "introduced" to the Eldership by the Speaker. The Eldership convened in 1879, at Kingwood, Somerset county, October 2nd. J. S. Marple preached the Opening Sermon from Matt. xxviii. 19. The unusual act of a Speaker-elect refusing to serve was witnessed when G. J. Bartlebaugh was elected to this office, and so the honor was conferred upon J. W. Davis. B. F. Bolton was chosen for Journalizing Clerk; W. H. H. Criswell, Transcribing Clerk; J. S. Marple, Financial Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. Under the supervision of the Standing Committee, the house of worship at Edenburg was sold. As nothing was done by the General Eldership to provide a school, the Eldership resolved that it "will, at as early a day as possible, devise means by which our young ministers may obtain an education that will enable them to hold a conspicuous place in the communities in which they might be thrown." Perhaps the reason why Bartlebaugh declined to accept the Speakership is found in his later request that he be "granted an open transfer." The Eldership still elected one of its members to preach the Opening Sermon the following year, the choice at this session being John Hickernell, with R. L. Byrnes as alternate. The Committee on the State of Religion made a hopeful report, stating that they felt "happy to say that the dark, gloomy cloud that seemingly hung over the Church of God is passing off into a glorious day, and that the opposition and prejudice to the doctrine of which we are peculiarly jealous are now giving way before us more rapidly than ever." A committee to examine in the prescribed studies was appointed for 1880. Each minister was directed "to preach a sermon in favor of the Sisters' Mission. Deeply conscious of its loss in the death of M. S. Pritts, the Eldership put on record its appreciation of his character and services, as "an able minister of the New Testament and a faithful defender of the 'faith once delivered to the saints'; a man of more than ordinary abilities as a preacher of the gospel, and a man of deep-toned, practical piety."

38th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Sixty-three members constituted the thirty-eighth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, which convened at West Newton, Westmoreland county, Pa., October 7, 1880. John Hickernell preached the Opening Sermon on Thursday evening, and on Friday morning he was elected Speaker; B. F. Bolton, First Clerk; R. L. Byrnes, Second Clerk; J. S. Marple, Financial Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. To emphasize its demand for shorter Journals in The Advocate, and to have "long, tedious Journals excluded from its pages, the Eldership directed the Transcribing Clerk "to prepare a very condensed report for publication." There was a regular "Committee on Examination" in the Course of Studies. This Committee reported that the members of the second year's class had made good progress. The delegates to the General Eldership were instructed "to use their influence to have the complete Minutes of Elderships stricken from the pages of The Church Advocate." Also "to use their influence to have the Church Hymn-book revised or to have a hymnal prepared for use in the churches." The Report of the Committee on Temperance was very strong, recommending "total abstinence from all drinks that will intoxicate." Measures were taken to enforce the Rule, "requiring local preachers to preach at least twenty-five sermons a year." The Standing Committee was instructed "to sell the church property in Pittsburg, the proceeds of the sale to be held for the purpose of opening a mission some place in the city." The pulpit was left to be supplied. Besides Pittsburg, the number of stations was three, with twenty-eight circuits and missions. S. P. P. Young was appointed "to work up the interests of the Women's Missionary Society."

39th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The progress of church work at Franklin, Venango county, was slow and discouraging, but the relation of the work to that of the adjoining circuit was such as to make it a matter of importance that it should succeed. Besides, Franklin is the county town of Venango county. It was voted in 1880 that the Eldership should be held there in 1881. And while it is the point farthest North in the occupied territory of the Eldership, the attendance was good. The Eldership met there on October 6, 1881, when D. T. Leach preached the Opening Sermon, from Prov. xviii. 24. The enrollment showed the presence of thirty-two teaching elders, twenty ruling elders and four messengers, while sixteen teaching elders were absent. R. L. Byrnes was chosen Speaker;

B. F. Bolton, Journalizing Clerk; W. H. H. McKlveen, Transcribing Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. J. R. H. Latchaw, of Iowa, became a member by transfer to the Eldership at this meeting, and was appointed to the Barkeyville circuit, Venango county. The matter of the sale of the Pittsburg church property was placed in the hands of the Board of Incorporation. A committee was appointed to revise the Constitution; but the Eldership at once made the amendment changing the number of members of the Standing Committee from five to three. A Superannuated Ministers' and Widows' Fund was created, and each pastor was "instructed to take up a collection in the month of December of each year for" said Fund. Two ministers had died during the year—P. Loucks and S. Hoerger. Loucks was characterized as "a wise and noble counsellor, a genial and affectionate brother, and one whom we had learned to love and esteem; one always active in doing good among his fellow men." Hoerger was "a noble Christian brother." "The state of religion within the bounds of the Eldership is in a flourishing condition," according to the Report of the Committee. The Report of the Financial Clerk confirmed this statement, as there were 507 conversions during the year; 6 churches organized, making a total of fifty-five churches; 93 appointments; 496 received into fellowship, and 3,415 sermons preached. The Stationing Committee made appointments to twenty-five fields of labor.

40th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Eldership in 1882 is memorable on account of several actions of unusual significance, and at the time full of inspiration. The session was well attended, there having been present 37 ministers; 14 ruling elders, and 9 messengers. Thirteen teaching elders were absent. The session was held at New Brighton, Beaver county, beginning October 5th, when W. R. Covert delivered the Opening Sermon, from Acts xx. 28. J. S. Marple was elected Speaker; J. R. H. Latchaw, Journalizing Clerk; A. R. McCahan, Transcribing Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. A Committee on Boundaries was added to the list of committees, whose duty, in addition to that of "laying out the fields of labor," was "to appropriate money for the different fields." A "donation of a valuable parsonage to the church at West Newton, Westmoreland county," was received, the gift of John and Elizabeth Mellender. The Eldership made appropriate and grateful mention of the starting of an Academy at Barkeyville, Venango county, by J. R. H. Latchaw and E. F. Loucks. This enterprise was approved as "auxiliary to our general college movement." Six sisters from different churches petitioned the Eldership for "authority to organize sisters' missionary societies in all the local churches." Permission was granted, and also the right to organize a general society, to hold annual meetings, and "to send a delegation of five members yearly to the Eldership to represent their interests." The committee to "take into consideration the financial condition of church property at Franklin, Pa.," suggested that "Bro. Shontz hold the property another year, if possible, and that Elder Young go on that work, and, if possible, raise the amount of indebtedness and pay the same, $1,600.00." The Report of the Committee to Revise the Constitution was adopted as a whole, and without opposition, except that the time-limit was extended from three to five years. A resolution severe in its terms was adopted with reference to "members of this body, and the wives of some of the members, in circulating damaging reports of ministers of this Eldership." It was denounced as "a heinous crime against the Church, as well as the ministers," and "persons found guilty shall be required to make public confession before the Eldership, or else be expelled." The Eldership rejoiced over "the cheering news coming from the East and from the West, from Maine, Kansas and Iowa, of their banishing the demon rum from their borders," and urged renewed efforts in favor of prohibition. T. Woods offered a resolution, which was adopted by a rising vote, "that proper steps should be taken to form a new Eldership, to be known as the West Virginia Eldership of the Church of God." A special committee was appointed to define the boundaries of the proposed Eldership. A "donation of $1,000.00 to this body by Bro. Sample Smith, deceased," was reported by R. L. Byrnes. Careful attention was given to the Course of Studies, and ministers were appointed to examine in each of the three years. The authority to sell the Pittsburg church property was continued.

41st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The orderly manner of effecting the organization of a new Eldership out of the southern part of the territory of the West Pennsylvania Eldership continued until the work was finished. The Committee on Boundary Lines of the West Virginia Eldership made its report in 1883.

It gave to said Eldership "Greene county, Pa.; the State of West Virginia, Preston county excepted, and that part of the State of Ohio belonging to the West Pennsylvania Eldership." The ministers contemplating going into the West Virginia Eldership were directed "to confer together immediately after the opening of the Saturday afternoon session." A temporary organization was then effected, and "the following named persons were reported as members of said Eldership: T. Woods, W. R. Craig, W. B. Long, J. S. Marple, N. M. Anderson, J. L. Lucas, H. D. Grimm and J. C. Cunningham." They were then made "advisory members of this Eldership during its entire session." This was followed by another action, holding these ministers "subject to the West Pennsylvania Eldership until the General Eldership establishes them as an Eldership." The West Pennsylvania Eldership convened at the Union Bethel, Somerset county, Pa., October 5, 1883. On the previous evening J. R. H. Latchaw preached the Opening Sermon, from Prov. xxiii. 23. The officers elected were W. H. H. McKlveen, Speaker; J. R. H. Latchaw, Journalizing Clerk; W. B. Elliott, Transcribing Clerk; R. Vanaman, Financial Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. Latchaw resigned, and J. C. Cunningham was elected. The "Committee on Boundaries was short lived, as, on motion of R. L. Byrnes, the Article creating this Committee was amended by substituting the Stationing Committee. W. R. Covert and the elders of the church at Pittsburg presented charges before the Standing Committee against Elder G. T. Clayton for refusing to co-operate with the church, or "to labor under the direction of W. R. Covert," and "for teaching doctrines and practices contrary to the received opinions of the Church of God;" and against Clayton, Richey and Krawl "for being unruly and insubordinate, and refusing to co-operate with W. R. Covert, or obey him." As Covert had "been given charge and supervision of all the work and interest of the Church of God in Pittsburg and Allegheny," the Committee upheld him in his course against these persons, but it "did not think Elder Clayton did" the things charged against him "wilfully, or that he desired to do wrong." It decided that this was a case which required the Eldership to uphold, "Section 2, of Art. XII. of the Rules of Co-operation." Charges were also preferred before the Committee by the elders of the church at Gravel Street, Benwood, West Va., against Elder A. R. McCahan, for "persecuting the church, using improper language in improper places, and making threats against W. H. Marple." On the first two charges it found McCahan guilty, and he was admonished to "pursue a different course in the future," and his relation to the church as pastor was dissolved. But the vote on the adoption of the Committee's report on Clayton was: "Yeas, 6; nays, ten; refusing to vote, 20. The death was lamented of Edward Jordan, "a man of sterling integrity, strong religious sentiments, Christian culture and holy example." There was an increase of six hundred and ninety-two members of the churches during the year. The "first Lord's day in November was set apart as a day of Thanksgiving for the mercies of the past year, and to invoke the protecting care of Almighty God over his ministers and people the coming year." "Pittsburg was made the permanent place of holding the Eldership." A Board of Education was provided for, "in accordance with the resolutions of the General Eldership of 1875."

42nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The organization of the West Virginia Eldership and the appointment of Pittsburg as "the permanent place of holding the Eldership," where each minister and delegate was required to provide for his own entertainment, effected a large reduction of the membership present at the Eldership session in 1884. There were enrolled as present eleven teaching elders and five delegates when the body "convened in the Bethel of the church, 35 Townsend street, Pittsburg, Pa., October 2, 1884." The smaller number and the expenses of entertainment served also to expedite business. In addition, the "Opening Sermon was dispensed with," and evening sessions were held, so that the Eldership adjourned in the afternoon of the 4th. R. L. Byrnes was elected Speaker; J. R. H. Latchaw, First Clerk; W. B. Elliott, Second Clerk; R. Vanaman, Financial Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. An effort was at once made to rescind the action of 1883, making Pittsburg the permanent place for holding the Eldership sessions. The motion was referred to the Committee on resolutions, which reported favorably. After considerable discussion the report was adopted by a vote of sixteen to fifteen. The Stationing Committee arranged the territory of the Eldership into twenty-one fields of labor—six stations and fifteen circuits. The Sisters' General Missionary Society appointed five delegates to the Eldership, and requested that they be recognized as such. This was done, and they "were enrolled as members of the Eldership." The Eldership heartily endorsed the action of the General Eldership in accepting the proposition made by the Free Baptists in reference to foreign mission work, and "urged upon the brethren of this Eldership the importance of giving liberally to the Permanent Foreign Mission Fund." The Board of Education secured an Act of Incorporation of Barkeyville Academy, and had a Board of Trustees, which was suggested by the Board, appointed by the Venango county court. The Eldership during the year lost one of its veteran ministers by death, A. C. Raysor. He was born near Harrisburg, Pa., April 8, 1815, and died at his home in Barkeyville, Venango county, August 21, 1884. He was originally licensed by the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1834, and shortly after was transferred to the West Pennsylvania Eldership. His father became a member of the church organized at the home of Andrew Miller, a member of the first Eldership. He was but nineteen years old when he entered the ministry. Though his education was limited, by close application to his books he became possessed of considerable acquirements. Of excellent character, strong and firm convictions, he held a high place among his fellow members of the Eldership.

43rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The West Pennsylvania Eldership had its peculiar adversities and internal troubles. It, however, always manifested remarkable equanimity and self-control as a body. It was reserved and reticent, and did not fan the fires of contention by undue publicity. Apparently there was tranquillity when the internal storms were raging most violently. The body resembled Cooper's picture of the American Aborigines, for "it is rare indeed that the philosophy of a dignified Indian is so far disturbed as to destroy the appearance of his equanimity." But its calm, cool, judicial acts revealed the evils it sought to cure or eradicate. Heresy and impurity were the foes it had to fight, and in a number of instances excommunication was the remedy. One of the first instances was a case of "heresy, insubordination and evil speaking," charged against a minister. The "charges were sustained" at the Eldership held at Pittsburg, beginning September 30, 1885, and the guilty minister "was expelled." There was an element of disloyalty in the minority, however, and the Eldership found it necessary to "direct that no minister of this body be allowed to employ, countenance, or permit to preach in his pulpit any expelled minister from this body." Barkeyville Academy was beginning to bear fruit, and among the licentiates this year was C. H. Grove, native of Dauphin county and graduate of the school, who later returned East, and became a conspicuous member in the East Pennsylvania Eldership and in the General Eldership. Twenty-one preachers and seven delegates constituted this session, who made choice of W. R. Covert for Speaker; W. H. H. McKlveen, Journalizing Clerk; R. L. Byrnes, Transcribing Clerk; R. Vanaman, Financial Clerk, and S. P. P. Young, Treasurer. The Stationing Committee made five stations and fourteen circuits. It also put Fayette Mission on the list, but had no missionary to send there. The Eldership felt an evident pride in putting on the list of appointments J. R. H. Latchaw, A. M., President of Findlay College. G. Shober reported "the purchase of a meeting-house and two lots in the village of Garrett, Somerset county," the deed for which was given to the Eldership. Such interest was developed on education in connection with Barkeyville Academy and Findlay College that the subject was made a special order. The body demanded that the "Church of God come to the front in providing facilities for the education of her youth," and expressed the belief that Barkeyville Academy is "a source of great power and influence to us as a Church." It declared itself "utterly opposed to the traffic in any form in alcoholic liquors as a beverage; against high license, low license and all kinds of license." One minister, Jesse Morgan, had paid nature's supreme debt, and was a man of excellent local standing, having "spent a long life in the ministry," "formerly in the Baptist Church, latterly in the Church of God." The body took strong ground in favor of missions, declaring "the Church of God is a missionary Church," and resolved to "appoint a missionary to establish churches in territory contiguous to circuits and stations in the Eldership."

44th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—When the Eldership adjourned in 1885, it did so to meet again "in Pittsburg, Pa., on the first Thursday in October, 1886." But the Journal in 1886 states that, "Pursuant to adjournment, the West Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God met at Connoquenessing Chapel, Beaver county, Pa., October 7, 1886." The body was organized by electing J. W. Davis, Speaker; W. H. H. McKlveen, First Clerk; W. B. Elliott, Second Clerk;

R. Vanaman, Financial Clerk, and A. M. Jones, Treasurer. To expedite business, reports of ministers were limited to seven minutes, while the reports of committees were uniformly short. Two ministers returned with transfers from the West Virginia Eldership. Separate committees were appointed by the Speaker to examine in each of the three years' Course of Studies. A candidate for license whose application was favorably reported, and who rose to early prominence in the Eldership and in the general body, was Sherman G. Yahn, formally ordained by President Latchaw. The total receipts of the Treasurer were $526.55, and expenditures, $542.65. Death had claimed one of the ministers during the year, W. H. H. Criswell. He had received his first license in 1875. Charges were sustained against one minister, and he was expelled from the Eldership.

45th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The project of publishing a "Year Book," for which C. D. Rishel, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, submitted a prospectus in 1887, met with a ready response from various Elderships, among them the West Pennsylvania Eldership, which declared it "of value in many ways to the pastors and people of the Church of God." It ordered the Clerk to gather and forward "all statistical matters, etc., asked for." The Academy at Barkeyville, Venango county, where the Eldership convened Thursday morning, October 6, 1887, gave new inspiration to the body. The three years' Course of Studies was energetically discussed; a higher standard of qualifications for the ministry was emphasized, and two sessions were principally devoted to Barkeyville Academy. Pledges were taken for the support of the school, and $1.00 per church member was to be raised, the same to be collected by the pastors. The session was presided over by W. H. H. McKlveen, Speaker; and the Clerks were C. H. Grove, W. B. Elliott and T. Woods, with A. M. Jones, Treasurer. W. J. Davis had preached the Opening Sermon the previous evening. There being a lack of lay delegates, the Eldership itself "appointed elders as delegates to equal the number of ministers." The sale agreed upon of the Pittsburgh church property was ratified by the Eldership. The brotherhood was strongly urged "to cast their ballots at the polls for men who are pledged to temperance." The Eldership refused to grant an "open transfer" to a minister, insisting that he must first "locate somewhere." The Principal of Barkeyville Academy was "recognized as a member of the Eldership during his term of office." All the "various missionary societies" were directed to "be consolidated into one society;" all collections "to be paid into treasury of the Eldership," whence was to be paid ten per cent. for foreign missions, "twenty per cent. for general missions" and "seventy per cent. retained for home missions." An effort was made to declare the offices of elder and deacon to be perpetual, or "should be continued during good behavior." The Eldership found "great cause for gratitude to Almighty God for the good will, unity, peace and love existing among the brethren," and "for the encouraging disposition manifested by the churches to increase the salaries of ministers and the awakening interest in education." The number of conversions reported was 345. The funds collected aggregated $94.04, Contingent; $190.00, miscellaneous.

46th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The arrangements made a year ago as to the Three Years' Course of Studies for ministers proved satisfactory, except the formation of the classes. Accordingly in 1888, this matter was promptly taken up, and a committee appointed, which classified the members, and made examinations imperative, which "had been neglected for six years." The session was held at Templeton, Armstrong county, beginning October 4, 1888. L. B. Appleton delivered the opening sermon the evening before. Charges were pending against Appleton, but were not sustained by a committee which investigated them. Twenty-five teaching elders were enrolled, and six delegates. Among the teaching elders was a young Barkeyville student, W. N. Yates, licensed by the Standing Committee, and "appointed pastor of the church at Pittsburg," but not so enrolled. W. R. Covert was elected Speaker; S. G. Yahn, First Clerk; C. H. Grove, Second Clerk; T. Woods, Financial Clerk, and A. M. Jones, Treasurer. To stimulate greater and more systematic activity on the part of the churches to provide adequate salaries for the ministers, it was ordered that "each minister hereafter upon entering upon his charge shall call the officials of the church or churches together and make an agreement as to the amount he shall receive for his services, the stipulated amount to be paid weekly, or monthly." The Board of Education had accepted Latchaw's resignation as Principal of Barkeyville Academy and elected Prof. E. F. Loucks, which was approved by the Eldership. "The licensing of the liquor traffic in any form" was disapproved. The Year Book was pronounced a "pamphlet of sterling worth." The Board of Education gained greater prominence as Barkeyville Academy developed into a growing school, and Findlay College assumed larger proportions. The new Board consisted of W. H. McKlveen, J. W. Davis, C. H. Grove, T. Woods and S. G. Yahn. The dollar per capita for Barkeyville Academy not having been realized, W. R. Covert was "authorized to canvass the Eldership territory to solicit and collect money and secure students." On account of the "isolated condition of many of our churches," it was given as "the sense of this body, that when it is practicable different circuits and stations should hold meetings quarterly with each other." The Report of the Financial Clerk was carefully tabulated, and showed sixteen fields of labor, not harmonizing with the six stations and fourteen circuits of the Stationing Committee. There were 54 appointments, 41 organized churches; 35½ houses of worship; 2,321 sermons preached; 295 conversions; 250 received into fellowship; 1,481 present membership; $5,449.25 salaries; $16.65 for general missions; $38.86, Home Missions; $42.60, Contingent Fund; $3,606.30, Educational Fund.

47th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The transfer of the deed of the Barkeyville Academy was tendered to the trustees of the Eldership in 1888, but was deferred "until the mortgage and the entire indebtedness against the Academy is cancelled." However, during the year, the Committee on Education reported, "the title of the property has been placed with the Eldership," but there was a debt on it of about $3,900.00, for which provision had to be made. For this purpose a committee was appointed, which reported that "the endeavor should be made during the present Eldership to raise sufficient money to pay all the indebtedness." This, however, could not be done, and loans and mortgages had to be resorted to. The Eldership had other liabilities, altogether aggregating nearly $6,000.00, and a general Financial and Missionary Agent was appointed. J. W. Davis was appointed to collect the money. The Eldership convened at Stonerville, Westmoreland county, October 3, 1889. According to a Rule adopted in 1888, the retiring Speaker, W. R. Covert, preached the Opening Sermon the previous evening. J. S. Marple was chosen Speaker; S. G. Yahn, First Clerk; C. H. Grove, Second Clerk; T. Woods, Financial Clerk, and A. M. Jones, Treasurer. The prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution had been defeated, and the Eldership showed its sense of wrong by declaring that in its "opinion the manufacture and sale, as a beverage, of all kinds of intoxicating liquors is the greatest evil, and is a crime against God and humanity, for which atonement in blood and treasure will have to be made, unless the people can be educated to use the only means at their disposal, to wit: the ballot, for its suppression." One of the "earnest laborers in the vineyard of the Lord," John Tinsman, had been "removed by death." He had "always been found at his post, and was "sadly missed by Eldership and Church." The second Sunday in November, from and after 1890, was fixed as the time for ministers appointed to new fields of labor to take charge thereof. Proxy voting at church elections was discouraged, the Eldership expressing its judgment "that all ballots cast in church meetings should be done in person, unless sickness prevents." In order more effectually to carry out its actions relative to the Course of Studies, the Eldership appointed three committees to examine in the studies of the three years. The annual report of the Treasurer showed income for Superannuated Fund, $101.35; Home Mission Fund, $77.94; Miscellaneous, $214.90. The reports of ministers were restricted to the Statistical Blanks. There were five stations and fifteen circuits.

48th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—"The Eldership of this session received a valuable acquisition to its ministerial ranks in the person of C. Manchester, who came with his transfer from the Illinois Eldership, and who took charge of the work at Barkeyville, in addition to the work in the Academy." This Eldership has quite generally been noted as a quiet, harmonious body, notwithstanding its internal troubles on several occasions. This year, when it convened at Kingwood, Somerset county, October 2, 1890, "the sittings were characterized by a degree of harmony and fraternal feeling which would presage the accomplishment of much good throughout the coming year." C. H. Grove delivered the Opening Sermon the previous evening. R. L. Byrnes was elected Speaker; C. H. Grove and W. H. McKlveen, Clerks. There were twenty-one fields of labor as reported by the Stationing Committee at the close of the session, two of which were "un-supplied," and one of which received an appropriation of $100.00. W. J. Davis was superannuated, with an appropriation of $100.00. The Eldership year was changed so that the ministers would move to new fields immediately after the adjournment of the Eldership, rescinding an action of the previous year to defer moving until a month after adjournment. The reporter recorded, that "to the shame of the Eldership, the resolution placing under the ban of disapprobation the habit of tobacco-using was lost." The actions on the educational, missionary and other Church interests were of such a judicious character as to "place them ultimately on a more substantial basis." This was foreshadowed in the Report of the Financial Agent, which showed collections aggregating upwards of $2,000.00. The wave of sentiment which passed over other Elderships in favor of increased religious services during Eldership sessions was responded to by this Eldership, when it was decided that revival services should be held at the annual sessions, beginning with "the evening of the Eldership convocation, and continuing during the session." Electioneering by ministers and delegates was branded as "a reprehensible practice." During the year death claimed "one of the most useful, faithful, efficient and indefatigable workers of the Eldership, in the person of H. Barkey." The practice of holding memorial services was observed.

49th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—An insufficient number of ministers ready to do active pastoral work is revealed in the two facts that the number of fields of labor was reduced to seventeen, several of the circuits being consolidated, and of this number four remained unsupplied. Yet three new names were added to the Ministerial Roll, and these received appointments. One, however, removed to Ohio. The session was held at Mt. Pisgah, Westmoreland county, October 1-3, 1891. The previous evening R. L. Byrnes preached the Opening Sermon, "an earnest and interesting discourse on the brevity of life and the true aims and purposes of our existence," evidently keeping in mind the evangelistic character of the services as ordered in 1890. The officers of the session were as follows: Speaker, D. A. Stevens; Journalizing Clerk, S. G. Yahn; Financial Clerk, Chas. Manchester; Treasurer, A. M. Jones. There were enrolled twenty pastors, twelve local ministers and fourteen delegates. The "prohibition of the manufacture and sale of liquor" was favored "as the only proper and successful way of dealing with the traffic." The body also expressed it as its sense of "duty to God and humanity, to Church and State, to support only such candidates for public office as stand committed in favor of prohibition." In view of the "neglect of the missionary interests of this Eldership," and the consequent fact that "the cause of God is suffering and souls of men are dying," the Eldership decided to "place a competent man in the field at once, with an appropriation of $100.00." Missionary societies were to be organized in every church, and local preachers were instructed to "go out and open new appointments." There was "a fair degree of spiritual prosperity within the bounds of the Eldership."

50th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—As this was the semi-centennial Eldership, special interest was attached to the proceedings. The venerable John Hickernell, the Speaker of the first Eldership, was present and actively participated in the work of the Eldership. He also preached the Sunday morning sermon. The statistics given at the date of this meeting were as follows: Preachers, 36; appointments, 52; organized churches, 42; church houses, 38; members, 1,951; aggregate salaries of ministers the year ending October 1, 1892, $5,672.88. Allowance in all these items must be made for losses sustained by the organization some eight years previous of the West Virginia Eldership. The Eldership convened at West Newton, Westmoreland county, October 6, 1892. The Opening Sermon was preached on the evening of October 5th, by D. A. Stevens. Choice was made of T. Woods for Speaker; S. G. Yahn, Journalizing Clerk; C. Manchester, Financial Clerk, and A. M. Jones, Treasurer. There were enough ministers to supply the six stations and fourteen circuits, as five were ordained, three of them having been students at Barkeyville Academy. Ultra action was taken on temperance, charging that "this government has made a contract with death and a covenant with hell to exchange 75,000 souls annually for a few paltry dollars." And "the ministers and laity were recommended to vote for God, home and native land by casting their ballots for prohibition." It redeemed itself on the tobacco question by voting to "recommend that licentiates be total abstainers from the use of tobacco, and that older members ought, if possible, to cease the habit." Discipline was rigidly administered, and one was twice found guilty, made confession and was pardoned, and one was expelled.

51st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The missionary spirit manifested in some previous Elderships was beginning to bear fruit, as Fayette Mission was added to the list of appointments. The number of stations was increased to seven. Pittsburg was a station, with an appropriation of $125.00 for the pastor, and $12.50 a month for Hall rent. Mission work was also "to be inaugurated and carried on in Greensburg, county seat of Westmoreland county. With these indications of prosperity and progress, the Eldership convened at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, October 5, 1893. On the previous evening T. Woods preached the Opening Sermon. There were enrolled nineteen ministers and thirteen delegates. They elected J. C. Cunningham, Speaker; S. G. Yahn, Journalizing Clerk; Geo. W. Davis, Financial Clerk, and A. M. Jones, Treasurer. The faithful, devoted and self-sacrificing veteran, W. J. Davis, was numbered with "the enfranchised dead." After "a touching report made by the Committee on Obituaries," a committee was named "to look after the matter of securing a monument for him." The Eldership did not hesitate to affirm, as against the repeated dissenting statement, that an Eldership "has a right to legislate where there is no divine law." The Eldership was resolute in its purpose to purge its ranks of unworthy men. It summarily expelled one minister for "a criminal action" and "using profane language." A few others were reprovved for "violating the Rules of Co-operation which forbid interference of former pastors with the work of a pastor in charge." While still adhering to "absolute prohibition" as the effective way of dealing with "the hydraheaded monster and unmitigated evil" of the liquor traffic; yet it "further declared in favor of a local option law as the temporary means until the desired end contemplated in prohibition is reached." It included in intemperance "the use of tobacco," which is "filthiness of the flesh," and "defiles the body and desecrates the house erected for God's own worship."

52nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—There were twenty-five ministers and eleven delegates present when on October 4, 1894, the Roll of the Eldership was called at Butler, Butler county. The Eldership added the names of Ruth Galley and Mrs. R. A. Marple, representing the W. M. Society, as "full members." It was a session which resembled a debating society. A committee was appointed on the first day "to select two persons to open each discussion on the consideration of the questions handed down by the General Eldership." These were: Ordination of Ministers by Laying on of Hands; Change of Eldership Titles, and Life Certificates. The leaders in the discussion of the first question were J. S. Marple and J. W. Davis; of the second, R. L. Byrnes and C. Manchester, while those of the third are not reported in the Minutes. The Eldership experienced additional trouble with some of the ministers. The Standing Committee had suspended one for a criminal act, and he was disfellowshipped. The churches were warned against another self-styled minister. These moral lapses of ministers had made the Eldership sensitive, and cautious in the granting of licenses. The apportionment of General Eldership assessments for its Missionary and Contingent Funds had now become the rule; but its own Funds were not yet thus replenished. To prevent hasty action in the matter of buying, building and repairing church properties, ministers were advised not to "encourage or sanction the purchase of ground or the erection or repairing of church houses or parsonages without first obtaining the consent of the Board of Trustees of the Eldership." The Eldership ratified the action of the Board of Trustees in giving its "pledge of $4,000.00 on the indebtedness of Findlay College, on condition that the balance of the $24,000 be raised by the other Elderships before July 1, 1894." There seemed gratifying progress indicated in the Report of the Stationing Committee. There were eight stations and twenty circuits, all of which were supplied. Barkeyville Academy furnished several additional young men for active work. Pittsburg station received an appropriation of $100.00, and Youghiogheny circuit, $50.00. The Eldership was presided over by W. B. Elliott, Speaker, with George W. Davis, Journalizing Clerk, and T. Woods, Financial Clerk.

53rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—A progressive spirit was manifested by the West Pennsylvania Eldership. It had the responsibility of an institution of learning at Barkeyville under its control, and literary aspirations were evident. It convened in 1895 under the shadow of Barkeyville Academy, Venango county, on October 2nd. On the evening of October 1st the Opening Sermon was delivered by Wm. B. Elliott. With twenty-six ministers, twelve delegates and three members of the Women's Missionary Society enrolled, the Eldership was organized by electing S. G. Yahn, Speaker; G. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; T. Woods, Financial Clerk. The Eldership voted in favor of a change of "Church" to "churches" in Eldership titles, and against "Association" for "Eldership;" against "ordination with the imposition of hands;" in favor of continuing annual licenses; against a General Eldership Fund out of which to pay the expenses of delegates to said body. The delegates to the General Eldership were required to vote according to instructions, and not their own views. Memorial services were held in honor of Shadrach Woods, "in whose death the Eldership lost an earnest worker and wise counselor, and the Church a strong defender." After these services "the monument erected to the memory of W. J. Davis" was "unveiled." The position of the Eldership "against the holding of fairs, festivals, etc., to raise funds for religious purposes," was emphasized, believing such means of raising money to be contrary to the spirit of the Scriptures." Two additional clerks were provided for by amendment of the Constitution—a Transcribing Clerk and a Financial Clerk. To provide additional funds to carry on aggressive Church work the Eldership decided to create a Church Extension Fund "for the purpose of helping such churches as are in straightened circumstances." Pastors were advised to put into effect a resolution to organize Y. P. S. C. Es., and a convention of these societies was recommended to be held in May, 1896. To promote "greater unity of thought on many points of vital interest among us as a body," it was voted to hold a Ministerial Association in March, 1896. The first steps were taken to organize a Ministerial Aid Society. With other Elderships, the West Pennsylvania Eldership experienced much trouble in enforcing its regulations touching a Course of Studies for ministers. To compel ministers to take the Course after licensure is a perplexing question, and the Eldership was asked by the Committee on Education to "take such steps as will secure more interest and enlist each minister not having completed the Course to a thorough study of the same." There were seven stations and nineteen circuits, each with a pastor, except two churches in Venango county which were "to be supplied from Barkeyville Academy."

54th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The Ministerial Association and the Y. P. S. C. E. Convention appointed by the Eldership in 1895 to be held in March, 1896, were well attended, and were successful. The committee to draft a Constitution for a Ministerial Benefit Association did its work, and reported in 1896, after the organization of the Eldership which "convened in the handsome new bethel, corner of Spahr and College avenues, East End, Pittsburg," October 2nd. S. G. Yahn delivered the Opening Sermon the previous evening. Upon Roll call twenty-six ministers were found to be present; twenty-one delegates, and five representatives of the W. M. S., whose "names were entered as voting members of the Eldership." Balloting for officers resulted in the election of J. W. Davis, Speaker; George W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; George W. Davis, Transcribing Clerk; J. C. Yates, Financial Clerk. Educational interests were thoroughly discussed, in which eight ministers and laymen participated, during which the condition of Barkeyville Academy was carefully canvassed. A striking innovation was the special order for Saturday, 2.30 p. m., when Hon. H. L. Castle, a Pittsburg lawyer, delivered an address on "Christian Citizenship," followed by the report of the Committee on Temperance. The Committee held it to be a "self-evident truth, that the liquor traffic can not be legalized without sin;" also, that any form of license, tax or regulation, whatever name called by, to be criminal in its complicity and sinful in its nature." And so the members were "called upon to repudiate any political party that does not openly declare for the suppression of the liquor traffic." Castle's address was ordered "placed on the Journal and published with the Journal in The Church Advocate." The state of religion was considered to be good; commendable zeal being "manifested in many places by the erection of churches and parsonages and the repairing of houses of worship." But "along the line of finances much improvement should be made;" "more aggressive action should be taken in regard to missions." The sale of the church property at Garrett was authorized. The Committee on License was unusually emphatic and unequivocal in declaring that a certain candidate is not "considered qualified for the ministry either in doctrine or ordinary intelligence," and "advising brethren against giving him recognition on their fields of labor." It also "called attention to the fact that no minister or ministers have the right to issue licenses, or certificates of any character, clothing men with authority to preach the gospel, or to perform the functions thereof, but the Eldership, or its regularly appointed Boards." As the Eldership realized that "there never was a time in the history of the Church when we needed more activity than now," it "set apart Sabbath, December 20th, as missionary day," to be a day of earnest prayer in every church "for the Lord of the harvest to open the way and send forth laborers into the field." By an amendment to the Constitution, a Board of Missions, consisting of five members, was provided for, to which were to be "committed our Home Mission interests." The receipts during the year for Home Missions were $300.18, and for General Eldership Mission Fund, $242.91. The Course of Studies was to be taken by "all ministers who came into the Eldership since 1890." The Board of Education was to classify those enrolled as students, and to conduct the annual examination. The territory of the Eldership was divided into eight stations and seventeen circuits.

55th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—It was said of the fifty-fifth session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, that "all the business was done as service to the Lord;" that "from the first the sittings were characterized by deep spirituality." The Eldership convened at Avenue, Allegheny county, Friday, October 1, 1897. The enrollment consisted of forty-eight ministers, of whom ten were absent and three had died during the year; and twenty-one ruling elders. The election for officers resulted in the choice of R. L. Byrnes, Speaker; Geo. W. Byrnes, First Clerk; Geo. W. Davis, Transcribing Clerk; Thos. Woods, Financial Clerk, and S. Arnold, Treasurer. The Speaker and clerks appointed the regular committees, "during which time the Eldership was engaged in prayer and song service," so that no business was transacted until after the committees were announced. One minister "was granted a letter of dismissal on the ground of a change of his convictions on Church doctrine." A strong deliverance on temperance as "a political as well as moral" issue, in one of the paragraphs cast some cloud of suspicion on some ministers, in that it declared that "if any minister, in any way, shall countenance the use of strong drink, or in any way excuse its use by others, he is out of harmony with the churches of God, and that he be dealt with accordingly." One indeed was suspended by the Standing Committee against whom this was one of the charges, and he was expelled by the Eldership. The spirituality of the sittings was promoted by the passage of a resolution advising "all ministers while making their reports to omit all trifling jests. . . . and characterize their remarks with the respect appertaining to the clerical office;" and also by the order directing the observance of the ordinances of washing the saints' feet and the Lord's Supper at each annual session." The "taking of the Church paper" was made compulsory on ministers. The aggressive spirit of the body was manifested by directing all ministers to open new appointments wherever possible; requiring each pastor to preach at least one missionary sermon at each appointment annually; by the provision to have a permanent mission fund, and by encouraging missionary activity on the part of the W. M. S. The Eldership approved and commended the practice of having pastors and churches at the beginning of the year come to an understanding as to the amount of salary to be paid to the minister. To prevent the giving of mortgages for local church properties which would become a lien on all Eldership property, action was taken requiring such mortgages to be limited to the particular local property. The state of religion throughout the Eldership was gratifying. The "labors of ministers and churches were blessed and many souls were saved through their instrumentality." If "history has a Nemesis for every sin," it also records a blessing as following genuine repentance. "During the year past three of our number have been called home," reported the Committee on Obituaries. These were J. F. Smith, who came into the Eldership from the M. E. Church, a man of much power and energy;" J. C. Yates, a young man, and a rising man, "stricken down almost in the days of his youth," and G. W. Shober, "a man of years and experience," a good man, an honest, God-honoring man." The total Eldership receipts were $908.35; disbursements, $774.51. The aggregate salaries of pastors was $8,044.00. Total membership, 2,389. The Stationing Committee made twenty-nine appointments.

56th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—"One to whose memory only volumes could do justice" died within a month after adjournment in 1897. John Hickernell, born at Lisburn, Cumberland county, Pa., December, 1814, died at Findlay, Hancock county, Ohio, October 30, 1897. Converted in his native village when about twelve years of age, in a revival held by Winebrenner, but growing indifferent he was reclaimed about seven years later, and began exhorting, he entered the ministry in the East Pennsylvania Eldership in 1838, and was appointed to the Pittsburgh Mission. He was Speaker of the first West Pennsylvania Eldership, and a delegate to the first General Eldership. "He was a man of great ability, and one whose life was pre-eminently successful." He had an unusual passion for souls, and "felt a far greater interest in the conversion of sinners than in anything else," was his own testimony after "twenty-five years spent in preaching the gospel." The Opening Sermon of the Eldership following his death was preached by R. L. Byrnes, and was, by action of the Standing Committee, "a memorial sermon." The session was held at West Newton, Westmoreland county, October 6-8, 1898. It consisted of thirty ministers and eighteen delegates. S. G. Yahn was made Speaker; Geo. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; Geo. W. Davis, Transcribing Clerk, and T. S. Woods, Financial Clerk. To guard against encumbering churches with heavy debts ministers were required to obtain consent of the Board of Trustees before buying or repairing church property. Only sickness or death would secure leave of absence from the Eldership. The Principal of Barkeyville Academy, G. W. Davis, was granted permission to visit the churches to secure means and work up interest in the institution. There was a praiseworthy "thirst for knowledge manifested on the part of the majority of ministers," and the Board of Education could "truthfully testify to the intellectual improvement of the majority." A good degree of spirituality was maintained throughout the territory of the Eldership, and much good had been done in saving souls. The liquor business was regarded as "a legalized crime," and that we as a "body of Christian workers urge our fellow men to go out of partnership with the saloon and the devil, and vote as we pray, or else change our prayers."

57th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Quite a successful year followed the session of 1898, and yet the total membership was reduced to 2,042. The conversions were 407; accessions, 364; expelled and dismissed by letter, 31. There were fifty-six church houses and church organizations. The session of 1899 was held at New Brighton, Beaver county, October 5-9. The Opening Sermon on the evening of the 4th was delivered by S. G. Yahn. In the granting of Life Certificates the Eldership exercised unusual care. It named a committee, consisting of R. L. Byrnes, S. G. Yahn and J. W. Davis, to consider the matter, and to make such recommendations as it may "deem wise concerning the names on the Ministerial Roll, and also recommendations concerning applicants for license." It recommended that applicants for license receive "licentiate certificates.....to be renewed annually until they have completed the Eldership Course of Studies." It recommended that thirty of the ministers named receive Life Certificates, and that such Certificates be withheld from nine others "till such time as they shall receive work from the Eldership," while the names of the four others were "placed in the hands of the Standing Committee with discretionary power." One minister requested his name be stricken from the Roll "as he had accepted work with the Christian Alliance." While the request was granted, it led to a lengthy discussion, and the passage of a resolution declaring "that what is commonly called faith-healing and sanctification as a second work of grace are not in harmony with the teachings and practice of the churches of God in the United States as a body." There was considerable of a reaction in spiritual things, as the Committee on the State of Religion "deplored the low ebb of spirituality, the neglect of the ordinances, and the fact that the Church was not advancing more rapidly." The officers which conducted the business of the Eldership so acceptably were D. A. Stevens, Speaker; Geo. W. Davis, Journalizing Clerk; W. H. Guyer, Transcribing Clerk; J. L. Updegraph, Financial Clerk, and Geo. W. Stoner, Treasurer.

58th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The revised Constitution of the West Pennsylvania Eldership was printed in a neat pamphlet in 1900. It made the Standing Committee the Board of Missions, and gave it judicial powers, but it could not expel a minister found guilty under charges. No one could be "declared elected to any position unless he received a majority of all the votes cast." A Financial Clerk was to be elected in addition to the other officers. Officers of the Eldership were made ineligible to membership on the Standing Committee. There was to be a Board of Trustees, constituted of the officers of the Eldership and the Standing Committee. Provision was made for appeals from churches by members subjected to discipline. A regular form for ordination services was prescribed, with certain questions to be addressed to applicants by the President. The session of 1900 was held at Kingwood, Somerset county, October 3-6. W. Harris Guyer delivered the Opening Sermon. There were enrolled thirty-eight ministers and thirteen delegates. Officers elected were: President, W. B. Elliott; Journalizing Clerk, G. W. Byrnes; Transcribing Clerk, W. H. Guyer; Financial Clerk, J. L. Updegraph; Treasurer, Geo. W. Stoner. The Standing Committee was specially charged "to make careful inquiry in regard to the doctrinal faith of all ministers whose names may be referred to it." Any minister found "not in harmony with the doctrines and practices of the churches of God" was to be "requested to return his Certificate of Ordination." The Constitution of the church at Butler was decided to be in conflict with the Rules of Co-operation of the Eldership, and certain Articles were declared "void," and the pastor was "censured by this Eldership for his evident insubordination," as he "was chiefly instrumental in the preparation of said Constitution." As the troubles in the churches at Butler and Glade Mills were caused by the Christian Alliance, "said Alliance shall not be granted the use of said church houses for services without permission of the Standing Committee." The Eldership voted that "all the ministers and members of the Eldership and of the church which they represent ought to be strong prohibitionists." A missionary spirit was to be inculcated by all the pastors. Increased spirituality was declared to be manifested among the churches. A. C. Bowers, appointed a missionary to India in 1902, was ordained; also S. Fulmer; but one minister was requested to return his Certificate of Ordination. The Statistics contained these items: Churches, 51; church houses, 49; conversions, 124; baptized, 137; accessions, 254; membership, 1,223. The appointments numbered twenty-four—six stations and eighteen circuits.

59th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The result of the investigation of the doctrinal views of certain ministers by the Standing Committee, ordered by the Eldership in 1900, was the surrender of their Certificates of Ordination by two, and the acknowledgment of insubordination, and confession and forgiveness of another. The Eldership justly had the reputation of "moral earnestness in the performance of its official duties." It had among its leading men at all times those whose essential greatness of character stood out in salient relief. This was clearly evident at the session held at Ursina, Somerset county, October 3-6, 1901. On the evening of October 2nd the Opening Sermon was preached by W. B. Elliott. The officers elected were: President, T. S. Woods; Journalizing Clerk, G. W. Byrnes; Transcribing Clerk, W. H. Guyer; Financial Clerk, J. L. Updegraph; Treasurer, Geo. W. Stoner. Strenuous measures were decided upon to the end that the evil effects and schisms in the churches resulting from the teaching of faith-cure and second-work sanctification might be overcome, and harmony and peace restored. One minister was expelled for intemperance, and two others returned their ordination papers. Two ministers answered the last roll-call, and joined the invisible host—N. I. Van and C. Kreger—whose loss the Eldership "felt very keenly." Pastors were instructed to organize missionary societies in every church. It was also decided to devote "one evening during each session of the Eldership to our missionary interests." One representative from each missionary society was to be received as an advisory member of the Eldership. By ordination, services conducted by R. L. Byrnes, Forney O. Eakin and Geo. M. Hulme, became members of the Eldership. The Eldership's admiration for the character of President McKinley and its detestation of the crime which ended his illustrious career were expressed in resolutions declaring that he was "our greatest statesman and most noble President," "stricken down by the vile hand of anarchy;" and, that "we detest and denounce the methods and doctrines of anarchists as entirely without excuse, and treasonable." Lynchings in general were regarded "as destructive of justice, cruel and revolting." The Executive Board was requested to change the place for holding the next session of the General Eldership. The state of religion and morals throughout the Eldership was "highly gratifying."

60th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The West Pennsylvania Eldership during the year 1901-2 had the gratification of seeing one of its young ministers leave his native land and go to India as a foreign missionary. And so in 1902 it enrolled "A. C. Bowers—Indian Mission Field." Suitable resolutions were placed on the Minutes "touching the departure of Rev. A. C. Bowers and wife for India." The session was held at Barkeyville, Venango county, September 25-28, 1902. T. S. Woods delivered the Opening Sermon. The lay representation was small, there being present eleven delegates, with thirty-three ministers. The President was S. G. Yahn; Journalizing Clerk, G. W. Byrnes; Transcribing Clerk, W. H. Guyer; Financial Clerk, J. L. Updegraph; Treasurer, G. W. Stoner. The action of the General Eldership in calling a Convention in June, 1903, "to organize a Woman's General Missionary Society" was "heartily approved." Provision was made for a "Convention in connection with the next mid-year meeting of our Ministerial Association to organize a Woman's Missionary Society of the West Pennsylvania Eldership to be represented in the Convention in June, 1903." A petition to the General Eldership was adopted "earnestly requesting" said body to take action relative to the destructive schisms caused in churches of West Pennsylvania Eldership by the teaching of faith-healing and second-work sanctification." S. G. Yahn and R. L. Byrnes were the active promoters of this movement to purge the Eldership of this element of discord. Notwithstanding the faith-cure and second-work sanctification propaganda, with the painful results which followed, the churches were reported as "never in a better condition." The death of John Hovis was sincerely lamented, a minister who "for fifty-two years held a Certificate of Ordination from this Eldership." His chief distinction was a spirit of self-sacrifice, and "above all his true, earnest Christian life." "His trust and un-failing courage in preaching the gospel of Christ won for him success." A "Certificate of Merit" was given to G. W. Byrnes, J. L. Updegraph and A. W. Snyder, who had completed the Course of Studies. The establishment of "our own Publishing House" was a "source of real satisfaction" to the Eldership: The number of conversions during the year was 269; but only 68 persons were baptized, while 225 were received into fellowship. The total membership was 2,237.

61st West Pennsylvania Eldership.—A more normal and peaceful condition prevailed throughout the territory of the Eldership as a result of the measures of discipline so effectively used for several years. But following the Convention held at Findlay, Ohio, to organize a W. G. M. S., certain defamatory publications had been put in circulation, reflecting on the Standing Committee of the West Pennsylvania Eldership, and others. The Eldership adopted charges against the author, which S. G. Yahn was authorized to prosecute before the Executive Board of the General Eldership. These several actions served only to cement the bond of unity of the Eldership which held its annual session at Liberty, Fayette county, beginning October 1, 1903. S. G. Yahn preached the Opening Sermon. The body was organized by electing T. S. Woods, President; G. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; R. N. Dillon, Transcribing Clerk; J. L. Updegraph, Financial Clerk; Geo. W. Stoner, Treasurer. The organization of the W. G. M. S. at Findlay was "heartily commended." "Special thought and effort" were resolved to be "given to establishing churches of God in the towns and cities within the territory of this Eldership." Though the "state of religion will compare favorably with that of other religious bodies," said the Eldership; yet "it should be brighter. We urge a more thorough consecration on the part of our ministers, that the standard of religion may be raised and spirituality deepened." Simon Fulton, ordained in 1874, was "called from labor to reward" during the year. He was "a most exemplary Christian worker." Three new churches were received into the Eldership, but the fields of labor were two less than in 1900. All were supplied with efficient pastors. The ministry was replenished, and among the active workers was a fair proportion of well-equipped young men consecrated to their life mission.

62nd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Order and harmony grew out of the readjusted relations of the church at Butler to the Eldership, and a spirit of co-operation was developed. For said church in 1904 "royally entertained the Eldership," and "the session was characterized with the spirit of love and kindness." The Opening Sermon was preached on the evening of October 5th, by T. S. Woods. On Thursday morning the reorganization was effected by the election of W. H. Guyer, President; Geo. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; R. N. Dillon, Transcribing Clerk; J. L. Updegraph, Financial Clerk, and G. W. Stoner, Treasurer. "The new church at Connellsville was admitted to membership in the Eldership." There were now nine stations and fifteen circuits, and the India Mission. The "spiritual standard of the Eldership" was found to be "above the standard for many years." It was resolved to "make greater effort to excel in spiritual activities during the coming year." Conversions reported were 254; baptized, 104; accessions, 236; membership, 2,052. The Eldership received a bequest of $1,000.00 from Jonathan Glenn, to become a part of the Permanent Superannuated and Widows' Fund. It was decided to "hold a camp-meeting in 1905 in a central place, that we may bring the brethren together for a spiritual awakening." One minister who had been suspended by the Standing Committee for violating the Rules of Co-operation was expelled from the Eldership. The Eldership reaffirmed its former action on the missionary questions which were agitating the Elderships and churches generally at this time. An exception was made by the Committee on Obituaries by reporting resolutions on the death of a lay-elder, J. B. Henderson, "a life-long friend, brother and co-worker in all the various departments of church and educational work."

63rd West Pennsylvania Eldership.—A superficial view of the doings of the West Pennsylvania Eldership will leave the impression that few of the Annual Elderships, if any, had such frequent occasions to discipline some of their members for lapses in moral conduct. Its Constitution, as is the rule, provided that ministers "are amenable to the Eldership for their conduct, and may be tried and expelled by the same when found guilty of any crime, or of conduct unbecoming a minister of the gospel." At the session which convened at Alverton, Westmoreland county, October 5, 1905, this power was exercised in a fearless manner. One minister had been "suspended for conduct unbecoming a minister of the gospel," and was "expelled and his name erased from the Roll" by the Eldership. The name of one "was stricken from the Roll" because he "had become identified with another Church." One was "severely censured for his indiscreet conduct," and was "required to make a public apology before the Eldership." These actions were taken with "closed doors;" but such actions can not be kept secret. The officers elected at this session were—President, J. L. Updegraph; Journalizing Clerk, W. W. Anderson; Transcribing Clerk, W. H. Guyer; Financial Clerk, J. W. Whisler; Treasurer, G. W. Stoner. The Eldership was in full accord with the General Eldership in its actions and "plans for foreign mission work," and endorsed the basis of union of the Missionary societies. It had twelve Missionary societies, with a membership of 374. Also 14 societies of Christian Endeavor. Its 41 Sunday-schools had an enrollment of 2,310. There were 47 churches, 50 houses of worship; 206 were received into fellowship, and the total membership was 1,920. Its superannuated ministers and widows of ministers were to be provided for by "the establishing of a permanent Superannuated Ministers' and Widows' Fund," for the raising of the funds of which a regular agent was appointed. The Eldership always was progressive on the temperance question. Recalling the deliverance on this subject by the first General Eldership, which it regarded as "advanced ground," it insisted that "we bring this subject properly before our people from the pulpit." It further expressed its "disapproval of the license system," and its "adherence to the principle of prohibition." The Eldership had one Slavic church, and it had one minister and his wife in India as missionaries. The Slavic church was located at Sharon, Pa., and was organized by Jacob Luchansky. It built a house of worship, which was dedicated October 15, 1905.

64th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—It is a strong commendation of a religious body to state as a fact that in its session it was "perfectly united on all questions, and everything of importance was passed by a unanimous vote." More so when the troubles relative to ministerial conduct had so recently been adjusted by judicial processes. Also, when action of great moment had to be taken relative to "actions of the General Eldership, the Woman's General Missionary Society and the work of the Commission on Unification." But it was thoroughly united, and "put itself on record as being in perfect harmony with the General Eldership" and all its interests. The session was held at West Newton, Westmoreland county, October 4-6, 1906. On the evening of October 3rd J. L. Updegraph preached the Opening Sermon. There were 34 ministers enrolled, and 13 delegates. Three new names were added to the Roll, two of which were of Slavic nationality, who had "established missions in several towns in western Pennsylvania." They were John and Jacob Luchansky, who had been raised in the Roman Catholic Church, but were converted to the faith of the church at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, Pa. The officers elected were: President, G. W. Byrnes; Journalizing Clerk, W. W. Anderson; Transcribing Clerk, W. H. Guyer; Financial Clerk, J. L. Updegraph; Treasurer, G. W. Stoner. The Eldership "placed itself on record as advocating local option in this State." It also declared that "it is inconsistent to pray for temperance, and cast your ballot for intemperance and the legalizing of the liquor traffic." That the "perpetuation and extension of the Church of God required that the doctrines of the Church be kept before the people constantly" was expressed as the belief of the body. Hence, it strongly endorsed the periodical literature published by the General Eldership, and "The Philosophic Basis of Ordinances," by Dr. Forney, and "Robert Woodknow," by C. F. Reitzel. Building new houses of worship and parsonages and repairing and improving old ones was an encouraging indication. This was characteristic of all religious bodies from 1900 to 1913. From 1900 to 1906 the total value of Church property in the United States had increased 100 per cent., when it reached the enormous aggregate of $1,257,575,867.00. The following seven years it again nearly doubled in value, being over $2,000,000,000.00. In 1906 the forty-eight churches in the Eldership owned forty-eight houses of worship. The membership numbered 1,676, 311 having been fellowshipped during the year. The Eldership had a Course of Studies which it considered "an indispensable factor in our work, which no young minister can afford to be without." A regular Committee on Examination of Ministers in the Course of Studies was maintained. This Eldership was an inspiration. It was called "an optimistic Eldership," and "truly a Church of God peace Eldership."

65th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Thirty-four ministers and eleven delegates were enrolled for the sixty-fifth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. According to the records, "the Eldership is not quite as strong numerically as it was ten years ago." This was owing to "a judicious sifting and pruning process;" to the "revised and improved Course of Studies, and making its provisions obligatory," and to "the Life Certificate of Ordination," as some who had annual licenses were denied Life Certificates. Some few were also disfellowshipped because they "taught doctrines which are not in harmony with the doctrines of the churches of God, such as 'faith healing' and 'second-work' sanctification." Even at this session one of the Slavic ministers was "reproved" for "preaching doctrines contrary to the doctrines of the Church, and teaching revelations by visions and dreams." The Certificate of Ordination of A. C. Bowers, missionary to India, was "recalled, he having accepted work from the American Baptist Missionary Union." The session of 1907 was held at Brackenridge, Allegheny county, October 3-6. On the evening of October 2nd G. W. Byrnes delivered the Opening Sermon. J. W. Whisler was chosen President; G. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; W. H. Guyer, Transcribing Clerk; J. L. Updegraph, Financial Clerk; G. W. Stoner, Treasurer. Good financial management characterized the Eldership, as "the funds for local and general work were all raised by the pastors." "Assessments were paid in full, and balances were left in various Funds of the Treasury." There was great unanimity of sentiment, as actions on the most important subjects "were all adopted unanimously." Thorough discussion of these subjects was had, so "that each member of the Eldership fully understood the meaning of every word before he voted." During the year there were 299 conversions; 122 baptized, and 147 fellowshipped. The Permanent Superannuated and Widows' Fund was growing, as $500.00 were subscribed during the year. On "the deplorable division of our foreign missionary forces" the Eldership adopted unanimously, by a ye and nay vote, the emphatic resolutions submitted by G. W. Byrnes, G. W. Stoner and J. S. Boyd, Committee on Resolutions. They approved the work of the Commission, and placed "the responsibility for the continued division" elsewhere than on the General Eldership or any of its Boards, Societies or Agents. Always progressive in educational matters, the body reaffirmed its advanced positions on all questions pertaining to the educational institutions of the Church, and on the training of the young men for the ministry. Not only was prayer requested, that the Lord of the harvest send forth reapers into his vineyard;" but it was urged that "the brotherhood and the pastors talk to young men relative to their entering the ministry."

66th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Readjustment of some of the fields of labor caused fluctuations in the number of charges, which at the enrollment in 1908 was twenty-three, instead of twenty-six in 1907. The session was held at Ursina, Somerset county, October 1-3. The Opening Sermon was preached by J. W. Whisler, and was "a clarion call to soul-winning." The Eldership elected S. G. Yahn, President; G. W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; W. H. Guyer, Transcribing Clerk; J. L. Updegraph, Financial Clerk; G. W. Stoner, Treasurer. A new feature of the Eldership was a "Church Historian," an office which was filled by the election of S. G. Yahn, who was to be succeeded by W. H. Guyer. It was expected that this would prove of "no little good to the Eldership." On the missionary interests of the General Eldership the resolutions kept in view the meeting of said body in 1909, and its sentiments were forcibly expressed in favor of "the supreme authority of the General Eldership;" that "foreign missionary work and workers must be brought under one management," and strongly approving all actions hitherto taken to this end, and of the work of the W. G. M. S. and others in promoting general unity and co-operation. The Carnegie endowment proposition was regarded as affording "a great opportunity" for enlarging the endowment fund of Findlay College, and "earnest efforts were pledged to secure at least $5,000.00 within our Eldership." Delinquents in the Course of Studies were made to realize that the displeasure of the Eldership would rest upon them should they fail to diligently pursue these studies. Forbearance was exercised because some of the delinquents were doing good work as pastors, and their services were needed to supply the fifty-seven churches of the Eldership. Three hundred and eight were fellowshiped during the year, and but fifteen dismissed by letter and expelled, making the total membership 2,274. In the forty-nine Sunday-schools there were 3,014 scholars. There were fifteen missionary societies and ten Y. P. S. C. E. In every interest the Eldership "placed itself in hearty accord, and in co-operation with, and approval of, the Boards and work of the General Eldership."

67th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The loss to the Eldership of one of its strongest and most efficient ministers was anticipated in 1908, so that when in 1909 S. G. Yahn, having been elected Editor of The Advocate, took his transfer to the East Pennsylvania Eldership, it was prepared for it. He preached the Opening Sermon when the body convened at Pittsburg, Wednesday evening, October 6, 1909, which "was a heart-talk to those with whom he had been closely associated for twenty-three years." The Eldership parted with him with deep regret, and declared that "his relations with the Eldership have been pleasant, profitable and inspiring; his demeanor ever in keeping with the sanctity and dignity of the high office of the Christian ministry; his leadership conservatively wise and progressive; his scholarship broad and ennobling; his fellowship helpful and inspiring; his devotion and loyalty to, and his care of, the churches true and ardent." When the Eldership was constituted, with thirty-one ministers and twenty-two delegates, it elected Thomas S. Woods, President; George W. Byrnes, Journalizing Clerk; W. Harris Guyer, Transcribing Clerk; John W. Whisler, Financial Clerk; George W. Stoner, Treasurer. The Field Secretary of Findlay College, O. A. Newlin, was made welcome, and represented the endowment fund of the College. In response, the Eldership resolved that "we join in the slogan, 'The Carnegie offer must be met,' and it pledged itself "to do our utmost to attain this end." A hopeful condition of the churches was reported, as "old churches were being strengthened and new ones are being organized." "The spirituality of the churches seems not to have declined, and the intellectual status of the Church is greatly improved." The need of better remuneration for ministers was insisted upon, as many are underpaid." A more scientific "system of finance" was urged upon the churches, as thus not only could ministers' salaries be made more adequate, but all Eldership and current funds could more easily be raised. To this end the Financial Clerk was authorized to advise and assist churches in "inaugurating some such financial system," and also "to supply them with information and literature relative to the subject."

68th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—The West Pennsylvania Eldership gave another proof in 1910 of its interest in, and loyalty to, every enterprise of the General Eldership. There was a corresponding healthful concern by its members in all its own enterprises. It quoted in full in its Journal the "rules and conditions" governing the Church Extension Fund of the General Eldership, a Fund established in 1909, and "heartily approved said rules and conditions," and "urged men and women of this Eldership who have means at their command to give to this Fund, or make provision for the same in their wills." The session was held at West Newton, Westmoreland county, the Opening Sermon having been delivered October 5th, by Thomas S. Woods, from II. Chron. ix. 18, 19. Theme: "Six Steps to the Throne." Realizing the need of economizing the time of the Eldership, a new order for the reports of ministers was adopted, and all ministers were "required to make their reports to the Financial Clerk for record as early in the session as possible," and these reports were "made a special order of business, interspersed with such devotional services as in the judgment of the President shall be suitable." The finances of the Eldership were in a good condition, showing aggregate balances in the Treasurer's hands of $1,777.81, and invested funds, $3,650.00. On temperance the Eldership declared "that no member of the churches of this Eldership shall contribute by voice, vote or influence to the perpetuation and protection of the liquor traffic," and "the elective privilege shall be used to free the country from dishonest and criminal complicity in said traffic." Also, "that one can not be a conscientious Christian and vote for the candidates for any national or State office who are in alliance or favor of the saloon." It deprecated "the tendency to introduce a Continental Sabbath" in this country, and deemed such a course "unchristian," and urged that "the Sabbath day be kept holy," and that on that day every form of business should be suspended. Sermons were to be preached at all appointments on the proper observance of the day. Unalterable opposition was voiced against the "display of immoral scenes on bill-boards and in shop windows, as being detrimental to the morals of our youths." It also recognized the fact that "a general wave of indifference and spiritual coldness is passing over our country, blighting the churches," and warned "the churches of the danger and harm resulting from spiritual coldness and ungodly indifference." The officers of this session were as follows: President, W. J. Umstead; Journalizing Clerk, George W. Byrnes; Transcribing Clerk, W. Harris Guyer; Financial Clerk, John W. Whisler; Treasurer, George W. Stoner.

69th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Real estate of the West Pennsylvania Eldership is managed by the Board of Trustees, composed of the officers of the Eldership and the Standing Committee. It "holds and controls all property, whether personal or real estate." Many of the houses of worship are deeded to this Board, and "any church desiring to buy or repair property" must "first obtain the consent of" this Board. Property interests are thus well safeguarded. Occasionally this Board has been obliged to sell, or to mortgage, properties held by it, as following the Eldership of 1910 it directed the sale of Camp Grove and McQuiston church lots, and placed a mortgage of $3,000.00 on the property in Franklin. It also authorized the sale of "Glade Mills church property," and "granted permission to the church at Indian Head to repair, reseat and paint their bethel." All its actions were reported each year to the Eldership and passed upon. Its report in 1911 included a number of such items. The session was held said year with the church at Indian Head, Fayette county, beginning Thursday morning, October 5th. The previous evening W. J. Umstead preached the Opening Sermon, on "The Constancy and final Triumph of the Church of God." J. S. Boyd was chosen President; Wm. Harris Guyer, Journalizing Clerk; L. Edwin Yahn, Transcribing Clerk; John W. Whisler, Financial Clerk; George W. Stoner, Treasurer. Before the organization, in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive Board of the General Eldership, an hour was set apart for "prayer for the fostering of Christian unity throughout the bounds of the General Eldership." The sentiment of loyalty to the Eldership and to the General Eldership received expression in several actions. Thus it was "deemed an act of disloyalty to the interests of our literature to wilfully neglect to observe the day set apart by the General Eldership" known as "Advocate Day." One of the qualities most admired in agents of the General Eldership was their "loyalty to the doctrines and principles of the churches of God." The churches were counseled to "enter into agreements with their preachers, and fix a certain amount to be paid each year, and that it be paid in a systematic way." Arrangements were ordered to be made to put an agent in the field "whose duty it shall be to arouse interest throughout our Sunday-schools and C. E. societies, and to formulate plans for an annual convention to be held in connection with the Ministerial Association and Missionary Convention." This convention was to last three days. In addition to the very creditable amount toward the Endowment Fund of Findlay College by brethren and churches of the Eldership, the body also held two scholarships. An additional one was provided for by the Somerset county circuit for any student at the College from said circuit. In general, "a good, healthful growth within the bounds of the Eldership" was reported.

70th West Pennsylvania Eldership.—Thirty-one ministers and eighteen delegates were enrolled for the seventieth annual session of the West Pennsylvania Eldership. They represented a total of forty-eight churches and 2,670 members. The estimated value of church property, including the fifteen parsonages, was $143,900.00. The session was held at New Brighton, Beaver county, beginning October 4, 1912. On the previous evening J. S. Boyd delivered the Opening Sermon. An organization was effected by the election of R. N. Dillon, President; W. Harris Guyer, Journalizing Clerk; S. Fulmer, Transcribing Clerk; J. W. Whisler, Financial Clerk; G. W. Stoner, Treasurer. The Standing Committee: J. L. Updegraph, W. J. Umstead and F. O. Eakin. Judiciary Committee: J. S. Boyd, J. W. Whisler and R. L. Byrnes. Stationing Committee: R. L. Byrnes, J. L.

Updegraph, W. H. Guyer, J. W. Whisler and S. Fulmer. The Eldership suffered serious loss by the appointment of one of its best qualified ministers, W. Harris Guyer, as Professor of Theology and History in Findlay College. In his stead it received a well equipped young man in the person of H. R. Lobb, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership, as two years previous it had received R. L. Crawford from the same Eldership. The retirement of R. L. Byrnes deprived the Eldership and churches of an efficient and able minister and a wise and judicious counsellor, whose "exemplary life and loyalty are a splendid example for the ministry and laity." The body recorded expressions of "sincere regret," and assured Dr. Byrnes of its "esteem and love," and its "earnest desire and prayer that God's rich blessing and reward be constantly his." The Eldership renewed its assurances of co-operation with, and loyalty to, our educational institutions. The year's work was somewhat inspiring, as there were 560 conversions; baptized, 276; accessions, 341. The total salaries received by the pastors was $10,214.86. The "progressive plan for extending the work in India" was commended, and the Eldership expressed its pleasure "with the frontier mission work as carried on by the Board of Missions of the General Eldership." As being thoroughly loyal to all these interests, it pledged its continued support to home and foreign mission work. Denunciation of the liquor traffic was followed by the Eldership putting itself "on record to fight this great evil in all its phases, and to encourage every legitimate movement that has the destruction of the liquor traffic as its end." By emphatic action the pulpits of all the churches of God in the territory of the Eldership were declared "closed to any and all persons known to be out of harmony with this Eldership." The occasion of this action was the withdrawal from the Eldership of one of the ministers who was "not strictly in harmony with its teachings along certain doctrinal lines." The Permanent Superannuated and Widows' Fund reported a total of $922.39, and the Agent, J. L. Updegraph, urged "special efforts this year to raise the Permanent Fund to the largest possible amount." Progress, "both in material and spiritual things," was the encouraging report of the Committee on the State of Religion, and the twenty-seven pastors were admonished to be "more persistent in giving Bible lessons to the children with the view of instructing and training them on doctrinal and spiritual matters." "Adherence to the faith and practice of our fathers" was strongly urged.

IV. THE INDIANA ELDERSHIP.

1st Indiana Eldership.—The internal improvements by the State of Indiana resulted in bankruptcy in the financial crash of 1837, and checked emigration. Yet from 1830 to 1840 public lands to the amount of 9,122,688 acres were sold to settlers, as against 3,558,221 from 1820 to 1830. The country is mostly level, undulating, the highest point being only 540 feet above the level of the Ohio. One-third of the State was dense forest, and was wet and marshy, and expensive to prepare for cultivation, as well as unsanitary. A number of Church of God families, however, had found homes in the State prior to 1840, mostly near the Ohio State line. Across the line in Mercer and Van Wert counties, Ohio, there were small colonies of Church of God families as early as 1837, which called for a minister. At the Ohio Eldership in 1838, T. Hickernell was appointed to the St. Mary's Mission in said counties. He began his work there in 1839, and soon after made his permanent home there. He was an indefatigable missionary, and made preaching tours southward to near the Ohio river, and into a dozen counties in Indiana. J. Martin also did considerable local work. In 1841, Adams county, Indiana, with Mercer, Van Wert and Allen counties, Ohio, was made a circuit by the Ohio Eldership. In 1842 Indiana Mission was formed, with J. Martin as missionary. In 1844 J. Martin, Wm. Hood and D. Neidig were appointed "missionaries to the State of Indiana." When in 1839 Hickernell went to the St. Mary's circuit he was largely isolated from other fields of labor in Ohio. He had opened many appointments in Indiana. The other missionaries in the State were also quite successful. They felt the need of an Eldership, and accordingly, ignoring the General Eldership, organized in 1845. "A petition was presented to the Ohio Eldership, October 21, 1846, by Bro. J. Martin to have an Eldership formed in the State of Indiana." The petition was granted; the Ohio Eldership agreed to "co-operate with the brethren in the West in assisting them in forming an Eldership in the State of Indiana;" W. Adams and T. Hickernell were appointed delegates; the second Saturday in November, 1846, was fixed as the time, and "the neighborhood of Bro. John Martin's, Milford township, LaGrange county, Indiana," as the place for the meeting. The Ohio Eldership also agreed that "one row of the western counties of the State of Ohio, extending North and South, be thrown into the Indiana Eldership." The work had extended northward in Indiana, as LaGrange county is on the Michigan State line, the third county north of Adams, and the second west of the Ohio line.

The brethren met, as per action of the Ohio Eldership, in a school-house, in the township and county named, November 16, 1846. The following were present and "constituted the meeting:" John Martin, Alexander B. Slyter and John Martin.

Thomas Hickernell, teaching elders; Alexander Menely, ruling elder, and Henry Komp, Jacob C. Sturges and David Paulus, delegates. John Martin was elected Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk. A committee of three on resolutions was appointed, which reported a resolution declaring that the Eldership "believes that the Bible teaches that slavery is an evil, and therefore we feel unwilling to co-operate with any who will countenance or practice the same." Also one stating that "we, the Eldership, do not make use of any creed or discipline." Also one "highly recommending that all those who profess to be followers of Christ will avoid all unnecessary and worldly conversation, especially on the Lord's day." The Eldership agreed to "unite with the other Elderships in the general system of co-operation." It declared it "inexpedient to identify ourselves with Secret Societies." A. B. Slyter, who had "formerly received his license from a local church," had "his license renewed by this Eldership." As no one was "willing to travel constantly excepting Brother Hickernell," he was "solicited to take up the Indiana appointments, in connection with the appointments in the western part of Ohio, assisted by Brothers Martin and Slyter." A Standing Committee of five was appointed—Martin, Menely, Latta, Slyter and Hickernell.

John Martin was born in Lancaster county, Pa., March 13, 1803. He died July 2, 1888, and his mortal bed is in the cemetery adjoining the bethel in Milford township, La Grange county, Ind., on a farm formerly owned by him. Early in life he emigrated to Ohio, and was licensed by the Ohio Eldership in 1838. He was a conscientious minister of the Church, and became a preacher of considerable power. More so as a result of strong natural faculties of observation and reasoning, than as a result of intellectual training, for his education was limited. Being a Pennsylvania German, he could preach in German as well as in English. His preaching, however, was "exhortational rather than textual." He was a successful evangelist, and was largely instrumental in organizing churches in La Grange, Steuben, De Kalb, Noble and Kosciusko counties, Indiana. He was sent in 1842 by the Ohio Eldership as missionary to Indiana. He was a farmer as well as a preacher, having bought land and cleared up the farm where he died. By training and experience he was self-reliant and of tenacity of purpose, at times indeed seeming to others to be firm to the degree of obstinacy. He was hence very tenacious of Bible doctrines, as he conceived them. Being opposed to secret societies, when the Eldership modified its ultra views on this question he "refused to fellowship with persons affiliated with secret orders," and his name was dropped from the Ministerial Roll. He always insisted that feet-washing comes after the Communion, as he so interpreted his German Bible, and so was largely responsible for this order of observing the ordinances in the Indiana Eldership.

2nd Indiana Eldership.—The second Indiana Eldership convened in a school-house in Troy township, Whitley county, November 15, 1847. The enrollment showed that the ministers had increased to four, E. B. Gillespie having been added; and six ruling elders were present. The work had been considerably enlarged, as these ruling elders came from churches in six counties, namely, La Grange, Wabash, DeKalb, Steuben, Noble and Whitley, the northeastern group of counties. Adams county in Indiana, and the Ohio counties were not represented. The boundaries remained unchanged. As Hickernell says: "The Ohio Eldership set off one tier of counties running North and South in Ohio. This would take me into the Indiana Eldership, and so the Indiana brethren made sure of one traveling preacher. You know these western brethren have a tremendous job of getting hold of preachers. As for other boundaries we have none, either South, West, or North."

The Eldership elected John Martin Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. Only the three committees, Stationing, Standing and on Resolutions, were appointed. The latter reported a resolution requesting "churches to use all possible exertions to raise funds to support those ministers who labor constantly in word and doctrine." The limited supply of ministers is indicated in the report of the Stationing Committee. Slyter and Hickernell were "appointed to travel St. Mary's Circuit, Ohio; J. Martin and E. B. Gillespie are appointed missionaries." T. Hickernell was "appointed to attend the next General Eldership, to be held in Pittsburg, Pa."

3rd Indiana Eldership.—On November 6, 1848, the third session of the Indiana Eldership was held "in the house of Matthias Lucans, in Wabash county, Ind." Two new preachers are enrolled—George H. Thomas and Christian Sands. Five preachers, four ruling elders and three messengers were enrolled. John Martin was chosen Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. A Committee on Overtures was added to the former committees. Good success was reported by the ministers, and several new churches were formed. Accordingly, January 1, 1849 was recommended "as a day of thanksgiving and prayer for the extension of Christ's kingdom." The Committee on Resolutions gave expression to the prevailing sentiment against the Constitution of the General Eldership when it offered a resolution, which was postponed, declaring that "we can not believe or receive any law or constitution framed by any of our brethren as having any legal authority over this Eldership in the transaction of its business." The Stationing Committee formed the territory into two very large fields, Mercer, Adams and Van Wert counties, Ohio, with C. Sands as minister, and Whitley, La Grange, Steuben, DeKalb and Noble counties, Ind., with John Blickenstaff as minister. "Thomas Hickernell to travel over the whole territory, as usual."

4th Indiana Eldership.—In 1849 the Indiana Eldership met "In a schoolhouse in the sixth district, near Auburn, DeKalb county, on Monday morning, October 15th." The enrollment revealed the work of the Standing Committee during the year. There are seven circuits, with six teaching elders, six ruling elders and one messenger. On ballot, George H. Thomas was elected Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. A Committee on License was added to the list of committees. Very few conversions were reported, and the support of the preachers was so meager that some were "compelled to leave the field on account of extreme poverty." The resolution against the Constitution of the General Eldership postponed in 1848, was called up by the Committee on Unfinished Business, and it "was adopted and approved." Instead of a day of thanksgiving and prayer for New Year's, 1849, "the first day of January, 1850," was designated "as a day of fasting and prayer by all the members of this Eldership for the prosperity of God's cause." Provision was made to "establish a fund for superannuated and worn out preachers in this Eldership." "Quarterly meetings" were recommended to be "established throughout the bounds of this Eldership," and the Standing Committee was directed "to appoint those meetings next Spring."

5th Indiana Eldership.—In 1850 the fifth "Annual Eldership of the Church of God in the State of Indiana met in a school-house near Auburn, DeKalb county, October 21st." There were present five teaching elders, and one absent; one ruling elder and four delegates. The teaching elders represented fields in Wabash, LaGrange and Adams counties, Ind.; Mercer county, Ohio, and Illinois. John Martin was chosen Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. Sixty-five conversions were reported. The "prospects for more laborers in the field," said Hickernell, "are increasing." The Eldership had not much business, and "we met in peace and friendship, and thus we parted." One delegate to the General Eldership was appointed. The report of the Stationing Committee contracts the territory by leaving out Wabash and Adams counties, Ind., and the Illinois work; but it adds "Defiance Mission." An opening sermon for 1851 is provided for.

6th Indiana Eldership.—The Indiana Eldership in 1851 met in Ohio, at a school-house one mile from Mendon, Mercer county, November 3rd. There were in attendance six teaching elders, five ruling elders and one delegate. One minister was absent. T. Hickernell delivered the Opening Sermon before the Eldership was constituted. John Martin was elected Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. The Eldership had a regular Book Agent to receive and sell Church publications. On "the project of a Printing Establishment" the Eldership resolved to "remain neutral," because "the Eldership find themselves too poor to assist in carrying out the proposed project." There were only three circuits reported by the Stationing Committee: Eel River, LaGrange and St. Mary's, with one "Home Missionary."

7th Indiana Eldership.—In Wells county, adjoining Adams on the West, November 1, 1852, in the Zanesville school-house, the seventh Indiana Eldership held its session. Seven teaching elders were present, three absent, David Keplinger, later an active missionary, having been received from Ohio. Four ruling elders were present, and three delegates. Six committees were appointed on motion. The Clerk made no record of a new organization; the officers of the Eldership of 1851 signed the Journal. The Eldership "did not have a single jar." The ministers gave their reports, showing the organization of three new churches, and about one hundred conversions. A fund for Superannuated Ministers was revived, and "each member within the bounds of this Eldership requested to pay one dime annually for that purpose." George Thomas was granted the privilege of taking an appointment from the East Pennsylvania Eldership to "open a mission through the south and south-west part of the Reserve in the State of Indiana." A "missionary project by T. Hickernell" was endorsed, and each member of all the churches requested to pay 25 cents for that purpose. The Eldership made no appointments of ministers, but "requested the circuit preachers to continue laboring on their different circuits till Spring, and that the Standing Committee be requested to appoint them to their different stations."

8th Indiana Eldership.—When the Indiana Eldership "met in a Cabinetshop" owned by Philip Baker, Pleasantview township, Wabash county, Ind., November 7, 1853, no list of circuits was entered on the Journal in constituting the Eldership. There were present seven teaching elders; five ruling elders, and four delegates. Four teaching elders were absent. David Keplinger was appointed Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. The Eldership appointed "the first day of January next as a day of fasting and prayer for the advancement of Zion's cause." The ministers were reproved for their "great neglect in preaching," and "solicited to make more efficient efforts in preaching the gospel." Though poor, the Eldership had a treasurer, but he made no report. The arrangement for the year following for supplying the churches with preaching was that "Bro. Keplinger travel the Wabash circuit, and Bros. Hickernell and Komp the St. Mary's and Miami [in Ohio] circuit, embracing eight counties from Defiance south in Ohio, and about the same number north and south in the State of Indiana."

9th Indiana Eldership.—October 30, 1854, the Indiana Eldership convened in a school-house in Georgetown, Ohio. Six teaching elders were present; four ruling elders, and eight teaching elders were absent. David Keplinger was chosen Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. The Committee on the State of Religion reported "some eight churches organized in the bounds of the Indiana Eldership, about one hundred and forty converted and one hundred and twelve baptized." The only resolution adopted was "that the Treasurer report to the Standing Committee when it holds its session next Spring." The Stationing Committee "established four circuits" and to these assigned six preachers. The circuits are St. Mary's, Napoleon, Auburn and Wabash. But provision was made for preachers to "hold some large meetings in LaGrange and DeKalb counties, Ind., and at Georgetown, Ohio." The backsliding of many converts of former meetings is lamented.

10th Indiana Eldership.—Better accommodations than that of a cabinet shop, in which the Eldership met in 1853, or even a school-house in which the sessions were held in 1854, the Eldership in 1855 met October 25th, "in the new Bethel near Bro. John Snyder's, Adams county, Ind. Eleven teaching elders were present, and five ruling elders; ten teaching elders were absent. There were three circuits. David Keplinger as Speaker, and Thomas Hickernell, Clerk, were elected on motion. On the three three circuits one hundred and sixty conversions were reported. The support of pastors was exceedingly limited, and the churches and deacons were appealed to and urged to "raise all they can to support their preachers." Special contributions were solicited "over and above what they agreed to pay Bro. Hickernell, to purchase a horse for him." The pastors were required the coming year "to make out a statistical account of the number of appointments, number of organized churches, number of church members, conversions, baptisms, accessions, expulsions, removals and deaths." The Eldership had "in the treasury for superannuated ministers $35.72. The Eldership made but one appointment, the "appointment of other ministers was postponed until the Standing Committee meets next Spring."

11th Indiana Eldership.—Instead of three circuits, as in 1855, when the eleventh Annual Eldership convened, October 27, 1856, at Turkey Creek, Kosciusko county, Ind., there were five circuits, to which were assigned five pastors, with fourteen "missionaries." There were present eleven teaching elders, five ruling elders and four delegates, while five ministers were absent. J. Martin was made Speaker, and T. Hickernell, Clerk. The circuits were of large area, with many preaching places. Without any recorded action the Journal opens with the statement, "the Eldership of the churches of God in the State of Indiana," etc. Only eighty-nine conversions were reported, and the Eldership lamented "that there has not been more done among so many." No delegates to the General Eldership in 1857 were elected.

12th Indiana Eldership.—As the Indiana Eldership was partially providing for the churches in Michigan, among the members at the session of 1857, which met with the church in Center Jackson, DeKalb county, Ind., October 26th, there were several members present from that State. The total number of ministers in attendance at the opening session was five; six ruling elders and four delegates. There was no ballot taken for officers, but on motion J. Martin was chosen Speaker, A. L. Nye, Journalizing Clerk, and T. Hickernell, Transcribing Clerk. The number of reported conversions was two hundred and thirty; but reports from absentees are not included. The Stationing Committee made two appointments—Greene county circuit, Ind., in the south-western part of the State, and Thornapple circuit, in Michigan. The "appointing of the other preachers is left to the Standing Committee." T. Hickernell attended the General Eldership, and reported its "doings." Thereupon the Eldership resolved "that we adopt the doings of the General Eldership, except that part of their doings in the shape of law respecting the test of church fellowship; and that we disapprove of the General Eldership passing resolutions to the churches, in the shape of law, respecting church fellowship. Also, we have exceptions to that part of their doings relative to the liquidation of old claims." When the Standing Committee met in February, 1858, in addition to the two appointments made by the Eldership, it appointed pastors to the following circuits: Auburn, Steuben, Zanesville, Eel River, Wabash, Columbia and Syracuse, and also to Braden's Young's and Beigh's school-houses.

13th Indiana Eldership.—The Indiana Eldership in 1858 enjoyed the distinction and gratification of having as "members of this body during the present sessions," "Bishops John Winebrenner and Wm. McFadden, of the East Pennsylvania Eldership." The session was held on Big Run, DeKalb county, Ind., beginning Monday, October 25, 1858. Nine teaching elders were present, and fourteen ruling elders and eight delegates. Eleven teaching elders were absent. D. Kepfinger was chosen speaker; A. L. Nye, First Clerk, and George Thomas, Second Clerk. The Eldership had lost part of its territory and some of its members when the West Ohio Eldership was formed. Hence, when the circuits were outlined and appointments were made, there were only three in Indiana—Auburn, Columbia, and Wabash and La Grange. Three circuits were in Michigan, with several of the points on the Wabash-La Grange circuit. Reports were encouraging, showing over four hundred conversions, and eight new churches organized. Slyter was ready to "acknowledge his wrong in publishing a letter through The Advocate detrimental to the character of Elder John Winebrenner," but as he "promised to recall the same, we shall lay no greater burden upon him." Singularly enough, Slyter, among other things, charges Winebrenner with opposing co-operation. But frankly he published over his signature, that he sincerely regrets writing the letter, and acknowledges that he did him injustice, and to have his forgiveness. Henry Cherry, member of the Free Baptist Church, was received and license granted him.

14th Indiana Eldership.—If example is contagious, there is an illustration in the action of the Indiana Eldership which met with the church in E. Brandenburg's neighborhood, Whitley county, Ind., October 26, 1859. It changed its rule, and directed the ministers to "go to the fields assigned them immediately after the close of the Eldership." So its action on Slavery denounced it in the strongest terms, as "a curse upon our country; an evil detrimental to all our relations and interests, and a very evil, uncivil and unchristian system." Twelve teaching elders were present, and ten absent; and eleven ruling elders and one delegate were enrolled. A. B. Slyter presided as Speaker, with W. M. Rumrill as Journalizing Clerk, and S. V. Sterner, Transcribing Clerk. Rules of order continued to be adopted at each session. In very strong terms the Eldership urged better support of the pastors, and suggested that salaries be paid quarterly. Probably to stimulate the churches to greater activity in this respect the ministers were "advised to give an account of the amount of their support at our annual meetings." On temperance the increased apathy generally prevailing is seen in the action taken. The following Christmas was designated "to be observed as a day of fasting and religious devotion." Two teaching elders and two ruling elders were elected delegates to the General Eldership, with a request to all the "traveling preachers to lift collections to defray the expenses" of these delegates. A new form of license was adopted, copied from the Journal of another Eldership.

15th Indiana Eldership.—The Eldership of the Churches of God in Indiana assembled in the bethel near N. Pierce's, Whitley county, Ind., on Monday morning, October 29, 1860, with thirteen teaching elders in attendance and seven ruling elders. Four teaching elders were absent. They elected John Martin, Speaker; W. M. Rumrill, Journalizing Clerk, and D. Kepfinger, Transcribing Clerk. Each pastor was instructed "to give an account of the amount of his support." The highest reported was $228.40. Thereupon the churches were urged "to support the ministry as the Scriptures require." The Eldership adopted appropriate resolutions on the death of Winebrenner, "beloved and venerated," "a great man," of "generous and noble spirit," whose "memory will ever be cherished as that of a man possessed of a strong, deep, clear, original and well cultivated mind." By resolution, contributions were to be solicited by ministers and brethren toward the erection of a suitable monument. The day of fasting, Christmas, 1859, was but partly kept. The Committee on Slavery, consisting of Sterner, B. Hahn, L. Maring and J. F. Weishampel, an advisory member with privileges of a full member, was divided. Maring signed neither Report, while Weishampel brought in a minority Report. The action on these Reports by the Eldership is not recorded. The "new Eldership organized in Michigan" was recognized, and the wish expressed that they may enjoy "the blessing of God, and much prosperity." The "teaching elders within the bounds of this Eldership which have no appointments" were "urgently advised to meet their respective circuit preachers, at as early a time as convenient, with a view to make such arrangements as may be deemed best to call all the local ministry into the field of labor as much as possible." On Temperance the Eldership declared it "will in no way give aid or countenance to any man who will engage in the fatal practice of trafficking in intoxicating liquors." Four circuits were named, with six pastors. St. Mary's circuit included Ft. Wayne.

16th Indiana Eldership.—On October 28, 1861, in the Union Bethel, near Millersburg, Whitley county, Ind., the sixteenth annual session of the Indiana Eldership was organized by the election of George Thomas, Speaker; J. E. McColley, Journalizing Clerk, and E. B. Bell, Transcribing Clerk. There were fourteen preachers present, and eight absent. Also ten ruling elders. Judging from the report of S. V. Sterner's circuit, the churches generally of the Eldership were quite small: Newville Center, 6; Spencerville, 20; Ft. Wayne, 7; Antioch, 7; Union, 25; Baker's neighborhood, 17; Zanesville, 13, and Flat Creek, 6. The Eldership manifested its spirit of loyalty to the Union by adopting clear and strong resolutions against the course of the Southern States in seceding from the Union and engaging in rebellion against the Government. Interested in the dissemination of books published by the General Eldership and by ministers of the Church, each pastor was "constituted a book agent on his field of labor." Journals were ordered to be printed in pamphlet form. The territory was divided into four circuits, and to each was appointed a pastor, with one and two assistants. Ft. Wayne was attached to the Columbia circuit, as the Eldership did not possess the means to make it a mission station. The Opening Sermon was delivered by John Martin. The Eldership consisted of fourteen teaching elders present, and ten ruling elders. Eight teaching elders were absent.

17th Indiana Eldership.—Annual Elderships rarely convened in houses of worship owned and used by other religious bodies; but on October 25, 1862, the Annual Eldership of the Churches of God in Indiana assembled in the "commodious bethel of the church of the United Brethren in Christ" at Zanesville, Wells county, Ind. Fourteen teaching elders were present, and eleven absent; seven ruling elders were in attendance, and twenty-two are marked absent. John Martin was Speaker; J. E. McColley, First Clerk, and E. B. Bell, Second Clerk. "The cause" was reported to be "on the increase, and the members of the Church are more established in the principles of the Bible than ever before." The Committee on Resolutions, Sands, Thomas and Smith, reported resolutions characterizing the rebellion as an "inhuman war waged against the best human Government ever established upon the earth;" expressing "sympathy and hearty co-operation with the Administration in its attempt to crush this unholy rebellion," and heartily endorsing "the President's Proclamation" and advising "its adoption by Congress." The motion to adopt was later reconsidered, and then the resolutions were adopted by a yea and nay vote, of 22 to 1. The Eldership was divided into four circuits, with six preachers.

18th Indiana Eldership.—With "all the members of the Church of God considered as advisory members during the sittings" of the Eldership which convened at Lake Bethel, Kosciusko county, Ind., Saturday, October 24, 1863, it was a body of good size. Twelve teaching elders were in attendance, and twelve were absent; with thirteen ruling elders present, and thirty-two absent. George Thomas presided, and J. E. McColley was Journalizing Clerk, and Elias Bryan, Transcribing Clerk. As at former Elderships, ministers of other Churches reported their work. Among these was P. Winebrenner, relative of John Winebrenner, a leading member of the "Christian Order." Elizabeth McColley, wife of J. E. McColley, preached before the Eldership from Gen. xv. 11, and the following morning had license granted her. H. Croy, of the United Brethren Church, was also licensed. Through its Committee, Sands, J. Slabaugh and G. R. Kinzey, declared "in favor of sustaining the flag of our country and the Constitution of our fathers and the Union under all circumstances and under any Administration, regardless of party politics;" that it is "for the Union whether slavery stands or falls;" that it "believes a negro is no better than a white man, and if a white man can be drafted to fight his enemies, we can see no reason why a black man is any better." The Stationing Committee arranged for five circuits, with nine pastors.

19th Indiana Eldership.—The Eldership of the Churches of God in Indiana in 1864 met at Olive Branch Bethel, Miami county, Ind., on Saturday evening, October 15th. As prearranged, C. Sands preached on Saturday evening, and A. B.

Slyter on Sunday morning. In the evening, by previous appointment, the Opening Sermon was preached by George Thomas, from I. Tim. iv. 15, on "The Gospel Ministry." When the Eldership was constituted on Monday morning fifteen teaching elders and twenty-three ruling elders were present, and twelve teaching elders and eighteen ruling elders absent. The Speaker chosen was C. Sands, with J. E. McColley, Journalizing Clerk, and J. S. Shock, Transcribing Clerk. George Thomas was elected Treasurer. Upon receipt and reading of "a letter from the Corresponding Messenger of the Northern Indiana Conference of the Free Will Baptist denomination," the Eldership, through its Committee, D. Keplinger, George Thomas and D. Gray, declared that "union is one of the paramount features of the doctrine of the Bible; that this Eldership accepts the friendly communication of the Free Will Baptist Church, and acquiesces in the Christian spirit of love and union exhibited, and longs for the time to come when sectarian distinctions may cease to exist between us, and we mingle into one, and take away the reproach of sectarianism from the two bodies." It was arranged that D. Keplinger preach a sermon on the ministry, in 1865, on Sunday evening. The four circuits, with their seven pastors, as fixed by the Stationing Committee, had an average of seven or more appointments.

20th Indiana Eldership.—What was probably the Opening Sermon of the Indiana Eldership of 1865, was delivered on Sunday evening, October 22nd, at Mount Zion, Allen county, Ind., by "Bishop George Thomas." The Eldership convened on Saturday, and there was preaching that evening, and on Sunday morning and evening. There were twelve ministers present, and eight ruling elders; while sixteen ministers were absent. But "all the members of the Church of God, male and female," were "received as advisory members." A ballot resulted in the choice for Speaker of J. Martin; J. S. Shock, Journalizing Clerk, and E. Bryan, Transcribing Clerk. The activity of Sister E. McColley is seen in her report, that during the year she preached one hundred and eighteen times; but her support was only $66.28. Her husband, J. E. McColley, preached the same number of sermons, and received a total support of $230.77. He organized one church during the year. The names of four ministers were dropped from the Roll, and one new name added. The local ministers on the different fields were instructed "to meet the itinerants at as early a day as practicable after they enter on their fields to make arrangements for a harmonious co-operation during the year." The cause of God in the Eldership was reported as "gradually and steadily on the advance." D. Keplinger was appointed "to travel as a General Missionary throughout the entire Eldership." Seven circuits were mapped out, with ten preachers assigned to them. C. Sands organized two churches on his field of labor. The ministers were instructed "to hold the interests, confidence and feelings of their congregations as sacred as those of their own families."

21st Indiana Eldership.—The Indiana Eldership in 1865 elected Mrs. Elizabeth McColley to preach the Opening Sermon when the body convened at Union Bethel, La Grange county, Ind., October 20, 1866, giving her as the theme of her sermon, "The Gospel Ministry." She preached on Sunday evening, changing the subject to "The Christian Embassy." Ten ministers were present on Monday morning, and fifteen ruling elders; while twelve ministers were absent. The choice for Speaker was J. E. McColley; J. S. Shock, First Clerk, and E. Bryan, Second Clerk. There was lack of co-operation both by ministers and churches, and between them, "militating greatly against the prosperity of the Church and tends to the destruction of confidence, and subjects both pastors and churches to discouragement, severe trials and unnumbered perplexities." Hence, the Eldership declared that "each minister receiving an appointment from the Eldership shall regard the same as one of most binding obligation that can be laid upon him, to feed the church of God and take care of it faithfully, regarding it as paramount to his or her life." But the "churches ought to consider themselves also under the most binding obligations that can be laid upon them to promptly supply all the temporal wants of their pastors." The Eldership excluded tobacco from "the house while it is in session." Statistical reports were required of the pastors. Keplinger announced his intention to remove to Missouri. He was reluctantly released, and was commended for his "unwavering faith, warm zeal, deep-toned piety, godly walk and conversation, his loyalty to God and his country and his great success as a minister." It was made the duty of "each ruling elder to keep an accurate account of the numerical strength of his congregation, ministerial support, accessions, baptisms, deaths, removals, expulsions, etc., and to report the same to the Eldership." J. E. McColley was authorized "to travel all over the bounds of the Indiana Eldership to solicit aid to build meeting-houses." A request to send a preacher to Centralia, Kans., could not be complied with for want of men. The Stationing Committee's Report mentions thirty-nine points, or churches, included in the eight fields of labor. A regular Agent for the Chicago Mission was appointed.

22nd Indiana Eldership.—The new bethel built by the church at Syracuse, Kosciusko county, Ind., was ready for dedication when the Eldership assembled there on October 12, 1867. The dedicatory services were held on Sabbath morning, the 13th, conducted by G. Smith and J. S. Shock. In the evening E. Bryan preached the Opening Sermon. Shock was elected Speaker on Monday morning; Bryan, First Clerk, and Smith, Second Clerk. According to precedent "all the members of the Church of God in good standing were received as advisory members." Keplinger reported good success on his mission in Missouri, with two churches organized. One of the former ministers was given an opportunity to "make acknowledgments for wrongs done to the Eldership," and received "pardon so far as his confession goes." The Centralia College, Kans., "the property of the General Eldership," was strongly endorsed, and George Thomas, formerly a member of the Indiana Eldership, was "urged to use all his influence in its completion." The funds in the hands of the Treasurer, C. Bortner, consisted of Superannuated Fund Notes to the amount of $189.30, and $5.93 in cash. The general condition of the churches in the Eldership was prosperous and encouraging, and the Church was making gradual advancement. The Committee on Temperance sought to impress "on the minds of the brethren in the ministry the duty to use all their influence and power against the traffic and use of intoxicating spirits." In this class of beverages it included "not only those manufactured from corn and rye, but such as the wine from currants, grapes, elderberries and rhubarb, which at this time are quite fashionable in our domestic circles." The use of tobacco was denounced as "a dirty, filthy, useless and expensive practice," and "all Church of God people are counseled to dispense with its use." The Eldership placed itself on record against leavened bread for Communion purposes by advising "deacons to prepare unleavened bread for use at the Communion." There was one German appointment, to be served by J. Martin, besides which there were eight circuits. Keplinger was appointed Missionary to Missouri, and Shock and Martin were General Evangelists.

23rd Indiana Eldership.—As ruling elders were members of the Eldership the same as teaching elders, the Roll of the Eldership which met at Zanesville, Wells county, Ind., October 17, 1868, showed eleven teaching elders and fifteen ruling elders present, and fourteen teaching elders and thirty ruling elders absent. There was preaching on Saturday evening, and dedicatory services of the new bethel on Sabbath morning by R. H. Bolton and at 4 p. m. by G. Smith. The Opening Sermon was delivered in the evening by J. Martin, who was elected Speaker, with J. S. Shock, Clerk. Three members of the Stationing Committee were laymen. The writing and publishing of books "by those who possess the ability and means" was recommended, "believing their mission a useful one." After "considerable deliberation on the propriety or impropriety of inaugurating a mission movement in the city of Fort Wayne," county seat of Allen county, Ind., it was concluded to "seek to procure the services of a suitable minister to migrate to Fort Wayne and open out a mission," said missionary was "invited to canvass the Indiana Eldership for assistance," while the Eldership "agreed to aid by our prayers, influence and means." R. H. Bolton was "invited to become said missionary." J. Martin was also "requested to preach for the German people of Fort Wayne." The Committee on Boundaries, distinct from the Stationing Committee, arranged the territory into five circuits, with forty-two churches or preaching points. Co-operation between the Indiana and the Michigan Elderships was urgently invited.

24th Indiana Eldership.—From the five circuits of the Indiana Eldership, when it assembled at Beaver Dam, Kosciusko county, Ind., October 16, 1869, there were present fifteen teaching elders and twenty-four ruling elders; while ten teaching elders and twenty-one ruling elders were absent. Z. Garrison was chosen to preside, and J. S. Shock to act as Clerk. The legal incorporation of the Eldership was decided upon, and measures to that end directed to be taken. Keplinger, missionary in Missouri, and G. Thomas, in south-western Iowa, were members of the Indiana Eldership, and their "appointment by the General Eldership was ratified by this Eldership." Mission work within the Eldership territory assumed new proportions. While Fort Wayne mission is not mentioned, the Committee on Boundaries named three other missions: Miami, Paddytown and Antioch, and a General Missionary. The Stationing Committee appointed a missionary to each of these fields, and Z. Garrison, General Missionary. B. F. Bear was also appointed to preach German at Yellow Lake Bethel.

25th Indiana Eldership.—No Opening Sermon is recognized in the Journal of the twenty-fifth annual session of the Indiana Eldership, which convened at Zanesville, Wells county, Indiana, on October 8, 1870. Counting all entitled to membership there were present thirteen teaching elders, and eighteen ruling elders; while fourteen teaching elders, and thirty-two ruling elders were absent. Five delegates were present. J. Martin was elected Speaker, and W. W. Lovett, Clerk. Almost a verbatim copy of the Rules of Order of the East Pennsylvania Eldership was adopted; but they were subject to amendment only by a two-thirds vote. The Eldership definitely committed itself to the project of starting a mission in Fort Wayne, and directed its Board of Missions to take the initiatory steps. The beginning was to be made by the "erection of a small mission house for Sunday-school purposes," the "erection of a good house of worship" to follow. What are called "Rules of Incorporation of the Indiana Eldership of the Church of God" were adopted. They provide for "the name, style and title;" for annual meetings, consisting of all the teaching elders holding licenses from said Eldership, and all ruling elders from each local church; prescribe for the regular officers, and define their duties; that the Speaker, Clerk and Treasurer constitute the Board of Trustees of the Eldership, to hold and control all forms of property; against defect of bequests by reason of "misnomer of said corporation," and for a common seal. The Committee on Boundaries outlined four circuits, naming the points on each. The Stationing Committee added Air Line Mission and Miami Mission, and also one General Missionary. The funds of the Eldership were very limited, but the Committee on the State of Religion reported that greater liberality is beginning to prevail.

26th Indiana Eldership.—The attendance at the Eldership which met at Syracuse, Kosciusko county, Ind., September 28, 1871, was not any better than in 1870, as one-half the teaching elders only were present. A. X. Shoemaker, made "a member during the present session," was chosen Speaker, and W. W. Lovett, Clerk. Like some other Elderships, the old Rule, requiring preachers to retire after reporting, was rescinded. The Committee on Temperance not only "resolved to use every lawful means in our homes, at the polls, in the pulpit, and everywhere to prevent the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; but to discourage the use as a beverage of domestic wines, as well as the practice of fashionable family drinking." With these resolutions it connected one against "the free use of tobacco." The Eldership now had $339.69 in the form of Notes in its Superannuated Fund. The amount of $115.00 was raised on the floor of the Eldership for the Fort Wayne Mission. W. W. Lovett was appointed to said mission, with an appropriation of $300.00 for the year. Besides this mission there were seven circuits, with eleven ministers.

27th Indiana Eldership.—Eighteen teaching elders, seventeen ruling elders and five delegates on October 16, 1872, constituted the Eldership at Grove Bethel, Jackson township, DeKalb county, Ind. Eight teaching elders were absent. The Speaker was J. E. McColley; Clerk, E. B. Bell. The question of the title of the Eldership, which came up in the Report of the Committee on Business, was postponed one year, notwithstanding the action of the General Eldership against the plural use of the term "Church." It appearing that there was quite a degree of laxness in observing the ordinance of baptism, the Eldership requested the ministers "not to neglect the important duty of teaching and baptizing the young converts, inasmuch as faith and baptism are closely connected in the Commission." On account of some failing to co-operate faithfully with the Eldership, it was insisted upon that rules of co-operation are necessary to successful work in the Eldership, and hence all members were urged "to act in harmony with the actions of the body, whether in the financial or other departments of the work." A better fraternal spirit was also made the subject of consideration, to the end that "their labors may be combined in building up and sustaining God's great and glorious cause, especially in regard to the support of the ministry. The work at Fort Wayne was not so vigorously pushed forward, the missionary having devoted less than one-fourth of his time to the mission. J. E. McColley was appointed to Fort Wayne. Columbia City Mission received permission for its pastor, S. Cole, to canvass for means "to complete the erection of a house of worship in that city." Besides these missions there were eight fields of labor. All the local preachers were instructed "to open new appointments and assist in the great work of the Master as much as practicable with them."

28th Indiana Eldership.—Co-operation inspires co-operation. An Eldership for the sake of consistency, if for no other reason, must exemplify its own teaching. If the Indiana Eldership insisted in 1872 that all its members and churches "act in harmony with the actions of the body," why should not it act in harmony with the actions of the higher body? This all the Elderships realized, and so with the others the Indiana Eldership changed its title to conform to the action of the General Eldership in 1872. It convened at Union, Huntington county, Ind., October 1, 1873, as "the Eldership of the Church of God in Indiana." There were twenty teaching elders present, and nineteen ruling elders; while nine teaching elders were absent. In effecting an organization George Smith was elected Speaker, and W. W. Lovett, Clerk. One of its first actions was a resolution to "stand with the General Eldership in any college project." Then it appointed a committee "to arrange a program for an Eldership Sunday-school Convention." It made it a standing order that the ruling elders report at each session. The time and place for the Sunday-school Convention were fixed so as to follow the Pentecostal meeting. It appointed one of its members annually as a Book Agent, to keep on hand Church publications for sale to ministers and churches. It put itself on record as in favor of "the passage and enforcement of laws prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage," and declared that "the use of tobacco conflicts with the laws of temperance." The "young brethren of the Eldership" were required "to apply themselves diligently to the study of biblical history, grammar, rhetoric, logic, music, geometry, astronomy and as many more of the arts and sciences as they may be able to get access to." No examinations were provided for. The Ministerial Association was to be continued, and it was made the "duty of our young ministerial brethren to punctually attend them." The "tendency of the Church to conformity with the world and its rejection of the authority of the Bible" were "deeply deplored." By a yea and nay vote of 18 to 11 the Eldership "disapproved of secret organizations;" but it laid on the table a resolution declaring it "will have no fellowship with a member of any Secret Society."

29th Indiana Eldership.—At the twenty-ninth session of the Indiana Eldership, held at Evergreen, Whitley county, beginning September 28, 1874, there was considerable of a contest in the election of officers. The Eldership "proceeded to ballot for Speaker and Clerk, resulting on third ballot in electing Elias Bryan Clerk." Then "on motion, Bro. George Smith was instructed to cast the ballot of the Eldership for W. W. Lovett for Speaker." The Finance Committee reported finding "an indebtedness on the Fort Wayne Mission of about $1,500.00, and available subscriptions of about $900.00." The delegates to the General Eldership received instructions "to do what they can in that body for the establishment of a general Church school." Also to work "to keep the Chicago Mission property intact to the General Eldership, and not to allow any person or persons to usurp authority, control or possession thereof." The Eldership was not ready to agree to require the churches to observe the ordinances in the order which was maintained in other Elderships. The work in general throughout the Eldership territory had "not been crowned with the visible success that the cause of Christ demands." But in the "aggregate there has been much good done in the saving of precious souls and in establishing the Church in the faith and practice of the gospel." A better support of the ministry was resolved upon. An annual ten-cent contribution from each church member was required for the Superannuated Fund. Four candidates for license were ordained, "W. W. Lovett giving the address and charge, and J. Bumpus led in solemn prayer, together with the laying on of the hands of several of the elders."

30th Indiana Eldership.—No absentees are noted when the Eldership was constituted at Thorn Creek Bethel, Whitley county, September 27, 1875. The enrollment showed eighteen teaching elders, seventeen ruling elders and four delegates. W. W. Lovett was made Speaker, and I. W. Lowman, Clerk. The Eldership voted to "give exhorter's license to applicants deemed worthy of such license." Realizing that "there has been a neglect in the matter of a more thorough education," the Eldership resolved to "earnestly urge and encourage by word and action an awakening to this duty; that parents educate their children so far as opportunity is afforded, and that we earnestly urge ministers to a more perfect and thorough education both in the training of the mind and the cultivation of right principles in the dignity of the sacred office." The holding of a Ministerial Association was agreed upon. A Board of Sisters' Mission had been created, which was "successful in the collection of funds for the support of the pastor in Fort Wayne." A Pentecostal meeting and a Sabbath-school convention were appointed to be held at Syracuse. The Board of Missions was held by note indebted to the Eldership in the sum of $408.10, with "$4.30 mission fund in the treasury." The Eldership "sanctioned every effort made to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage." Applicants for license were hereafter required "to obtain a recommendation from the local churches of which they are members." "J. E. McColey was appointed Collecting Agent," his especial duty being to collect funds for Fort Wayne Mission. There were two stations and seven circuits, Fort Wayne Mission receiving $200.00 missionary money.
